These considerations lead to a review of the arguments adduced on behalf of the appellant, as substantiating that construction of the point on which he has been advised to rely. They may be summarised, so far as is necessary, thus: First, the Prince's case, in vol. 4 of Coke's Reports, part 81a, was referred to. The charter constituting the grant of the duchy is then set forth, and the following passage, being the grant of free warren, was read from page 10, namely, "We have, moreover, for us and our heirs, granted, and by this our charter we have confirmed, to the aforesaid duke, that the said duke, and the heirs of him, eldest sons, dukes of the same place for ever, have free warren in all the manors, lordships, castles, lands, and other places aforesaid, so as the said lands be not within the bounds of our forests; and that none enter into them to hunt in them, or to take anything which to warren appertaineth, without the licence and will of the said duke, or other dukes of the same place, upon pain of forfeiture of ten pounds." Next, the following passage in Coke upon Littleton, tit. 1, cap. 1, sec. 2, was cited: "So it is of a forest, parke, chase, vivarye, and a warren in a man's owne ground, by the grant of any of them not onely the priviledge but the land itselfe passes, for they are compound." It was stated that this passage was not known, or at all events not quoted in the court below. Shepherd's Touchstone, and other works of authority, were also referred to as recognising and respecting the law as laid down in Co. Litt., and the case of Rice v. Wiseman, as reported in the Rolls Reports, p. 259, and 3 Bulstrode, p. 82, was cited; and it was said that, inasmuch as the soil belonged to the duchy, it followed on these principles that it passed under the term "warren;" and furthermore, that this view was fortified by the context of the grant, and especially by the words "all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever in Bromby aforesaid, and that lodge or house thereupon built," and the words "commonly called or known by the name of Bromby Warren;" and a series of leases was referred to, commencing in the time of Henry VIII., and ending with the lease of 1777, mentioned in the grant. It was urged in addition to these arguments that the 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, under authority of which the grant was made by the duchy, did not authorise the sale of such a thing as a right of warren as distinct from the soil, but only the sale of a "tenement," not of a "hereditament;" that the authority given by the Act must be taken to have been followed, and, therefore, that the grant on the occasion of the sale must be taken to be a grant of the soil with its incidents.

It may be well to deal with these authorities and arguments, omitting only those founded on the context of the grant, before going to the exact terms of the grant itself. They can be, and in fact have been, completely answered.

First of all, the charter referred to as granting the free warren, as well as the leases, established that there was a right of free warren in gross belonging to the Duchy of Cornwall, and extending over Bromby and other places; there is no ground in law for saying that a person having a right of free warren generally, may not grant a limited right a grant of a "warren of conies;" nor because the term "warren of conies" is used in the leases and in the grant of 1799, and the expression so used differs from the grant of the charter, is an intention to pass an estate in the soil to be inferred. The intention must be found in the instrument itself; "warren of conies" is not so extensive as "free warren;" the term itself was obviously taken from the leases, particularly that of 1777, and probably originated in the fact of the conies being in that locality the only beasts, or at all events the only beasts of warren of any value. The terms of the charter, therefore, do not advance the appellant's case.

With respect to the passage from Coke upon Littleton, Mr. Preston, in his edition of Shepherd's Touchstone, adds to the passage very significantly this observation: "generally without any qualification or context." The passage uses the term "warren" generally. The primary signification of that word when speaking of a "right of warren," or of "free warren," or when speaking of a "warren of conies," most assuredly does not mean an estate in the soil; a grant of land or of a manor according to the authorities, does not pass a right of free warren. A number of Exchequer decrees and proceedings have been quoted showing the use of the term "warren" in connection with terms of locality; from these it is manifest that the use of the word "warren," and more especially of the words "warren of conies," does not necessarily, or usually, or according to any primary acceptation, mean an estate in the soil; to warren of any description there must be a local boundary, and it is impossible, in our opinion, to attribute any other weight or meaning to the passage than that "warren" may be so used as to mean to pass, and may pass, an estate in the soil, provided that the context of the instrument in which it is so used shows that to be the intention. Then the case of Rice v. Wiseman appears from the reports to be this:—"The defendant having a warren in a park, called Braddock Park, demised Warrenam suam, anglicè the game of conies, unto the plaintiff, and did covenant that he should enjoy the benefit of his demise; for breach of covenant the action brought, and lays the breach in killing of the conies in the park, sibi dimisso; and also for his not suffering of him to come there, and to kill the conies to him demised—quia ipsum intrare et venare non permisit.

"Coke, C. J.—If I have warren in my land, and I demise my warren in such a place, clearly the soil doth pass. If the soil be in him by a grant or lease of the park, the soil doth pass.

"Dodderidge, J.—A man may have a warren in another man's land, and there by the grant of the warren the soil doth not pass.

"Coke.—By 33 H. 6, if one grants his warren, excepting the soil, the same doth not pass, and therefore it followeth that if it had not been excepted the same would have passed.

"Dodderidge.—I cannot have a park in another man's land. If I grant unto one my manor of Dale, Manerium de Dale, anglicè any close in Dale, the manor shall pass. So here in this case the warren doth pass. Also a man (as here in this case) may have a warren in his park; by his demise of the warren in his park, the soil doth not pass.

"Coke agreed with him herein, because he is here to have the park himself otherwise; it were if he had no park.

"The court all agreed in this, that the warren here demised is intended to be in the whole park, and this to be as large and broad as the park, and that here is a good breach of covenant assigned, and so by the rule of the court judgment was entered for the plaintiff."

The action, as is plain from the report of the case, did not involve any question of the right to the soil, and Lord Coke is reported as plainly admitting that the demise or grant of a warren in a particular locality—as "in his park"—does not pass the soil.

There then remains the question said to arise in the Act of Geo. 3 c. 60, s. 57. It is plain that the Act confers the power to sell the two things combined, "land," and "right of warren." The greater must necessarily include the power to sell the less, that is the warren, or part of the warren; the estate and interest of the Duchy in the soil was the manerial estate and interest in the wastes and commons, the tenants having rights as to the surface; and if the terms of the grant, according to their fair construction, do not convey the soil, they can have no artificial or technical meaning because of the extent or nature of the power conferred by this Act. Moreover, a right of warren is a "tenement," as shown by the authorities quoted by the Master of the Rolls.

The leases do not support the appellant's case to any greater degree than they do that of the respondent; they are, to say the least of them, but of doubtful import, and, this being so, the question resolves itself into this, what is the true construction, intention, and meaning of the terms and expressions used in the grant? Those terms and expressions, as far as they are material, are these:

"All that piece or parcel of woodland situate in Bromby within the county of Lincoln, commonly called Princes-woods, containing by admeasurement twenty-three acres, one rood, and eleven perches, or thereabouts." Here there is a plain description of soil. Then, "And all that close or parcel of pasture land situate at the east end of the said woods, and commonly called Wood and Close, containing by admeasurement, four acres, three roods, and twenty-four perches, or thereabouts." Here again there is a plain description of soil. Then, "And all that warren of conies with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtenances whatsoever in Bromby aforesaid;" this being a warren of conies with a locality, and then, "that lodge or house thereupon built commonly called Bromby Lodge," and then "all that warren of conies with all and singular the rights, members, and appurtances whatsoever in Redburn, in the said county of Lincoln," again a warren of conies with a locality, and then, "both which said warrens of conies are now commonly called or known by the name of Bromby Warren, and do extend themselves in and over the wastes or east moores of Bromby, Frodingham, Scunthorpe, and Ashby, in the said county of Lincoln, which said several premises are parcel of the Lordship and Soke of Kirton, in Lindsay, in the said county of Lincoln, and parcel of the possessions of the Duchy of Cornwall, and were last demised, together with the fishery of the River Trent by his present Majesty King George the Third, by letters patent under his Exchequer Seal, bearing date the 15th day of August in the year of our Lord 1777, unto Robert Pindar, of Bromby Hall, in the said county of Lincoln, clerk, since deceased, for a reversionary term of nineteen years, to commence from the 13th July 1788, under the several yearly rents of 20*s.* for the said woodlands, and 3*l.* 7*s.* 4½*d.* for the said coney warren; and also all houses, edifices, structures, timber trees, and other trees, mines, quarries, waters, watercourses, roads, ways, easements, profits, commodities, privileges, advantages, emoluments, and hereditaments whatsoever, in or upon the said woods and lands, and the said warren and warrens of coneys, growing or arising, or to the same in any wise belonging or appertaining, at or for the yearly fine or sum of 800*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain, to be paid by the said Thomas Pindar within forty days from the date of this certificate or contract into the Bank of England, and carried to the account of the Duchy of Cornwall. And from and immediately after the payment of the said sum in manner aforesaid, and the enrolment of this certificate, and the receipt for the said purchase-money in the office of the auditor of the Duchy of Cornwall, and thenceforth for ever, the said Thomas Pindar, and his heirs, successors, or assigns, shall be adjudged, deemed, and taken to be in the actual seisin and possession of the said woodland and pasture ground, warrens and premises, so by him purchased, and shall hold and enjoy the same peaceably and quietly, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes, as his said Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, his heirs or successors, Dukes of Cornwall, might or could have held and enjoyed the same by force and virtue of an Act of Parliament passed in the 38th year of the reign of H.M. King George the Third, intituled An Act for making perpetual, subject to the redemption and purchase in the manner therein stated, the several sums of money now charged in Great Britain as a land tax for one year from the 25th March 1798."

The demise of 1777 referred to in the grant contains a description similar in terms to that which I have read from the grant, and it contains this reservation or exception—"excepting, nevertheless, and always reserving to us, our heirs and successors, all timber trees, and all fair sapling oaks apt to become timber, and also sufficient stabbles in every acre of the said woodlands, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and also all mines, minerals, and quarries of and in the said premises; which said premises are parcels of the lordship and soke of Kirton in Lindsey aforesaid, and parcel of the possessions of the duchy of Cornwall." And the rest is reserved as follows: "Under the several yearly rents following, that is to say, for rent of the woodlands the sum of 20*s.*; for the coney warren the sum of 3*l.* 7*s.* 4½*d.*; and for the fishery the sum of 10*s.*" And there is a covenant to keep the coney warren stocked and stored with a sufficient number of conies, and a provision for the lease to become void in the event (amongst other things) of default being made in payment of the rents, or any of them, and a proviso for re-entry and resumption of the premises.

The lease follows the description in former leases; two only have been produced in which the "warren of conies" was alone leased without lands being in terms leased with it, and in those there was no reservation of mines and minerals.

The first observation that occurs is that there is no grant of moors or wastes; the next, that where land is intended to be granted, the grant and description are unmistakeable and explicit; the next, that there is not a grant of the warren simpliciter, but of "all that warren of conies" with a fixed locality; that is, as regards the first, "in Bromby aforesaid;" as regards the second, "in Redburn;" both are further stated to be "commonly called or known as Bromby Warren, and to extend over certain wastes or eastmoores." There is not, as has been before said, any grant of the wastes or eastmoores; the grant of a "warren of coneys" is essentially a grant of the coneys, and the right to take and kill the coneys; a grant of a warren in a particular locality, as in a park, Lord Coke himself admits, does not pass the soil, and here there is plainly nothing more. That the warrens are commonly called Bromby Warren, and are situate in particular places, and extend over particular wastes or moors, in no way extends the meaning of the words "warren of coneys" to an estate in the soil, and cannot, either in technical legal language, or according to any rules or mode of construction, technical or untechnical, be held to have any such effect; the reservation of mines and minerals in the lease applies to the land plainly and actually demised; the rent is reserved out of the land, but for the warren; and the addition of "that house or lodge thereupon built, commonly called Bromby Lodge," seeing that a lodge or house is incident to a warren and always has been, and always has been leased and dealt with in connection with the right of warren in question; that "thereupon" may either mean "in Bromby," or built there for the purposes of the warren, or connected with or incident to the warren. Seeing this, the addition is wholly insufficient to show that an estate in the waste or eastmoores was intended to pass. In fine, nothing of the kind was intended but "warren of coneys" and only "warren of coneys;" and whatever is fairly incident to, or necessary for, the exercise of the right of preserving and making profit out of coneys.

There was yet another ground urged, in which it was said that the appellant ought to succeed, namely, that the manor of Bromby was his, and that he had proved his title to it in the cause as claiming through Thomas Pindar. It is plain, however, that it is part of the manor or soke of Kirton; that during the whole time courts have been held in Bromby for the whole manor or soke of Kirton, and as plain that he showed no title to the wastes or moors of Bromby, or any act or right in any way excluding the rights of the lord of the superior manor. We do not think it necessary to go through the details which the Master of the Rolls referred to in his judgment as decisive in this part of the case.

On all these grounds, therefore, we are of opinion that the appellant's case has wholly failed; that the real mistake has been the supposition that his rights have been mistaken; that the bills were properly dismissed with costs in the court below, and that the appeal must likewise be dismissed with costs.

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED); FORWOOD'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Secured creditor — Proof — Date of claim — General order of the 11*th Nov.* 1862, rule 20.

A banking company wrote a letter of guarantee to F. wherein they agreed, in consideration of F. accepting bills to a certain amount against a ship and her freight, to provide F. with funds to meet the bills at least seven days before maturity. F. accepted the bills. The banking company was ordered to be wound-up, and the usual advertisement for claims was issued. Soon after this, and two days before the bills arrived at maturity, a notary employed by F. presented the letter of guarantee to the official liquidator, and demanded payment:

Held, that this was not sending in the particulars of claim as required by the general order of the 11*th Nov.* 1862, rule 20, and that therefore F. was entitled to prove only for the balance of the amount guaranteed after deducting the amount realised by the sale of the ship, &c.

Particulars of a claim under the 20*th rule of the General Order of the* 11*th Nov.* 1862 must be sent in in writing.

This was an application by Messrs. Forwood, trading at Liverpool as Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood, to be admitted to prove as creditors of Barned's Banking Company for the sum of 15,000*l.* in respect of two guarantees signed by the Banking Company for 9000*l.* and 6000*l.* respectively.

The facts of the case are as follows:—

On the 27th March 1866, the banking company wrote to Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood the following letter:—

Gentlemen,—In consideration of your accepting the drafts of Messrs. T. M. Mackay and Co., at three months' date for 9000*l.* against the ship Naval Reserve and her freight, and on your agreeing to renew such drafts for a further period of three months, we agree to provide you with funds to meet such drafts at least seven days before maturity; it being understood that if we are called upon by Messrs. James Baines and Co. to pay you the amount of the drafts, you transfer to us your said security.

Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood accordingly accepted the drafts of Messrs. T. M. Mackay and Co. for 9000*l.*

On the 4th April 1866, the banking company wrote to Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood, a similar letter of guarantee for further drafts of Messrs. T. M. Mackay and Co. for 6000*l.*, which drafts were duly accepted by Messrs. Leach and Co. They were drawn, and were expressed in the letter of guarantee to be drawn, against the ship Golden South, and 60-64ths of the ship Golden Empire, and their freights.

Barned's Banking Company stopped payment on the 18th April 1866, while all the bills were current, and was shortly afterwards ordered to be wound-up.

The drafts for 9000*l.* matured on the 27th June 1866, and those for 6000*l.* on the 6th Aug. 1866.

In May the usual advertisement was issued for claims against the banking company to be sent in on or before the 22nd July following.

On the 25th June, two days before the drafts for 9000*l.* fell due, Joseph Coleman, clerk to Mr. Lowndes, who was a notary public, and who acted on behalf of Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood, took the letter of guarantee of the 27th March 1866, to the banking company's offices, and handed it to a clerk behind the counter and requested him to pay the amount thereof, viz., 9000*l.* The clerk took the letter upstairs to show it to the official liquidators, but soon returned and handed back the document, stating that it could not be paid. Lowndes afterwards, on the same day, affixed to the letter of guarantee the notarial memorandum, "cannot be paid."

The same was done on the 1st Aug. with the second letter of guarantee.

The ships which had been mortgaged to Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood, were sold in Sept. 1866. The Naval Reserve produced over 8000*l.*, and the two others produced little more than 2000*l.*

After the presentation of the letters of guarantee by the notary's clerk, no further claim was made till the 18th March 1868, when Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood wrote to the official liquidators of the banking company as follows:

Golden Empire.

We beg to hand you statement of our claim upon you against advice per this vessel, under your letter of guarantee per said advance dated the 4th April 1866, and shall be glad to receive dividends on account of the same, viz., 2904*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*

On the 12th June 1868 a formal claim for the whole 15,000*l.* (the amount of the two letters of guarantee), was sent in by Messrs. Leach, Harrison, and Forwood.

The only question in the case was whether the presentation of the letters of guarantee by the notary's clerk was such a notice of the claim as is required by the 20th rule of the General Order of the 11th Nov. 1862, so as to entitle the applicants to prove for the whole amount of their debt without deducting the amount realised by the sale of their other securities.

Jessel, Q. C. and Hemming, for the applicants, contended that the claim was duly sent in by the notary's clerk taking the letter of guarantee to the offices of the bank, and that they were entitled to prove for the whole amount. They cited

Re Barned's Banking Company, Kellock's case, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769;

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidators, contended that no such notice had been given as is required by the 20th rule of the General Order of the 11th Nov. 1862, as it was clear from the words of the rule that such notice must be in writing.

Jessel, Q. C. was heard in reply.

Lord ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that the Messrs. Forwood did not send in their claim on the 25th June or 1st Aug. 1866. The sole question is, whether under the decision of the Lords Justices (Kellock's case (sup.) and under the General Order, the showing the letters of guarantee to the official liquidator was sending in their claim. Now, in the first place, let us look at it without any legal technicalities. What is meant by a man sending in a claim? "I, John Romilly, send in a claim for 1000*l.* for such and such services, and the evidence of it consists of certain documents which I produce and show to you." Can anybody say that my sending these documents without making any claim at all, and without sending in my name, is sending in a claim? The case is nothing more than this—Barned's Banking Company wrote to Messrs. Forwood and said, "If you are not paid before a certain time, we will guarantee you the payment;" and that letter is an original document, an original security, which, of course, the persons who have got it will not part with. Unquestionably they sent it to the official liquidator to be shown to him, and they parted with it to the clerk for that purpose; but they knew that they were among merchants, men of honour, who would not think of abstracting the security. Suppose the official liquidator had taken it up and put it in the fire, would he not have been required to make it good in every respect? It is a mere security which they have got to prove and establish their claim by. Now, I wish to consider what is meant by the words of the general order, and then to look at the words of the Lord Chancellor upon this subject in Kellock's case; but the sole question that I have to determine is, whether a notary public (not the creditor himself, or his agent in any other respect than as a notary public), merely taking a bill to be noted for the purpose of protesting it, and for the purpose of enabling him to have his recourse against the other persons who had signed the bill, is making a claim. That is the whole question I have to determine, because if that was not a claim, they did not make it at any other time. (His Lordship stated the facts as to Mr. Lowndes presenting the letters of guarantee.) The question is, whether that is sending in a claim by Messrs. Forwood to the official liquidator. If so, it is the oddest form of claim I ever saw put in. The letter of guarantee is a document from which you may infer, very reasonably, that they have a claim to make, and that, if they are not paid, they will make a claim; but they may have been paid from other sources, and it is necessary to produce this guarantee, because they may otherwise lose their equities against other persons. But as I have said, they may have been paid in full. Then the question arises, whether it is necessary that the claim should be made in writing. I will disregard, as having nothing to do with the case, all those observations about its being the official liquidator's duty to ascertain from the books whether there is a debt due or not. If that were so, no claim need ever be made, because the official liquidator must make the claim himself. That has nothing to do with the case. Now the words of the 20th rule of the General Order (11th Nov. 1862) are:—"For the purpose of ascertaining the debts and claims due from the company, and of requiring the creditors to come in and prove their debts or claims" (that is the object of it) "an advertisement shall be issued at such time as the judge shall direct, and such advertisement shall fix a time for the creditors"—to do what?—"to send their names and addresses, and the particulars of their debts or claims, and the names and addresses of their solicitors (if any), to the official liquidator, and appoint a day for adjudicating thereon." Therefore, it is a notice for the creditors to send their names and addresses and particulars of demand, and the names and addresses of their solicitors (if any). Whether there was a solicitor or not in this case I do not know, but I should think probably there was. As to sending the names and addresses, nothing of the sort occurred here; as to sending the particulars of the claim, nothing of the sort occurred here; but there was simply a document in which the company for whose estate

the official liquidator was acting is mentioned, and the name of the person to whom he binds himself to pay a certain sum of money. Then I would refer to what the Lord Chancellor says in Kellock's case (sup.). He says, "The 20th rule of the General Order under the Act of 1862 directs that an advertisement fixing the time for the creditors to send the particulars of their debts or claims to the official liquidator, and appointing a day for the adjudicating thereon. The court, therefore, is to adjudicate upon the debt or claim so sent in." The order says they shall send their names, addresses, and particulars of demand. I hold that means in writing, and that to send a person to show a document from which it may be inferred that you have a claim, is not a compliance with that order; and so, I think, the Lord Chancellor understood it, for he says, "The court, therefore, is to adjudicate upon the debt or claim so sent in." Was the notary public a proper person for taking it in? If he had been asked to take it, whether he would have assented or not, I do not know; but it would only have been to leave some document with them. And when the Lord Chancellor says, "the only way of adjudicating upon it must be to adjudicate upon what was due when the debt or claim was sent in," then I say no debt or claim was sent in this case; and it was impossible, from what was sent in, to ascertain what the amount was, or who the persons were who made the claim, or on whose behalf it was made, or who their attorneys or solicitors were. I am, therefore, of opinion that this claim was not made until after the ships were sold, and the summons must be dismissed with costs.

Re SOUTH BLACKPOOL HOTEL COMPANY; JAMES'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Debenture—Set-off.

It was provided by the articles of association of a company that a certain sum of money should be paid by way of reimbursement and remuneration to the promoter, he indemnifying the directors from all costs, charges, and expenses down to the allotment of the shares. In payment of this sum the promoter accepted seventeen debentures of the company of 100*l.* each. Instead of paying the costs, &c., included in his indemnity in full, the promoter left such costs, &c., to the amount of 208*l.* unpaid, and this amount was proved against the company, which was in liquidation:

Held, that the official liquidator was entitled to set off this amount pro ratâ on each of the debentures, though the promoter had assigned them to other persons.

This was an application by a Mr. James, who was the holder of three debentures of the South Blackpool Hotel Company for the sum of 100*l.* each, for liberty to prove against the company, which was in process of liquidation, for the amount due on the debentures. The official liquidator claimed that he was entitled to a set-off under the following circumstances:

By clause 56a. of the articles of association of the company it was provided that the sum of 1750*l.* should be paid to Mr. Carter, the promoter of the company, by way of reimbursement and remuneration to him for all costs and expenses, as well preliminary as otherwise, including the cost of advertising, printing, brokers' charges, and all other costs, charges, and expenses of whatever nature or kind soever (except law costs and charges) incurred in and about the promotion and formation of the company, he (Mr. Carter) "indemnifying the directors from all costs, damages, and expenses (except as aforesaid) down to the allotment of the shares."

The promoter accepted in payment of this sum seventeen debentures of the company of 100*l.* each and 50*l.* in cash. Three of these debentures were assigned to Mr. James after the company had been ordered to be wound-up.

The promoter had not paid all the costs covered by his indemnity; various sums, amounting to about 208*l.*, having been left unpaid, had been proved against the company in the winding-up; and the question was, whether the official liquidator was entitled to set-off this sum against the proof of the holders of the debentures.

Jessel, Q. C. and Gardiner, for Mr. James, argued that a right to damages for breach of an agreement to indemnify could not be set-off against a debt either at law or in equity. Moreover, it was not the company, but the directors, who were to be indemnified. They cited North, for the official liquidator, was not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—This is a perfectly clear case, and cases of this kind are not to be determined on technicalities, but on principles of common sense. A man is to receive 1700*l.*, indemnifying the company against certain costs and expenses. Instead of cash, he accepts seventeen debentures in payment of the amount. Then it turns out that, instead of paying the costs in full he has left 208*l.* unpaid, and that is proved against the company. I am of opinion that, upon the principle of Re Natal Investment Company (sup.), decided by Lord Cairns, the company are entitled to set-off against him and his assignees the amount of the debt proved against the company. The amount of the debt must be set off pro ratâ on each of the seventeen debentures; as the debentures are all for the same amount, one-seventeenth of the amount of the debt must be set-off against each debenture. The order will be, that proof be allowed of the debentures, deducting from each decenture one-seventeenth of the amount provable under Carter's guarantee.

FLOOD v. THE NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Specific performance—Jurisdiction—Covenant—"First-class station."

A "first-class station" means a station at which all trains other than express, mail, or special trains are in the habit of stopping.

Where, therefore, a railway company had taken land with respect to which there was a covenant existing "that the land should for ever thereafter be used as a goods depôt, and as a first-class station for taking up and setting down passengers travelling along the company's line of railway;" and the company had only allowed third-class or merely local trains to be advertised to stop at the station built on the land, and there was no goods depôt provided:

Held, that the company was bound by the covenant; and an injunction granted to restrain them from allowing the ordinary fast trains to pass the station.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff, the former owner of a piece of land which had been purchased by the North-Eastern Railway Company in the year 1838, which was subject to a covenant in the purchase-deed that the "land should be for ever thereafter used as a goods depôt, and as a first-class station for taking up and setting down passengers travelling along the company's line of railway," to have it declared that the railway company had committed a breach of this covenant, alleging that they had not performed it, inasmuch as none but third-class or merely local trains were advertised to stop at the station built upon this land, and that no sufficient accommodation had been provided for horses or carriages conveyed along the line, and that the company had not provided any depôt for goods.

The bill prayed in addition to a declaration of the breach of the covenant, that an injunction might issue to restrain the use of the land in any other manner than as a first-class station for taking up and setting down passengers, and as a depôt for goods.

The main question in the cause turned upon what was to be considered as a first-class station.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Jones-Bateman, for the plaintiff.

E. E. Kay, Q.C. and G. Williamson, for the defendants, the railway company, contended that the court had not jurisdiction to decree specific performance of such a covenant as the present. There was no negative term, express or implied, on which an injunction could be granted. That plaintiff must be left to his remedy at common law, if any such he had. That the term "first-class station" was wholly ambiguous and indefinite. That the condition of railway travelling had much altered since 1838, when the purchase of the land was made, and that there was no necessity for the stoppage of fast trains at this station. That the plaintiff had had reasonable accommodation at this station which had been provided by the company. That it was unreasonable and inequitable to expect the court to allow the whole system so long adopted by the company to be disarranged by compelling them to cause every train to stop at a small village station which the present was.

F. O. Haynes for other interested parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said it was quite clear that there had been a breach of this covenant by the defendants, the railway company, and which had been expressly stipulated for by the plaintiff's predecessor in title to the land in question, which was in existence at the time of the land being purchased by the company in 1838. He should hold that a "first-class station" had a definite meaning, which was a station at which all trains, other than express, mail, or special trains, were in the habit of stopping. The company had not only not allowed fast trains to stop at this station, but had gradually withdrawn the accommodation formerly provided by them, and therefore they had clearly committed a breach of the covenant. The case was one in which substantial relief could be given, without imposing any unnecessary or unreasonable burden on the company. The terms of the order he should make would be a declaration that the defendants, the railway company, had committed a breach of the covenant; with a reference to chambers to inquire what rooms and conveniences ought to be supplied by them for the accommodation of a first-class station, with a direction that the company should provide the same. And an injunction to restrain the company from allowing any of its ordinary fast trains, other than express, mail, or special to pass the station without stopping for the purpose of setting down and taking up passengers: with liberty to apply to the court for a relaxation of this order, should it be made to appear that sufficient accommodation was provided without stopping all the ordinary or fast trains.

BLOUNT v. WHEBLE.

Will—Construction—"Surviving."

A testator by his will gave and bequeathed three legacies of 3000l. each to his three brothers, in the words following: "I leave and bequeath to my brother Jas. W. 3000l., in trust to his surviving child or children, to my brother Robert W., 3000l. in trust to his surviving child or children; failing issue, I leave the said 3000l. to my brother William W., in trust to his surviving child or children; failing such issue, I leave the said 3000l. to my brother Daniel O. W., in trust to his surviving child or children; failing issue, I leave the said 3000l. to the children of my brother Jas. W."

Similar legacies of 3000l. each were given to the brothers Robert and Daniel, with the same phraseology as to "failing of issue, &c:"

Held, that the word "surviving" in the bequest meant surviving at the deaths of the respective fathers, and that the brothers of testator took life interests in these legacies.

The testator also devised a freehold estate (which he declared should be considered as personalty) to his executors and trustees, upon trust "for the second surviving son of my brother Jas. W., on his arriving at the age of twenty-five years, the annual rental, in the meanwhile (after all just and necessary expenses for the benefit and maintenance of the estate being deducted), to be annually divided between my surviving brothers. In failure of such second surviving son of Jas W., I leave the said estate to my brother Daniel W., and his heirs male. Failing such heirs male, I leave and bequeath the said estate to the heirs of the W. family."

Daniel died in the lifetime of testator.

E. J. W. was the second son of Jas. W.

Held, that E. J. W. was entitled in fee simple absolute to the estate, subject to a term from the death of the testator until such day as E. J. W. should attain, or but for death would attain, his age of twenty-five, which term was vested in the testator's three brothers, as tenants in common.

This was a bill filed by a surviving executor and trustee against the several parties taking interests or presumable interests under the will for the purpose of having a construction put upon portions of the will of Edmund Joseph Wheble.

Edmund Joseph Wheble, by his will dated 27th April 1861, after declaring that his estate at Hippenscombe should be deemed and taken as personal estate, devised all such estate to his executors and trustees, Daniel O'Connell Wheble, and Gilbert Robert Blount, upon trust as follows:

For the second surviving son of my brother James

Wheble on his arriving at the age of twenty-five years, the annual rental in the meanwhile (after all just and necessary expenses for the benefit and maintenance of the estate being deducted) to be annually divided between my surviving brothers. In failure of such second surviving son of James Wheble, I leave the said estate of Hippenscombe to my brother Daniel O'Connell Wheble, and his heirs male. Failing such heirs male, I leave and bequeath the said estate to the heirs of the Wheble family.

The testator also gave to the right Rev. Dr. Thomas Grant, of St. George's, Southwark, "or other the person who at the time of my death shall be officiating Roman Catholic Bishop of Southwark, 1000*l.* free of legacy duty—the entire interest thereof to be annually applied to the maintenance and support of the officiating chaplain of the Roman Catholic church of St. James', Reading, in the county of Berks," and then proceeded:

I leave and bequeath to my brother James Wheble, 3000*l.* in trust to his surviving child or children; to my brother Robert Wheble, 3000*l.* in trust to his surviving child or children; failing issue, I leave the said 3000*l.* to my brother William Wheble, in trust to his surviving child or children; failing such issue, I leave the said 3000*l.* to my brother Daniel O'Connell Wheble, in trust to his surviving child or children; failing issue, I leave the said 3000*l.* to the children of my brother James Wheble. To my brother William Wheble, 3000*l.* in trust to his child or children; failing issue, I leave the said 3000*l.* to my brother Daniel O'Connell Wheble in trust to his child or children; failing issue, to my brother Robert Wheble, in trust to his surviving child or children; failing such issue, to the surviving children of my brother James Wheble. To my brother Daniel O'Connell Wheble, 3000*l.* in trust to his surviving child or children; failing such issue, to my brother William Wheble, in trust to his surviviving child or children; failing such issue to my brother Robert Wheble in trust to his surviving child or children; failing such issue, to my brother James Wheble and his children.

Daniel O'Connell Wheble died in the testator's lifetime without having had a child.

The testator's brother James Joseph Wheble (his heir-at-law), Robert Wheble, and William Francis Wheble, and Maria Jane Wheble, and Lucy Catherine, wife of Michael Henry Blount, were his next of kin.

When the bill was filed, the brothers Robert and William Wheble had not been married. James Joseph Wheble had had seven children, of whom Ernest Joseph Wheble was the second son.

The cause now came on for a hearing.

J. Hinde Palmer, Q. C. and S. Blount for the plaintiffs.

Amphlett, Q. C., E. Fry, Q. C., Wickens, F. H. Riddell, G. Williamson, Whitehorne, and Martineau for the several parties defendants and interested under the will.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he must hold that Ernest Joseph Wheble, the second son of the testator's brother James, was entitled in fee simple absolute to the Hippenscombe Estate, subject to a term from the death of the testator until such time as the said Ernest J. Wheble should attain or but for death would attain, twenty-five years of age; and that such term vested in the testator's three brothers, Robert, William, and James, as tenants in common. There would be the usual reference to chambers, and directions to settle conveyances, if necessary. He should also declare that, as to the gifts of the several legacies of 3000*l.* each, the word "surviving" meant surviving at the deaths of the fathers of the several children, and that the fathers (the testator's brothers) were respectively entitled to life interests in those legacies. The several amounts would have to be brought into court and invested in the usual way, and the interest and dividends of 3000*l.* directed to be paid to Robert Wheble, of 3000*l.* to James Wheble, and 6000*l.* to William Wheble for life or until further order. A declaration would also be made that the 1000*l.* to Dr. Grant should abate in the proportion which the value of the impure personalty bore to the whole personal estate, and the amount of the legacy, after such abatement, directed to be paid into court to a separate account, with the usual directions as to investment and a reference to chambers as to the payment of the income arising from it.

Decree accordingly.

MARSHALL v. ROSS.

Trade mark—Word "patent"—Definition of.

The word "patent" may be used, in certain cases, although the party using it has not, in fact, obtained a patent for the manufacture of the article so said to be patented.

This was a motion in the terms of the prayer of the plaintiff's bill, to restrain the defendant, James Ross, a shipping agent, from removing or parting with certain packages of thread, in wrappers, bearing labels in imitation of the plaintiff's labels. The thread had been manufactured in Belgium, and had been consigned by the manufacturers, Messrs. Dietz and Company, to the defendant Ross in this country, for the purpose of being shipped by him to Australia. The label which the plaintiff had adopted contained the words "Marshall and Co., Shrewsbury." "Patent Thread."

The labels of the defendants were worded "Marchal; Schrewsbury." "Patent Thread." It appeared that the thread manufactured by the plaintiff was not, in fact, patented; but it was alleged and proved that the word "patent" was so used to designate a certain class of thread well known in the trade; that that term had for many years past been used by manufacturers to distinguish it from thread of a general class.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and A. G. Marten, in support of the motion, contended that it was an evident infringement of the plaintiff's trade mark, which the word "patent" implied; was deceptive in its character, and caused injury to the plaintiffs.

Davey, contra, urged that the defendant was in the present case only a simple consignee, and could not be presumed to know anything of the label in question as an imitation of the plaintiffs' label. The plaintiffs, in fact, had no right to make use of the word "patent" in reference to the character of their thread, when no patent had ever been granted in respect of it, and they therefore could not have the relief by injunction as prayed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the word "patent" might be used in such a way as not to deceive anyone, or cause a belief that the goods so called were protected by a patent. He instanced the case of "patent leather boots." In the present case the term "patent thread" had been so long used in this particular trade, that it might be said to have become a word of "art." He did not consider that there had been any such misrepresentation by the plaintiffs in using the term to prevent them from having it protected by the injunction prayed for. There must therefore be an order for the injunction as prayed.

Order accordingly.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

HART v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Accident by collision—Driver of engine seized with a fit—Pointsman turning engine on to branch line to avoid collision with express train on main line—Collision on branch line—Alteration of siding points subsequently to accident—Evidence of negligence—Number of men on engine—Liability of railway company—Subsequent alteration of rails no evidence of previous negligence.

At the Miles Platting station on the defendants' main line of railway, a few miles from Manchester, there were sidings leading from the main line of rails to coaling and engine sheds, the points of which sidings were always open on to the main line. On the day in question, an engine had, in accordance with the usual practice, been taken by the servant of the company appointed for that purpose to the coaling shed and been coaled, and was returning slowly therefrom on its way to the engine shed. In the ordinary course of things, the engine would have gone along the siding until it had passed the points of the siding leading to the engine shed, when it would have been reversed and backed over them into that shed; but at the moment that the man in charge of the engine should have reversed its action, he fell down in a fit on the footboard of the engine, which consequently proceeded on towards the main line. At this same time a down express train from Manchester, and an up express train from Rochdale were approaching the station at full speed, and the pointsman in charge of the points at the spot seeing the runaway engine, with the man lying on the floor approaching, in order to prevent its getting on to the main line, and coming into collision with either of these express trains, deliberately, as a choice of evils, turned the points so as to send it on to a branch line of railway from Ashton, which formed a junction at this station with the main line, at the platform of which branch line he knew that a train was stopping for tickets to be collected. The consequence was, that the engine ran into the stationary branch train, and the plaintiff, a second class passenger in one of the carriages of that train, received bodily injuries from the collision, for which he sued the company for compensation, on the ground of negligence, first, in not having two men on the engine while coaling, and running it from the coaling to the engine shed; and secondly, in having the points of the sidings so arranged that the engine must necessarily, in case of accident to the driver, pass on to the main line; and the fact of an alteration having since this accident been made, so that a runaway engine would pass on to a supplementary siding leading up to a "dead end," was urged as evidence of their previous negligence in this respect; it being admitted, on all hands, that the pointsman had acted with great presence of mind, and for the best under the circumstances.

A verdict with damages was found for the plaintiff, but upon a rule for a new trial on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence in the defendants fixing them with liability, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, Channell, and Cleasby, BB.), making the rule absolute, that there was no evidence of negligence in the defendants on which the verdict could be supported. First, there being nothing dangerous or attended with peculiar risk in the operation of coaling, the engines, and running them to and from the coaling and engine sheds, and it being an operation usually well performed by one man, the not employing two men to perform it was not negligence in the defendants. Secondly, the arrangement of the sidings having been used for twenty years without accident, the defendants could not be held bound to have foreseen the accident, or be held responsible for it upon its happening, nor was the subsequent alteration of the siding rails evidence of antecedent negligence on their part in that respect.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants damages in compensation for bodily injuries received by him through the negligence of the defendants whilst the plaintiff was travelling as a passenger upon their line of railway from Ashton to Manchester.

At the trial before Brett, J. and a common jury, at Liverpool, at the last spring assizes, the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—At the Miles Platting Station, on the defendants' main line of railway, a few miles from Manchester, where the accident happened, there is a junction, at which a branch line of railway leads off to Ashton, the main line running on in a straight line to Rochdale. About 400 or 500 yards from the junction, and on the Manchester side of the station, there is a siding running from a point of the main line to an engine shed, and at about 200 or 300 yards from the said point there is also a branch siding to a coaling shed. A few yards from this same point there is a signal and pointsman's box, at which the pointsman works the points, which are open towards Rochdale, so that an engine running from the siding on to the main line would, unless the points were turned, go on to the up line leading from Rochdale to Manchester; there are also points further on, on the main Rochdale line, by which a train or engine can be turned from the up to the down line, and there is communication between the signal boxes at the various points. The traffic at the station is very great, upwards of 200 passenger trains, besides goods trains, passing the station daily.

The plaintiff was travelling in a second-class carriage from Ashton to Manchester, and the train by which he was travelling was stopping for the purpose of the Manchester tickets being collected at the Miles Platting platform of the branch line from Ashton before-mentioned, and some 300 or 400 yards from the spot where the points from the sidings open on to the main line.

The coaling shed before-mentioned is the place where the engines are supplied with coal, and on the 20th Oct. an engine which had just come off a journey had, in accordance with the usual practice in such cases, been given in charge by its driver and stoker to a servant of the company, whose business it was to see to the coaling of the engines. It had been coaled by him at the coaling shed, and was slowly returning therefrom, and in the course of being taken by him from the coaling shed siding to the other siding leading to the engine shed. In the ordinary course of things, the engine after coming from the coaling shed would have gone along the siding, until it had passed the points of the siding leading to the engine shed, when it would have been reversed and backed over them into that shed, but just at the moment when the man in charge of the engine should have reversed its action, he was seized with a fit and fell across the footboard of the engine in a state of insensibility. The consequence was, that the engine, instead of being backed into the engine shed, proceeded onwards upon the siding towards the points opening on to the main line at the moment that a down express train from Manchester, and an up express train from Rochdale were approaching the station at full speed on the up and down main lines. At this juncture, the pointsman in charge of the signal box and points at the part of the line, seeing the engine, with the man lying across the footboard, approaching the main line of rails, and having but an instant in which to decide what to do, came to the conclusion that the least hazardous and dangerous course to pursue, was to turn the points of the main line, so as to send the engine on to the Ashton branch line, knowing that if any train might happen to be there it would be either slackening its speed, or at a stand still, whereas if he had let it go upon either of the main lines of rail it would infallibly have come into collision with one or the other of the before-mentioned express trains travelling at top speed, when the consequences would in all probability have been far more disastrous. Under these circumstances, therefore, the pointsman deliberately turned the runaway engine on to the Ashton branch. The result of his so doing was, that the engine ran on until it reached the spot where the train in which the plaintiff was sitting was standing as before-mentioned, and, coming into collision with it, caused the injuries to the plaintiff of which he complained in his declaration.

It appeared too that, since the accident, the defendants had altered the siding in question, so that on leaving the coaling shed the engines now run, not on the same line, but on a supplementary siding, leading to a "dead end," where a runaway engine would be brought to a standstill.

The learned judge told the jury that the liability of the defendants depended on the negligence of their servants being proved, and that it was negligence to do that which, under the circumstances, was dangerous, or to omit to do what ought to be done, but it was not negligence simply to omit to do the best under the circumstances. The question was for the jury; was there any negligence in the pointsman, or was there negligence in the defendants having only one man to coal the engine? The man had done it for years, and, but for his unforeseen and unexpected illness it would have been safely done on this occasion. The company did not know, nor was it proved, that he was liable to fits. Then as to the siding, no doubt it had been altered since the accident, but it was not negligent in them not to guard beforehand against an accident which could not reasonably have been foreseen.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 110*l.* damages, and a rule was afterwards moved for and obtained by Manisty, Q. C., on the part of the defendants, for a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence in the defendants to go to the jury, upon which liability could be fixed on them, and also that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and now

Holker, Q.C. and McConnell, for the plaintiff, showed cause against it, and contended that the verdict of the jury establishing negligence in the defendants was well warranted by the facts and evidence of the case. We do not complain of the act done by the pointsman, for probably he did the best thing which under the circumstances of the moment he could do, for had the engine been allowed to proceed as it was going it would have gone on to the main Rochdale line and came into collision with the Yorkshire express, and had he turned it on to the other main line of rail a like result would have followed with the Manchester express. The jury, however, considered there was negligence in the company, and the plaintiff says the negligence consisted in this; first, that there should have been two men employed on the engine at the coaling process. A man engaged in such a job is very liable to become affected by the sulphurous vapour arising from the burning coal. By one of their printed regulations they seem to provide against the very event of the sudden illness of a driver of an engine, by always having two men attached to the engine on a journey, and it cannot be contended that, if two men are necessary on an engine when running on the main line, they are not equally so when travelling up and down a siding, where if the engine runs away it must get upon the main line. [BRAMWELL, B.—You might almost as reasonably argue that there ought to be three men on the engine in case two should fall ill at the same moment.] The second point of negligence was in the arrangement of the siding rails, the points of which before the accident stood always open on to the main line, but which have been altered since by adding a small supplementary siding, so that an engine now running away from the coaling shed would not get upon the main line as it would previously have done, but would run on until brought up at a "dead end." This obviously shows what the defendants should have done before; the precaution is an obvious one, and the defendants as public carriers were bound to use and adopt every possible reasonable precaution against accident, and especially at so dangerous and much frequented a part of their line. [BRAMWELL, B.—It is a mistake to say that because the company are wiser now they were foolish before. KELLY, C.B.—You would say it was the duty of the railway company to anticipate every possible form of accident.] No doubt Brett, J. took a strong view at the trial against the plaintiff, but we contend that it was more, indeed that it was peculiarly, a question for them, and that the verdict was right. They cited Christie v. Griggs (2 Campb. 79) and the observations of Sir J. Mansfield, C. J.

Manisty, Q. C. and Edwards, for the defendants, contra, were not called on to support their rule.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that the defendants' rule in this case must be made absolute. The jury, no doubt, have found that the accident to the plaintiff was caused by negligence on the part of the railway company, but I think that there was no negligence at all, and I must confess that I see no evidence of any. It has been contended on the part of the plaintiff that there ought always to be two men on the engine, not only, as is the case when it is being used to pull or propel a train of carriages on the main line, but on every occasion whenever an engine is moved about on a line of rails, whether by itself or attached to carriages, so that if one of the men should happen to drop down dead, the other may be at hand at once to take his place, and thus the probability of such an accident as the present happening may be avoided. But, if it be that that is a necessary regulation in the present case, I see no reason why it should not be a necessary one in every imaginable case where a man is employed in any duty whatever about a railway. But we must use our common sense in the matter. Now, in the present instance there was nothing dangerous or attended with any peculiar risk in the duty upon which the man was occupied, although the learned counsel for the plaintiff assumed, as a matter of course, that it was an occupation very liable to produce a fit of some kind. But surely it was never heard that sickness of any kind was ever produced by it. If then this be an operation usually conducted by one man, and without any ill results arising therefrom, it would surely be a very strong thing to say that the not employing two men to perform the operation was negligence on the part of the company. There is, I think, nothing in that contention of the plaintiff. But then it has been suggested that the siding leading to the coaling shed should be so constructed that what is called a "runaway engine" could not by possibility get upon the main line. But if it must be so in one case it must be so in another. No doubt the company have altered the mode of constructing the sidings. But it is a new mode of construction, and I see no reason for saying that there is not as much danger from the one way as from the other. It is enough to say that it is new. The old plan had been adopted and used by the company for twenty years, and no accident had ever before happened; and it appears to me that it would be most unreasonable to suppose that the company could or ought to have foreseen this accident, or to hold them responsible for it upon its happening.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and am quite satisfied that this rule must be made absolute. I agree with the Lord Chief Baron and my brother Brett, and confess that I cannot see any evidence of negligence in the matter. Although I have no desire to occupy time unnecessarily, I think that there are matters of considerable importance involved in this particular case. One of them is, that people do not furnish evidence against themselves simply by adopting a new plan in order to prevent the recurrence of an accident. I think that a proposition to the contrary would be barbarous. It would be, as I have often had occasion to tell juries, to hold that, because the world gets wiser as it gets older, therefore it was foolish before. Moreover, I think that in such a case as the present, an expert, if I may so say, some scientific medical man, practically acquainted with the nature of the duty to be performed by the engine man here should have been called to inform the minds of the court and the jury as to the duty in question, and whether or not it was a dangerous one, and likely to be productive through the fumes arising from the burning coal of any attack in the nature of a fit, and that it should not have been left to the bare statement of the learned counsel. Here counsel on the one side assert that it was a very dangerous occupation, and the counsel on the other side assert the contrary. Who is to decide between them? But suppose that we were to hold that this verdict is right, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company were to do, what I think they would not be blameable for doing, viz., to publish a new and increased tariff of their rates of charge, and to say, "Whereas the Court of Exchequer have laid it down as law that two men are necessary on every engine, under all possible or conceivable circumstances, where only one man was accustomed to be employed before, therefore we have raised our fares to such and such prices, to meet the extra expense imposed on and incurred by us in complying with the decision of the court," what, I wonder, would people think of the Court of Exchequer then? But there is another point to be noticed in this case. Here it was owing to the voluntary and deliberate act of the pointsman himself that the engine went in the direction in which it did go. Mr. Holker even, on the part of the plaintiff, says that he does not blame the man for that; on the contrary, he really thinks the man exercised a wise discretion in doing what he did, and that I think is quite true. But, nevertheless, the man did it; it was his own voluntary and wilful act; and, if the truth must be spoken, I cannot see what answer he would have had if an action had been brought against him. He might say, and no doubt with extreme truth, "it is a very hard case, I did the best I could, and my duty," and no doubt it would be a very hard case; but the plaintiff might also truly say, "I cannot help that, you ran over me, and hurt me very seriously." Take the case of a man driving a carriage through a street, and, to avoid a certain accident, he turns a little out of his course and drives over A. and inflicts upon him serious injuries, surely A. might say to him, "Why did you select me as the object to be driven over?" Then it is said that people are responsible for the acts of their servants. Here I doubt very much whether the pointsman had not the authority of the company for what he did, for he was not only doing the best he could to avoid an accident, but the best probably for the property of his employers, as the result of a collision on the main line with the coming express train then just due, had the engine been permitted to pursue its course on that line, would, in all human probability, have been attended with infinitely more serious results. I have thought it right to mention these points, for peradventure the case may go farther, and I think there is a point upon it in the plaintiff's favour, though it has not been discussed. But the present rule must be made absolute, on the ground that the verdict is against, or rather without, evidence.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the verdict can be supported. I think the pointsman was justified in turning the points in the way he did, and that the railway company are not bound to warrant that the men employed by them on their engines shall be free from attacks of illness. With regard to the branch siding and its alteration since the accident, it is not because the defendants have become wiser and done something subsequently to the accident that their doing so is to be evidence of any antecedent negligence on their part in that respect.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. In all these cases we are bound to look at the proximate cause of the accident; and, if that is found, we cannot in general go beyond it. No doubt it is a very hard case for the plaintiff, sitting quietly and lawfully as he was in his proper place in the railway carriage, that the points should be deliberately turned so as to send the engine down straight upon him; but so it is. That act was the voluntary act of the pointsman himself, and was, as is admitted on all hands, the best thing that could be done under the circumstances; and I have grave doubts whether the company could be held responsible for an injury proximately caused by such an act of their servant done under such circumstances. As to the other question, namely, that the company have, by subsequently altering the sidings, made some evidence against themselves of previous negligence, I agree with my Lord and my learned brother that that is not so.

Rule absolute.

REG v. CASBOLT.

Night poaching—Limitation of proceedings—9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 4.

J. C. was indicted for night poaching on the 6th Feb. 1868. He pleaded guilty, but subsequently applied by his counsel for leave to withdraw the plea, and to move in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the pro- ceedings against him had not been commenced within twelve calendar months, as directed by the 4th section of 9 Geo. 4, c, 69:

Held, per Byles, J., that the application to withdraw the plea was one which ought to be granted, and that as no warrant and information was produced showing that proceedings had been commenced within twelve months, that the objection was fatal.

Quære, at what time during the trial ought such an objection to be taken.

The prisoner, James Casbolt, who, when taken into custody, was in the Metropolitan police, pleaded guilty to an indictment, under 9 Geo. 4, charging him with night poaching on 6th Feb. 1863. A bill had been sent up for an attempt to murder the gamekeeper, James Tikbrooke, but was thrown out by the grand jury, a true bill being found for night poaching.

Mills for the prosecution.

Naylor for the defence.

Naylor applied for leave for the prisoner to withdraw his plea of guilty, in order that he might move an arrest of judgment upon the ground that no proceedings had been taken within twelve calendar months, as directed by sect. 4 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 69. He quoted

Reg. v. Kilminster, 7 C. & P. 228.

Mills, contra, quoted Reg. v. Austin, 1 C. & K. 621. [Byles, J.—That does not help you.] The prisoner was apprehended on the 19th July 1869, on the original warrant granted in 1863. [Byles, J.—Was that warrant served on the prisoner within twelve months of the commission of the original offence?] No.

Naylor.—It is not only necessary that the warrant should be served, but the information sworn.

Mills.—No notice has been given of this application. The prisoner was included in the original information.

Byles, J.—Where is the original indictment?

The Clerk of the Assize.—At London.

Byles, J.—There is no evidence of any prosecution having been commenced except the finding of the indictment yesterday.

Mills.—Unfortunately through the prisoner pleading guilty we had no chance of giving evidence. Perhaps your Lordship will reserve the point for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved? [Byles, J.—No.] If there was an adjournment I could produce evidence. [Byles, J.—I rather think, from circumstances which have come to my knowledge, that this defence is not contrary to the ends of public justice. I shall give the prisoner an opportunity of withdrawing his plea.] The point to be decided was whether the warrant being obtained was not the commencement of the proceedings.

Byles, J.—The answer to that is that it is not, unless it is served. The case of Reg v. Hull, 2 F. & F. 16, is exactly in point.

Naylor.—The warrant contained no reference to night poaching at all.

Mills.—The shooting at Tikbrooke was part of the occurrence.

Byles, J.—I will look over the cases and hear further arguments to morrow morning.

July 31.—Mills.—This is a motion in arrest of judgment.

Naylor.—No; it is for permission to withdraw a plea.

Mills.—It is in arrest of judgment. [Byles, J.—Even if that were so, I should allow the prisoner to withdraw his plea to meet the real merits of the case. My impression is, that it is a good defence upon the general issue.] Mills.—We had no notice of this motion, and, therefore, when the prisoner pleaded guilty, sent all our witnesses away, and it is impossible to get them here. [Byles, J.—If you had no witnesses you might be prepared to meet this case. This is a case in which the point now before us is documentary. What is wanted, is the warrant and indictment.]

Naylor.—And the information.

Mills.—I can produce the warrant, but not the information, that is at Saffron Walden. [The warrant was produced.]

Byles, J.—This is a warrant for felonious shooting; it is for a different offence. This is not the offence with which the prisoner is charged.

Mills.—The question was, did not the present charge arise out of the offence alleged in the warrant? [Byles, J.—This warrant clearly does not show the prosecution commenced at the right time.]

Mills quoted in supported of his view,
Reg. v. Brooks, 2 C. & K. 402;
Reg. v. Austin, 1 C. & K. 621.

Naylor relied on
Reg. v. Hull, 2 F. & F. 16:
Reg. v. Parker, 33 L. J. 135, M. C.

Byles, J.—It is no use going into this case; the offence was committed six years ago. I am of opinion that this is a good defence both on principle and authority; upon principle, because the statute says that the criminal proceedings must be commenced within a certain date—twelve months. I have no information here that any criminal proceedings for this offence were commenced within twelve months; on the contrary, as far as I can judge from the warrant which has been produced it was for a different offence. We may fairly assume that the information, if there was one, was for the same offence as that stated on the warrant. The information is not produced, therefore we may draw any inference. With respect to the time when this objection was taken, in the cases cited, I do not know, but suppose at the same period as has been taken in this case. That being so, and the prosecution being too late, I have in one sense no jurisdiction to try the prisoner, and must direct the jury that there is no evidence to find the prisoner guilty, and as there are only two courses open to them, their duty will be to find him not guilty.

The jury was then sworn, the prisoner given in charge, and he was found not guilty.

Election Petitions.

THE COUNTY OF NORFOLK (NORTHERN DIVISION).

Coalition by candidates—Agency—Undue influence—By landlords in turning out tenants—By employers in dismissing servants—Threat to withdraw custom—Question of degree—Treating—Employment of persons guilty of corrupt practices—31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 s. 44—Evidence.

There being a coalition between candidates, the agent of one becomes the agent of the other; and if a corrupt act is brought home to the one, both are unable to hold their seats. But personal corruption must be proved against each individually: the proof personally against the one does not prove it personally against the other.

Doing or threatening violence to an elector to induce him to vote or refrain from voting, vitiates the election, although done by an agent only. And if that is done which a man has a perfect right to do, but with a view to influence a vote, it is intimidation. Ex. gr. if a landlord threatens to turn out, or does turn out a tenant for his vote, that is inflicting harm or loss within the statute.

An employer who dismisses his servant on account of his vote is also guilty of undue influence.

Whether the withdrawal of custom from a tradesman, or a threat to withdraw it, amounts to undue influence is a question of degree.

Semble, where the loss proposed to be inflicted in this way would seriously affect the saleable value of the goodwill of a business, it would be such a loss as is contemplated by the statute.

The loss must be so serious that a judge could direct a jury in a criminal court that a person threatening to inflict or inflicting it was guilty of a misdemeanor.

A threat to exercise undue influence must be deliberately uttered with the intention to carry it into effect, and not in a moment of anger; whilst the loss to be inflicted must not be too remote.

An act of treating under sect. 23 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, does not affect the election. If it comes within the 4th section it will affect the election. But the candidate will be responsible if he is in any way accessory to the giving or providing of refreshment corruptly, i. e., with the view of influencing votes at the election then pending.

The question whether the intention was to influence votes must depend upon the circumstances and the manner in which the refreshment was given, the time when it was done, and very much upon the nature of the entertainment.

The difference between the giving of meat and the giving of drink considered.

There is no law which prohibits the giving of feasts to electors after the election. The authority of a person requested to canvass, and so made an agent, ceases with the election; and, unless there is something to show continuing authority, that person could not, by giving a feast ten days after the election, upset that election.

The 44th sect. of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, says that if any candidate is proved to have personally engaged as a canvasser or agent for the management of his election any person, knowing that such person within seven years previous to such engagement has been found guilty of corrupt practices, the election shall be void:

Held, that it is enough if such a person is engaged with the candidate's knowledge.

Held further, that the statute is not confined to paid agents, but the person engaged must be an agent for the management of at least part of the election.

P. was scheduled by Bribery Commissioners within seven years, and acted in a way which would have made him an agent for the purpose of affecting the seats of the candidates by ordinary corrupt practices. The candidates, however, both denied any knowledge that he was in the schedule, or that he was acting as the chairman of a certain ward committee. There was no evidence that either candidate had wilfully shut his eyes to the engagement of P., and it was Held, that the engagement did not affect the election.

This was a petition against the return of Sir E. Lacon and Major Walpole. There was a novel allegation, that the respondents had engaged a person who within seven years had been found guilty of corrupt practices. All the material points are noticed in the judgment.

Counsel for the petitioners, Ballantine, Serjt., and Blofeild.

For the respondents, Rodwell, Q. C. and O'Malley, Q. C.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is to be observed, first, that the petition is against both the sitting members. In ordinary cases the seat of each member would be dependent upon himself alone, unless there was something to show that the two members had made common cause. As a general rule, in election matters it is not merely what the candidate himself does, but also what he does by his agents, which avoids the election, even though the agent has gone much further than was intended by the candidate. It is a general rule in election matters that if the agent does a corrupt act, though quite unintended upon the part of the candidate, it will vacate the seat. I have not had much opportunity of reading the different judgments delivered by different judges; but since I have had the opportunity of considering them, I find, as far as personal observation enables me to say, that they have all agreed very closely on what is the law on these different matters, though of course the difficulty is to apply the law to the facts in the different cases. Upon this particular matter about agency, I find the Scotch judge (Lord Barcaple), in the Greenock case, lays down the rule in exactly the same way as I should myself lay it down. I cite what is laid down by a Scotch judge, as showing that a Scotch lawyer has come to exactly the same conclusion as the English judges have come to; and I prefer taking it in his words rather than my own. He says, talking of agency, "I think that there are three principles applicable to three kinds of matters. There is, first of all, the strictest of all principles, that which is applicable to a criminal charge; and there you are responsible for nothing at all except your own individual guilt. That is a thing consistent with ordinary common sense. There is, then, the principle that is applicable to actions of a civil kind, raised against a party on the ground of a wrong done, and in which it was proved that the wrong was done by the defender's agent, that is to say, a person employed by the defender while he was doing the thing which he was employed to do. But there comes in the principle that he was employed to do the particular work, and that he was not employed to do the wrong. Then there is the third class of cases, with which we are at present engaged, where, in these election petitions, it being proved that a candidate is having his election carried on by a committee, or by certain canvassers, those canvassers do something which, if the candidate is responsible for it, will invalidate the election, and it is held that he is responsible for it in the sense of making the validity of the election depend upon it. I do not see how these election petitions would be of the least use otherwise, because I suppose that there are very few candidates indeed who undertake the practice of corruption with their own hand. I presume there are equally few candidates, or very nearly so, who ever say to their agents that they are to proceed corruptly in the matter." That is the passage at page 97 in the Blue Book which I am quoting from, in which Lord Barcaple lays down three classes, and points out where agency in an election petition differs from agency in other matters. He does not say, and he has no occasion there to say, what constitutes agency, which is a difficult question, and upon which, where it becomes necessary to inquire into it in the present inquiry, I will make any observations that occur to me as material. Now, that being so, we have to see was there any corrupt act practised by the agent of the sitting members, either or both? It happens that in this case Major Walpole and Sir Edmund Lacon have stood jointly; they have chosen to what we commonly call coalesce. They united in a canvass, and in fact have made each an agent of the other, and they have chosen to stand or fall together; consequently, if any corrupt act is shown to be done by an agent appointed by one member, it will affect both. Such are the consequences of a coalition. A candidate is not only responsible for his own individual agent, but, having made a coalition, he becomes responsible for the acts of the agent of the other candidate with whom he has coalesced. Major Walpole, therefore, as far as those matters are concerned, is exactly in the same position as Sir Edmund Lacon. If a corrupt act is brought home to the one, both are unable to hold their seats. There is, however, another point in the petition that is included here namely, the new enactment, which says that wherever a member employs, "personally engages" is the phrase that is used, a person who has been scheduled or declared guilty of corrupt practices, then he has done that which defeats his seat; the Act (whether wisely or unwisely it is not for me to consider) has pointedly and markedly said that that shall be proved against the member personally; by which I understood it to mean, proved, as in that first class where Lord Barcaple says, as in criminal cases, a person is responsible for his own individual guilt and not otherwise, it must be proved to that extent. That being the case upon that head of the inquiry, necessarily and essentially the two members stand quite in separate positions; it must be proved against either of them personally. The proof personally against the one does not prove it personally against the other; so that so far as that is concerned, their cases are necessarily separate. The first class of cases brought forward in the evidence, which I will take first, are those which it is said proved that there had been undue influence exercised by agents, for whom the members are responsible. That offence of undue influence is created and defined by the statute, the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, sect. 5; and the only part which I have to consider here, is the first part: "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote, or refrain from voting"—then come some other points which I will not read—"shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and in Scotland an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of 50*l*." Now, the first thing to consider is, what is the true meaning and construction of that Act. I think there can be no doubt when you look at the earlier part of it, which I have already read, that it is meant and intended to say, that where there is any force, violence, or restraint, or any threat of injury, or any injury, those are cases which of course would embrace all the cases where a wrongful act is threatened; but I do not think the Act is at all confined to that. I feel no doubt at all where a person, in order to prevent another from voting, or to force him to vote, either beats him or threatens injury to his person, or breaks the windows of his house, or threatens injury to his house, or the like, that is what is here called undue influence. But I do not think it is confined to that; where such a thing is done, and it is brought home to the agent, it avoids, according to my view, the election. Just immediately before I came down here, in the case of Stafford, I was obliged very much against my will to put that doctrine in force, when I was convinced that Mr. Pochin, the sitting member, had come down to a very corrupt borough, and had, by a sort of direction on his part, prevented corruption upon his side, and hindered the other side in consequence from exercising corruption to any great extent, and in fact saved the borough from a commission. Of course I thought it highly meritorious upon the part of Mr. Pochin, and I was very sorry to have to decide as I did, but it was proved to my satisfaction that an agent of his, a man he had employed, a paid agent, did hound on a mob to beat and molest people on the day of the election so as to terrify men from coming to vote. I could not, according to the rule of law which has been laid down, say that because Mr. Pochin had been a meritorious man I would preserve his seat, and I was obliged to come to the conclusion that he had by his agents been guilty of undue influence, and consequently I had to unseat him. That was a case where the injury was a wrongful and violent injury. But I think the section is not at all confined to that. It goes on to say, if he shall inflict, or threaten to inflict, by himself, or by or through any other person, any injury, damage, harm, or loss. In another manner that is intimidation. I think that harm or loss is not confined to these cases; I think it would apply to cases where, though a person has a perfect right to do it, if he does not do it with the motive of affecting the vote, yet the doing of it does inflict harm upon the other side. I take it that where a tenant who holds his land from year to year, to whom consequently the landlord can at any time give six months' notice to quit, the landlord has a perfect right to choose his tenant and turn him out; but if the landlord threatens to inflict, or does inflict, that turning out of his tenant for his vote, that is inflicting harm or loss within the meaning of the Act; and I think that sort of thing was intended to be struck at by the statute. So, again, where a person employs a servant, and the servant is continuing in his employment, and would in all probability continue in his employment in the ordinary course of things, the master of course may dismiss his servant at pleasure, giving him proper notice; he may dismiss him and change him at pleasure, and therefore he commits no wrong in so doing, but there again, if he does it on account of the vote, and for the purpose of coercing the voter, the statute intends, I think, to make that an infliction of loss which was to be punished, and punished severely. That has been acted on on more occasions than one. In the case of the Westbury election, to which I referred in the course of Mr. O'Malley's address, where it was proved that a manufacturer who had exercised coercion of that sort on a large scale in order to force his workpeople to vote, it was held, and I think it was held most undoubtedly properly, that that was an infliction of damage or loss which, being proved to be done by an agent, vacated the seat. Other cases there have been something similar to that. In some of the towns in the north, Blackburn and Oldham, where something similar was ruled, it was clearly enough held, and I think rightly held, that though the loss and harm to be done to the man is not an illegal harm, not a matter that would be a crime, like beating the man or destroying his property, yet, if it be a loss inflicted for that purpose it is brought within the statute. Then I come to other matters which are not quite so clear upon the construction of the statute, what you may call a precarious loss. For instance, if a person who is in the habit at intervals of frequenting a shop and giving the tradesman some custom, were to choose no longer to be giving that custom, but to go elsewhere, if he chose to threaten to take away that custom and go elsewhere, is that a loss or not? It seems to me to be a good deal a question of degree. Acting on the same principle which I have been pointing out, I cannot but think, where the loss which is proposed to be inflicted in this way is, I may say, to such an extent and in such a way as would seriously affect the saleable value of the goodwill of a man's business, it would clearly be a loss; but such a trifle as that of a lady looking at a box of ribbons, and upon learning that the man was a Whig or a Tory, leaving the room and not buying, would be such a trifling thing that it could hardly be acted upon. I must weigh the matter as a question of degree, and see whether it is serious or not, for it is not to be forgotten that this section enacts that the offence shall be a misdemeanor, and shall be one which if it is made out shall subject the offender to fine and imprisonment; and I ought, therefore, in construing the statute, to remember that it is intended that such an infliction of loss, or such a threatening of infliction of loss, must be so serious that one could direct a jury in a criminal court to find that a person was guilty of misdemeanor. I cannot help thinking when you are looking at the principle of construction, that it must be taken in that way; if the loss where it comes to be this precarious loss (which expresses my idea perhaps as well as any other phrase), where it comes to be the loss of this chance, such as it would be in the case of a shopkeeper, it must be made out that it is done to a serious extent; and recollecting that to be so, you must see whether or not it is so made out. Then when one comes to see whether the thing is proved or not, of course the very essence of it all is, that it should be done on account of the vote. If there was an actual injury actually done, by the landlord dismissing or turning away his tenant, then of course the only question would be, was that done on account of the election; that is, as I have said, was it inflicted on account of his vote or not? Therefore, it would always come to be a question, more or less, of evidence, and no doubt the scale on which it was done would be an important thing to consider. If immediately after the election a landlord dismissed fifty or sixty tenants who had all voted against him, I do not mean to say the thing would not be capable of being explained, and it might be shown that it was not done upon that ground, but that there were very good reasons for turning them out. In many such cases, where primâ facie it appeared as if there had been an act of coercion, they have been capable of explanation. I think that was the case at the Tamworth election, where a great deal was made of Sir Robert Peel, or his land steward, immediately after the election, having given notice to quit to, I think, about twenty cottagers, of whom two or three had voted against him, and no doubt that fact required explanation. My brother Willes, who tried that case, took, as far as I can understand it, exactly the view of the law which I laid down just now, and I think, as far as I am aware, there has never been any difference of opinion among any of the judges as to the law. He took exactly that view, and inquired into and was satisfied upon the evidence that, though this act of evicting the tenants had taken place, yet it had nothing whatever to do with the election. He was satisfied that for some purpose—I think, if I remember, for improving the estate—it was intended to pull down the cottages before the election came on. The cottages were pulled down because of that intention, and that being so, of course it was held that there was no undue influence exercised. It would be monstrous if it were laid down that a landlord was obliged to keep on a tenant to whom he would otherwise give notice to quit, or that a master should be obliged to keep his servant whom he would otherwise send away, merely because he had voted against him; it must be shown that it was done on account of the election. Wherever an injury has been actually inflicted, wherever a thing is done which, for this purpose, would be a loss actually inflicted upon the tenant who has been turned out, or where a servant has been discharged, or the like, the proof is comparatively easy; but when it comes to be that he was merely threatened to go (which is equally within the statute), where a threat has been made, or what is supposed to be a threat, and not acted upon, the point is very much more difficult to determine. But I need hardly point out that in any such case it becomes a question always, more or less, whether or no the threat was a real threat. I think where a person, in a time of great excitement, uses what the Americans call "tall talk"—where an angry man says something that would apparently amount to a threat—in such a case, for instance, as one of the witnesses referred to when he said (I do not know whether he was using a Norfolk phrase or not) that Mr. Postle, in a time of excitement, was very "lavish" in his talk. I do not think that such a thing as that—an angry word spoken in that way, and not intended to be acted on, an angry thing, probably forgotten as soon as said—would amount to a threat at all. Of course it all comes to the question of fact; was this a serious and deliberate threat, meant to affect the vote (though perhaps repented of, and not afterwards acted upon), or merely angry words, not meaning anything? It always must be very difficult to satisfy the minds of those who have to decide the fact, whether the threat, which is not acted on afterwards, be a real threat or not. But when it comes to be a case of what I have called precarious benefit, arising from being a customer or the like, I think there, also, you ought to see tolerably well that the matter is made out to such an extent that you might, if the indictment were laid before a jury, fairly and properly leave it to the jury as a criminal matter, and direct the jury to find the prisoner guilty. In such a case as this I think the legal maxim, de minimis non curat lex, does to a considerable extent apply; and in seeing whether or no there is undue influence from a threat of some loss, you ought to see whether the loss is really considerable or not, and you ought also to see that the loss is not what a lawyer would call too remote. I will explain what I mean by reference to what occurred here. It appears in the evidence in this case that Postle, one of the persons who was complained of, was very angry with a man who had, as he, Mr. Postle thought, promised him that he would not vote at all, and he found afterwards that the man was going to vote the other way. Mr. Postle, no doubt, perfectly and sincerely, thinks he was angry at what he considered a breach of faith, not angry at his intention to vote for Wodehouse and Gordon, but angry at his breach of promise in not standing neutral. As I said before, I have no doubt Postle persuaded himself that that was the cause of his anger: but I must take the liberty of assuming, if the man had broken his word by promising to stand neutral, and had then gone and voted for Walpole and Lacon, Mr. Postle would not have been angry. I cannot doubt that his real anger was because the man was going against him. But in this case, Postle, remembering during his angry words that the man had told him when they were friends before, that if, two or three years hence, when the young lady upon the coming of age of whom the sale of the property depended, the land should be sold, and if the land went at a tolerably low rate, he would like to buy the reversion and become his own landlord—Postle, suddenly remembering this, says in his rage and anger (he agreed he did say so), "When that comes to be done, I can buy it over your head, or, if I am dead, my son can do it for me," or some phrase of that kind. If that was said, was that a threat to inflict loss, which I am to treat as a misdemeanor, and which was to void the election? I have already said I think the loss must not be too remote; and if I were to come to the conclusion that Mr. Postle seriously and truly meant to do this little piece of long-lived spite which in a moment of anger he said he would do, I cannot think that it would come within the meaning of the statute. But to do justice to Mr. Postle, I have no doubt that as soon as his anger had cooled, before he went to bed, and certainly after he had slept upon it, he would as soon have cut off his little finger as have done it; it was merely a piece of what the witness called "lavish talk," rather than a threat seriously affecting the election. I have said thus much on what does amount to undue influence, which to a great extent disposes of the cases under that head which were brought forward, and which were but few. [Having referred to these, his Lordship proceeded:] But we now come to a much more serious part of the case, namely treating; as to which the difficulty I find is very considerable indeed, in determining for myself what are the inferences I ought to draw, and what is the idea and intention which would make the treating a corrupt act under the statute. Corrupt treating is a different thing altogether from what I have just been speaking about, namely, undue influence. It always was the law, and is the law still, that when a man is directly induced to give his vote by meat or drink, it is just as much bribery as anything else. If a man sells his vote for a mess of pottage it is just as much bribery as if he sold his vote for the money which the mess of pottage was worth. That always was the law, and still is. But then there was a habit of giving the meat and drink for the purpose rather of keeping people to their colours, to keep them steady; and that had become excessively common centuries ago. When it was first endeavoured to be checked, I think the House of Commons endeavoured to check it far more with the desire of keeping down the expense of elections, and saving candidates heavy expense, than anything else; but by degrees they have more and more considered the extent to which this treating would corrupt the constituency; and finally, we have an Act of Parliament, the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, the 4th section of which is the one that governs the matter. But before coming to that 4th section I will mention the 23rd section, the mention of which now will clear the way, and relieve me from a great deal of after-matter. There was a very common belief that, at election times, upon the nomination-day, and day of polling, where men had come to attend the nomination, or to attend the polling, they had a fair claim to have something given them for refreshment, and it was a very general practice indeed to give it them; and whether or no it was an illegal practice was a matter upon which committees of the House of Commons entertained different opinions. One of the witnesses here, Mr. Beck, in mentioning that he had done that very thing, said, fairly and frankly, that he thought he had a perfect right to do it; and had done it before, and would do it again. He did not stand singular in that respect; a great many have thought so; but in the 17 & 18 Vict. (the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act), the Legislature thought it necessary to stop it; and here is the enactment which they thought fit to put in. It states, "And whereas doubts have also arisen as to whether the giving of refreshment to voters on the day of nomination or day of polling be or be not according to law, and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed, be it declared and enacted that the giving, or causing to be given, to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled, or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment, by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40*s.* for each offence, to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit." It is obvious, upon reading that, that the Legislature say distinctly that this shall be illegal; but they do not say it shall be a corrupt act, the doing of which shall avoid the election; they thought it was not like bribing or the like. They did not think it was so bad as to say that the election should be void if such an act were done; but they said it is a mischievous practice, we forbid it; and if any person, not only a candidate or a candidate's agent, but if any person gives meat or drink on account of attending on the nomination day, or on account of polling, or on account of having polled, or being about to poll, it shall be an illegal act. Then they thought that they had devised a remedy to prevent it being done by the subsequent part of the section which enacts that persons so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40*s.* for each person receiving the same. I should have thought that that would have been an efficient remedy. There were a considerable number of attorneys in London who used to make a trade, which, I am happy to say, is a good deal hindered now, by getting up actions for the sake of costs; there are many men I could name, men whom my brother Ballantine and Mr. Rodwell know, too, who used to get up actions for the purpose of getting their costs in actions for 40*s.* damages against poor people, out of whom it was difficult to screw the amount, except by selling them up. If I had been asked if this were an efficient remedy I should have said, "Yes; Mr. So-and-So is pretty sure, for the sake of his 40*s.*, to come down and sue, and he will carry out the intention of the Legislature; not that he cares about that intention, but in order to get his 40*s.* and costs of suit." But fifteen years have elapsed, and nobody has done so, and, as the Act expires this session, it is not very likely that anybody will do it, though perhaps they may think there is a good crop to be made here. I do not know how that may be, but I do not think it likely. Therefore, if the Legislature, in considering the matter, desires that the practice of giving refreshment should be stopped, they will have to devise some penalty which shall effectually carry out their intention But, though they made it illegal, the statute does not in the slightest degree touch its effect upon the result. You may, by giving money for refreshment upon the polling day, subject yourself to a penalty of 40*s.*, and it may be bribery if it is given for the vote, or treating if with the intention, and bribery or treating, none the more and none the less, because it comes within the 23rd section. Then comes the section which governs the matter, and which we have to consider, and that is the 4th section, which says, "every candidate at an election who shall corruptly." Now I may stop at that and say, that I believe all the judges have considered that the word "corruptly" governs the whole, and that that means, with the object and intention of doing that thing which the statute intended to forbid. What that is I will see presently. It does not mean corrupt in the sense that you may look upon a man as a knave or a villain, but that it is to be shown that he was meaning to do that thing which the statute forbids. The section proceeds, "who shall corruptly, by himself, or by or with any other person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating," which is not made a misdemeanor but merely made subject to a penalty. Upon the construction of that statute, I think, as far as I can observe by looking through the judgments of the Judges who have sat upon these election inquiries, we have had no difference of opinion at all; I believe every judge has come to the same conclusion, that it is essential that the candidate should be mixed up in it, because the statute only makes it an offence in the candidate. The candidate must do it, but he need not do it with his own money or by himself personally, if he shall be in any way accessory to the giving or providing; and consequently if the candidate's agent, for whom he is responsible as agent, does give the meat and drink, that has, as far as the avoiding the election goes, the same effect as the candidate giving it. But then comes that which governs the whole; does he do it in order to be elected, or for the purpose of "corruptly," that is corruptly according to the intention of the statute "influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote?" That governs the whole, and that, I take it, is the key-note of the statute. Then we are to see was it done with that object; was the purpose that which the statute defined; that is to say, was the giving of the meat and drink with the intention of influencing the voters at this particular election? I take it that, influencing the voters to give their votes, means at the election then pending; and it comes to be a question then whether or no that intention is made out as a matter of fact. As I have already said, I think every judge who has dealt with these matters, has agreed completely with what I am now saying. The words may have varied; different judges may have used different words, but the meaning has been always the same. If I were directing a jury, I would say, "You, gentlemen of the jury, are to say whether or no, in point of fact, this meat and drink was given with the intention of influencing the voters at this election, assuming it to be given by the agent of the candidate; if so, you will find that it is corrupt treating." Unfortunately I have not a jury to leave it to; if I had, my task would be at an end. It is a very difficult thing to say in each particular case, whether or no that intention is made out. It must be a question of degree more or less in every case. I can only say upon that, as I have said several times before, that the question what is the intention of people must be inferred from the whole of their acts. As a good canon of the law of evidence, a man must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his act. If a man does a thing from which natural consequences ensue, we must say that he intended the consequences of his act. If a man in his sober senses stabs another with a knife, we must suppose that he intends to do him grievous bodily harm. The canon of evidence is, that where an act would have a certain natural consequence, and a rational man does it, you must suppose that he intended the consequences of his act. That being so in the present case, the fact whether or no the giving of meat or drink was intended to influence the votes, must depend upon the circumstances and the manner in which it was given, the time when it was done, and very much upon the nature of the entertainment which was given. And here I must remark upon one fact which has a great bearing upon the present election; that is, that there is a very great difference between meat and drink, although the statute makes no difference at all as to the law of the matter. If meat be given with the intention of influencing the voters, it is as bad as if drink be given. But when we come to the question of fact as to what was the intention, that becomes to my mind excessively different. No doubt a man may be influenced as to his vote by giving him a sandwich to eat, and, on the other hand, a man may be made extremely drunk without influencing his vote. But when we come to look at the probability of what a man intended, there is a very great difference indeed; and then the question of whether it was meat or drink becomes an important question, I think, though it has been truly said by some of the judges, that the statute makes no difference if once the intent is established, whether it is a thimbleful of drink given with the intent of inducing a voter to vote at the election, or whether it is a hogshead; nevertheless, upon the same principle of reasoning, when you come to look at the intention, that quantiiy is of very considerable importance. It seems to me that it is difficult to suppose that any person would throw open public-houses to voters, and make them all drunk, without intending to influence their votes, and whether a man gives them a small quantity of drink, it is a different matter. It comes to a matter of degree and extent; and we have leave to consider whether or not it is intended to produce the effect contemplated. Now I must say a few words about the particulars in this case. I feel quite satisfied, from the evidence here, that there has been a very general practice (it is highly probable that it was adopted also on the other side, although it not being material it has not been entered into) of farmers or clergymen, and the clergy in this case where the Church was supposed to be in question, naturally enough took a considerable part in the election, arranging with their neighbours to meet at such and such a place where a conveyance was to be ready to take them to the poll; and when they came to the place there would be breakfast for them. Sometimes the time at which the breakfast would be ready would be mentioned before, and sometimes the breakfast was there without having been mentioned at all; but breakfast was given on such occasions pretty generally. Whether it was a universal practice I cannot say, and I do not much doubt that in a very large number of these cases it would be illegal within the 23rd section, because the men were going to the poll. It does not at all necessarily follow that it would be so, although I think in a great many cates it would be so. But assuming that all these people were agents, when one comes to look whether or not they were not agents, I can hardly come to the conclusion that as regards any of these clergymen who have been mentioned as giving a small breakfast in that way (I put an emphasis upon the word "small," because the extent and degree is an important matter), even if they were proved to be agents, it could fairly and properly be said that it was done by them with the intention of influencing voters. It was given incidentally in the course of their bringing the voters to the poll, and it would probably subject them to a 40*s.* penalty; but I do not think I could treat them as giving them entertainments in order to influence voters, even if they were agents in all cases. Then there comes a further class of cases, with regard to which I stopped counsel from commenting upon them, but I must render the reason why I did so. It appears that in a very considerable number of cases after the election was over, in some cases a day or two afterwards, and in some cases two or three weeks after the election was over, some landed proprietor, some squire or large farmer gave a dinner to his tenants and people around him, celebrating the victory their side had obtained; and he naturally enough might be expected not to invite those who had voted on the other side; with rare exceptions those people invited their own side. Now I have already said, in pointing to the words of the statute, that it says that it is necessary, in order to make it treating within the 4th section, that it should be given by the candidate, or that the candidate should by his agents be accessory to the treating; and though the statute in express terms says if given after the election it shall be just the same as before, yet nevertheless when given after the election it must be given by the candidate or somebody who still continues to be connected with the candidate. Now the agency at the election, which was solely from the canvassing before the election, expires with the election. Whether or no a person who had been requested to canvass would be an agent whose misconduct would avoid the election, would depend upon the evidence; but unless there is something to show continuing authority, that person could not, if he had given a feast ten days after the election, by that act upset the election. I have no doubt that most of these feasts, though not all of them, which were given after the election, were connected with the election; I have no doubt that the motive in the mind of the giver was connected with there having been an election. The intention was not to induce the electors to vote, because their votes had been already given; but no doubt these dinners, if you would come to the real motive of their being given, were given with the view to increase the influence of the squire who gave them; he gave the meat and drink with the intent of increasing his influence over his tenants and others who would be voters at any future election. No dout that was the real motive with which these dinners were given; whether it be a right motive or a wrong one, whether it be a wise or a foolish thing to do, I have nothing to do with. All I have to do with is, that as yet no statute whatever has struck at it. If it is thought, as it may be thought, that such things ought to be prohibited, the Legislature must say that they intend to prohibit them; and, as I said before, they had better, with the experience which they have had of the working of the 23rd section, devise some remedy by which it can be enforced better than merely by subjecting the offender to some penalty. At present I only say that those things are not struck at, and are consequently out of the question, in considering this case. [His Lordship then dealt with particular cases of treating and bribery, and then said.] Now, I come at last (and that concludes the whole matter) to the point that arises upon the enactment in the new statue which for the first time is now attempted to be put in operation, and consequently I am the first person, I believe, who judicially expresses any opinion upon its construction. That enactment, the 44th section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, is as follows: "If on the trial of any election petition under this Act any candidate is proved to have personally engaged at the election to which such petition relates as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election, any person knowing that such person has, within seven years previous to such engagement, been found guilty of any corrupt practice by any competent legal tribunal, or been reported guilty of any corrupt practice by a committee of the House of Commons, or by the report of the judge upon an election petition under this Act, or by the report of commissioners appointed in pursuance of the Act of the session of the 15th and 16th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chap. 57, the election of such candidate shall be void." That is the section we have to deal with; in the first place, it is to be observed that the Legislature, probably from thinking that otherwise there would be such very great danger of elections being upset upon matters that should not bring about that result, have carefully confined the operation of the enactment to the candidate having personally engaged. In the passage I quoted from Lord Barcaple's judgment, where he is dwelling upon the different kinds of agency, the first class of cases to which he refers are those where, in order to prove a man guilty of a criminal charge, you have to prove the individual guilt of the man charged; not necessarily that he did it with his own hand, but his own personal guilt. So here the Legislature have said, that in order to bring the man who is alleged to have committed the offence within the enactment, it is necessary that he shall have been personally guilty of such offence. I do not construe personal guilt in the sense of doing it with his own hand in order to bring him within this section. I do not think it is necessary to show that the candidate went and spoke to the scheduled man himself and said, "Act as my agent;" but I think the statute means that it must be brought home to his personal knowledge. If I send a man out with directions to hire somebody in order to shoot somebody else, I am personally guilty of murder if it is done, though I may hire the murderer in a roundabout way, and though I may not know who ultimately did it. I think, however, what is required is, that it should be personal on the part of the candidate. I think this particular section means that where it is done with the candidate's "knowledge and consent," which is the phrase used in the section immediately preceding, then it amounts to a personal engagement. Then I proceed further to consider what the nature of the employment of the scheduled person is to be. It must be "as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election." I think, in construing the statute, and seeing what is the sort of agency that is pointed at, it is not confined by any means to a paid agent. I do not think that is the meaning of the statute, but I think he must be an agent for the management of the election. I do not think it is necessary that he should be an agent for the management of the whole election, it is enough if he is agent for part of the election; he must be not simply an agent who might be employed to such an extent as might make the candidate answerable for corrupt practices committed by him, but he must be employed in the way of managing a portion of the election. Taking that view of the matter, and Mr. Preston being the only one whose case we have to consider, the question is, is there any evidence here that Mr. Preston was engaged by either of the candidates personally as an agent in the sense I have intimated, in the management of the election? In the first place, as far as Major Walpole is concerned, there is no pretence whatever for saying that he engaged him in any such sense. Major Walpole tells us to-day he was well aware that there was a list of scheduled persons, and that he avoided meddling with them at all. He says that he was in ignorance that Mr. Preston was in the schedule, which I fully believe. I think it is a very natural and probable thing; for though Mr. Preston was put in the schedule for what was done in 1859, still there is no more reason why Major Walpole should have known that he was in the schedule, than that he should have heard of the 500 or 600 other persons in the schedule. His was not one of the cases in which what was done would be prominent and notorious, and known to everybody. But Sir Edmund Lacon did not know it, and it was much more likely that he would be intimately aware of all that took place in that inquiry. And then comes the question whether Sir Edmund Lacon knowing that, knowingly consented to the employment of Mr. Preston in such capacity as I have mentioned, as a manager of the election? It is avowed, and not disguised at all, that Mr. Preston was asked to be chairman at one or two of the public meetings. It is not disputed (the candidates of course both knew of it) that Mr. Preston was asked by Sir Edmund Lacon to propose him at the election, and he did do that; but neither of those acts in themselves are acts which in the slightest degree make him an agent for the management of the election. Then, further than that, we have evidence that Mr. Preston did act in a capacity which would have made him an agent in the management of the election to some extent. I think it appears, though there was some difficulty in getting at it, that Mr. Preston attended the meetings of one of the committees, the Yarmouth committee, that he took an active part in it, that he was the chairman of it and acted as such, and I think that was evidence tending to show that he was manager of part of the election, so as to bring him within the statute. There was a good deal of difficulty in getting at handbills and circulars, which it was alleged were signed by Mr. Preston. One was put in to-day signed by Mr. Preston, and I can hardly doubt that the others were also signed by Mr. Preston. It certainly is rather a remarkable thing that with the exception of that produced to-day, not one of those handbills should be forthcoming, and I cannot much doubt that the others would have borne the same signature, and consequently, I come to the conclusion that Mr. Preston was acting as the chairman of the committee, and if the question were solely if he had committed an ordinary corrupt practice, whether such act committed by him had been brought home to an agent of the candidate, I should have thought that it was so brought home. I have very little doubt that the people at Yarmouth did know this; but the Legislature has for some reason thought fit to enact that the employment of the scheduled person, in order to bring the case within the statute, must be a direct personal engagement by the candidate. Sir Edmund Lacon says that he did not know of Mr. Preston's acting as chairman of the committee and so on, and I think it probable that he did not. I suppose that Mr. Preston's so acting was with the knowledge of Sir Edmund Lacon's agents; they were aware of this statute, and they were aware that by the employment of scheduled persons there would be a risk of upsetting the election; nevertheless, they thought it better to have the influence of Mr. Preston, and one or two others, acting on the committee in the same way. But at the same time, while they so procured their influence, they would do, as they had done in former cases, take great care that Sir Edmund Lacon should not know of it. Sir Edmund Lacon having been practised in former elections at Yarmouth, having seen the wisdom of not asking about money, or about questions of this sort, there is a great probability that this was not known to Sir Edmund Lacon. That would not prevent me coming to the conclusion that it was personally done by him, if I could see any evidence to show that he knew really that it was going to be done; his wilfully shutting his eyes to it would not prevent me from concluding that Sir Edmund Lacon was responsible for it, but I cannot find any such evidence. That being so, I can only come to the conclusion that that part of the case fails. That part of the case was a very proper one indeed to investigate, and if the petition had been confined to that point alone, and had been against Sir Edmund Lacon only, I should have thought the petition a very proper one indeed to be brought forward; and if that had been so, probably, though I decided against the petition, I should not have decided that the petitioner should pay the costs. But the petition has been brought against both members, and has extended over all the county; and it is impossible not to see that large expense must have been incurred on matters in which there has been a complete failure of proof. So that I must come to the conclusion, which what I have already said has indicated, that both members were duly elected, and that in the present case there is no reason to depart from the ordinary rule that the costs must follow the event, and therefore the petitioner must pay the respondent's costs.

Gossip (app.) v. Wright and others (resps.)

Mortgage—Sale by mortgagor to mortgagee—Right of repurchase within limited time—Want of professional assistance—Undervalue.

A mortgagor conveyed the mortgaged estate to the mortgagee, and by a contemporaneous agreement a right of repurchase was reserved, if exercised within six years, on repayment of the purchase-money, together with all expenses and moneys laid out on the property. The right of repurchase was not exercised by the mortgagor, but he, seventeen years after the date of the above conveyance, filed a bill, praying that the transaction might be declared to be not a sale, but a mortgage, with the right to redeem:

Held (affirming the decree of Kindersley, V. C.) that the transaction was, what it purported to be, a conveyance by way of sale, with a right of repurchase within six years; the evidence showing that this was the intention of the parties at the time, and proof of want of professional assistance, of under-value, and of unfair pressure on the mortgagor having altogether failed.

This was an appeal from a decree of Kindersley, V.C.

The bill, filed on March 16, 1861, amended in Feb. 1862, and re-amended in Oct. 1862, prayed a declaration that certain indentures, dated May 28 and 29, 1844, ought to stand as a security only for such amount, if any, as the defendants Charles and Robert Wright, could prove to be justly due thereon; for an account of the receipts by the said defendants in respect of certain lands and property; that the defendants might be decreed to convey and re-assign the said lands and property to the plaintiff on receiving what should be due to them as mortgagees; that the plaintiff might have damages awarded to him and assessed by the court; and that the said defendants might pay the costs of the suit.

The circumstances were these:

In 1838, the appellant, John Hatfield Gossip, being owner in fee of the Hatfield Moor Estate, in Yorkshire, applied to the defendant Robert Wright to advance money to improve the estate by the process of warping. This Robert Wright agreed to do, and by an indenture, dated Oct. 13, 1838, Gossip mortgaged in fee to Robert Wright part of the said estate, to secure the re-payment of 15,000*l.* lent, or agreed to be lent, by the latter to the former. On the same day was executed an agreement between Gossip and Charles and Robert Wright. This recited that the 15,000*l.* was borrowed to enable Gossip to complete the purchase of Hatfield Moors, and to pay off incumbrances and improve the lands by warping, or laying alluvion from the old and dry river Idle in the immediate neighbourhood. And the effect of the agreement was that, in the first instance, the sum of 10,000*l.* should be placed in the hands of Charles Wright for the purpose of paying off incumbrances, and of warping and improving the estate, and, if the scheme of warping should appear likely to succeed, Robert Wright was, at his discretion, to advance further sums, all sums so advanced to be applied in warping and improving the estate.

Various other mortgages, of the same and other parts of the Hatfield Moor estate, and of the plant for warping, were made on further advances, and in May 1844, 37,669*l.* was owing on these securities. By indenture, dated May 29, 1844, after reciting that Robert Wright had contracted with Gossip for the absolute purchase of the hereditaments comprised in the several indentures therein mentioned, free from all incumbrances and all equity of redemption thereof, in consideration of 39,370*l.*, Gossip appointed and conveyed all the premises and hereditaments, and all the equity of redemption, right, interest, and demand, at law and in equity, unto and to the use of Robert Wright, his heirs and assigns, for ever. By an indenture, dated the previous day, Gossip had assigned to Robert Wright all the warping plant, in consideration of 2630*l.*, making the whole amount of the purchase-money 42,000*l.*

Contemporaneously with these deeds an agreement was executed, dated May 29, 1844, between Robert Wright of the one part and Gossip of the other part, by which, after reciting the deeds of the 28th and of even date, and that the aggregate of the moneys therein mentioned amounted to 42,000*l.*, and that upwards of 3000 acres of the moorland sold to Robert Wright remained uncultivated, but was capable of being improved by warping and cultivation; and that, on the treaty for the said purchase, it was agreed that Robert Wright might if he thought proper improve the said hereditaments, and that, whether he so improved the same or not, Gossip should have a right of "pre-emption" of the said hereditaments and personal estate and effects from the said Robert Wright, on payment of 42,000*l.*, with interest at 5 per cent. and all expenses of warping and cultivation; it was witnessed that in case Gossip, his trustees, executors, administrators, or assigns should at any time or times thereafter, within six years from the date thereof, agree to repurchase and tender and pay to Robert Wright, his executors, administrators, or assigns the sum of 42,000*l.*, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and all expenses of warping, improving, cultivating, or building on the estates, or in exchanging parts of them, or in employing any persons, or in purchasing any plant, including the said Robert Wright's personal expenses in superintending, &c., and for loss of time; then that he the said Robert Wright, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would release, convey, and assign the said hereditaments and personal estate and effects unto the said Gossip, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns; in which case Gossip was to be entitled to the improvements and the plant, and to have credit for the amount realised by any sale, as well as any rents or other moneys up to that time received by Robert Wright. The agreement also contained the following proviso: "And provided further, and it is clearly and well understood and agreed, by and between the said parties hereto that for anything herein contained to the contrary, he the said Robert Wright, shall not be prejudiced, hindered, or molested in the enjoyment, cultivation, and improvement, and management of the said estates, and in having and receiving the produce, and rents and profits thereof, in the same manner as if this agreement or power to repurchase on the terms herein contained had not been made, the object of the parties being to give to the said John Hatfield Gossip the preference of repurchasing within the period aforesaid; but that the said Robert Wright, in the meantime, and at all times, shall peaceably have, hold, occupy, possess, and enjoy the same freehold and copyhold estates and hereditaments and premises and personal estate, as his own absolute estates under the said recited indentures, and according to the uses, ends, intents, and purposes therein contained, and the true intent, meaning, and effect thereof, as and for his own freehold estates of inheritance in fee simple in possession, and copyhold estate of inheritance, and the said personal estate as and for his own use absolutely."

Robert Wright took possession shortly after the execution of the deeds of 1844, the expenses of preparing which were paid by him. Out of the 3000 acres, not more than 310 were warped, and the six years expired on May 29, 1850. Wright, at Gossip's request, extended the period limited for repurchase to Jan. 1, 1853. No proposal to repurchase was within that period made by Gossip.

In 1858, Robert Wright conveyed the estate to his brother, Charles Wright.

In Aug. 1852 a suit was instituted by the infant children of the appellant, suing by one Wilmer as their next friend, against the respondent and the appellant for the purpose of establishing certain charges on the estate, to the benefit of which they were entitled. In this suit, Kindersley, V. C., in March 1855 held that Robert Wright had constructive notice of these charges, and they were accordingly established. In the course of the suit it was suggested and insisted on, as a matter of law, on behalf of Robert Wright, that the mortgage executed to him existed for the purpose of protecting him from these charges; but Robert Wright was treated by all the parties to the said suit and by the court as the absolute owner of the estate originally mortgaged to him.

The bill in the present case was filed on March 16, 1861, and the appellant in it charged that when he executed the indentures of May 28th and 29th 1844, he had no intention to assign to the respondent his equity of redemption in the premises therein comprised, nor did the respondent suppose that the appellant had any intention of so doing; and that it was well understood that they were only intended to be a further security for moneys advanced or to be advanced, and that the appellant had not sufficient professional assistance when he executed those deeds, and also that the mortgaged estates were of large and increasing value. The respondents by their answer denied the allegations of the appellant.

Much evidence was brought forward on both sides to show the intention of the parties, the history of the transaction, and the alleged want of professional assistance.

The cause came on for hearing upon replication before Kindersley, V. C. on April 22nd, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th, and on May 2nd 1863. His Honour gave judgment, dismissing the appellant's bill with costs (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627). This decree was the subject of the present appeal.

Jemmett, for the appellant, cited the following cases and authorities:

April 16.—The Lord CHANCELLOR.—I consider it is not necessary for your Lordships to hear the respondents in this case, regard being had to the character of the instruments against which it is proposed now to act, because it is impossible to say that, upon the construction of these instruments themselves, there can be any doubt as to the real intention of the parties. We are now asked, in effect, to give a totally different operation to these deeds from that which on the face of them they purport to express; and that, as it seems to me, without one trace throughout the whole of the proceedings of any case of surprise, or fraud, or mistake, which could induce us to come to the conclusion that the deeds are not bonâ fide expressing the object or intention which every one of the parties to them had in view. Now, the character of the transaction, very briefly stated, is this — that Gossip, the appellant, was the owner of an estate which he and others, the Messrs. Wright among them, thought might be greatly improved by the operation called "warping." The estate was of some value in itself, yielding a rental of about 1000*l.* a year with reference to the land already reclaimed, and it was considered that a very large sum might be obtained by reclaiming about 3000 acres then unreclaimed upon the property. The Messrs. Wright appear from time to time to have been disposed to assist in this operation, and to have advanced money to Mr. Gossip to enable him to effect an improvement of this estate; but, after a time, whether it was from their finding that the profits were not so great as the expenditure, or that the expenditure was greater than had been anticipated—whatever the reason might be—the Messrs. Wright appear to have felt that they had advanced (for that appears to me the true construction of what passed between the parties) as much as prudent men could be justified in advancing, and as much as seemed to them to be about the full value of the estate, and, therefore, the arrangement which was come to was this. There is some little controversy whether they or Gossip first proposed the arrangement. The Vice-Chancellor appears to have been inclined to the opinion, as I confess I am myself, that, looking at the whole transaction, the probability is that Mr. Gossip was the first to propose it, and that Messrs. Wright then came into the arrangement; that in 1844 they should give at once the value of the estate—as things then stood—about 42,000*l.* Certain items were thrown into consideration which are not worth mentioning at the present moment. They said, "We agree to give that sum as the full value of the property, but we have already advanced that sum, or nearly that sum, to you, and further we will, if you suppose you can get any better value for the estate, give you six years to obtain that better value; but then you must remember this, that we too must have the option of acting as we may think best hereafter, according to circumstances, if any change should take place either in the character of the property or in our means of effecting the improvements. We must ourselves have the option of improving during all the six years. We cannot do so in our character of mortgagees, therefore we propose now to take the estate at once into our own hands, to make ourselves masters of the property, with full liberty to us to make all improvements that we may think fit to make, and at the same time with full liberty to abstain from making any improvements that we may think fit not to make. In other words, the estate shall be ours to deal with it as we please, but you shall have six years, during which you may take it out of our hands if you can find anyone who will give you more for it, but in that event you must deal with us upon this footing, that an account must be taken, as if we had continued to be persons advancing money for the improvement of the estate, to be repaid our advances, and you must repay us the money so advanced." To carry this arrangement into effect, three deeds were drawn up, which seem to me to make the whole matter as clear as possible. Two of them only need be considered. One assigns the machinery and implements that were employed in the operation. The first of the two deeds which we have particularly to consider is a sale out and out of the property for the sum of 42,000*l.* Mr. Jemmett admits, as he could not help doing, that that was in effect upon the face of it a complete sale, and, if the case had stood there, nothing could have been advanced against what had been done other than the second branch of the argument, which was brought in at the close of Mr. Jemmett's speech, viz., any question that might arise as to whether this gentleman, being in distress, had been imposed upon in the transaction. Then the next instrument, upon which a good deal of reliance has been placed by Mr. Jemmett, is this—it is an instrument perfectly consistent with the other instrument, agreeing with it in all its provisions, but saying, "You have sold the estate, and conveyed it to us by the former deed, but during six years you shall be at liberty to have what in the recitals is called, the pre-emption, and which, in the operative part of the deed, is expounded in full, clear, and definite terms, which admit of no mistake or confusion whatever, to be this:—You shall have the right of re-purchasing (as it is there termed) the whole property, by paying to us all that we shall have advanced in the meantime, and advanced in this sense, advanced on our own account if we retain the estate at the end of the six years, and advanced on your account and for your benefit if it turns out that you, by re-purchasing, become the owner of it, and have the benefit of the improvements made by us. In that case all that we advance for the improvement of the estate is to be repaid. It says nothing about pre-emption in its more strict and definite sense, viz., the right of having the first offer when a person is about to make a sale. It does not deal with that at all, but it gives this gentleman the right at any time, whether the Messrs. Wright were going to sell or not, of coming with the money and saying, "Here is the 42,000*l.*, and all the money that you have laid out; now let us have the estate." That that is the clear and definite meaning of the deeds seems to me to be beyond all doubt. I cannot at present see that it would make any difference if it were called a right of pre-emption, taken in the strict and narrow form of the right, viz., to step in when a person is about to sell. I think that would be an irrational interpretation of an instrument of this nature, but, even if it had that meaning, the simple answer would be that when the end of the six years has arrived that right is over. Thus, therefore, the two deeds stand together, and, unless it can be shown that undue advantage was taken of this gentleman, who is alleged to have been in want of money, there is nothing more to be said upon the instruments standing by themselves; and the clear intent and meaning of the parties must be taken to be an out-and-out purchase, but that the seller has the opportunity of repurchasing within the period of six years. Such a transaction might of course be reopened by an extension of time by agreement, or there might be collateral circumstances shown by which the purchaser might be held to have made a concession, either express or implied; but there is nothing of that kind here beyond a certain date, which is of some importance, because it seems to explain what would otherwise seems to be ambiguous, namely, the talk which occurred from time to time about advances after the expiration of the six years, which would not be in itself quite consistent with what I have held to be the meaning of the parties to the deed, unless there had been an extension of time, because at the end of the six years all questions about advances would be put an end to. But there is a witness, whose evidence does not seem to be in any way impugned, Mr. Liddle, who says distinctly that the time was extended liberally by Messrs. Wright from some time in the year 1850, when it expired, to Jan. 1853, and from that time no further time was granted, and, as far as the Messrs. Wright were concerned, they were at liberty to stand upon their rights. All that you read about advances between 1850 and 1853 tends to show that everybody recognised it as a matter of mortgage and not a matter of sale; but after 1853 we find nothing of the kind, although I do find undoubtedly letters written which have something of that aspect. There is a talk of "your mortgage," and the Messrs. Wright say that they do admit that there is a little fencing between the parties on the subject. But after Jan. 1853, there is no substantial question between them. Then, if anything can make this more clear, it is the introduction of that able solicitor, Mr. Baxter, who upon the second branch of the case was quite competent to protect the interests of his client from advantage being taken of him in his circumstances of distress, as to the question of construction which was put by everybody upon these instruments. What can be clearer than the correspondence to which Kindersley V.C. alludes in his judgment, viz., the correspondence shortly before the expiration of the time allowed for re-purchase, showing that the Messrs. Wright were disposed to exercise a certain degree of indulgence, and were then calling upon Mr. Baxter himself, saying, "Why don't you get your client to re-purchase the estate, we have no particular desire to retain it? Do find a purchaser for the estate, or buy it yourself. If you purchase it yourself, Messrs. Wright will give you time, if they have anybody that they can deal with, and who they think is bonâ fide, furnished with funds, for completing the purchase. But do see if you cannot put your client into a more suitable frame of mind upon the subject." Then comes that remarkable letter of Mr. Baxter's in answer, in which he says, "I should like to see the deed which you call the deed of pre-emption, and which you recollect that we specially settled together." Now that letter, in substance most remarkably agrees with his evidence. It is open to the observation that the evidence is of a much later date than the letter, and, therefore, without the slightest imputation of any intention do otherwise than give a most accurate representation of the transaction, we must credit Mr. Baxter with having a better memory of the transaction at the time of writing the letter than at the later period of his giving the evidence, but they most remarkably fit into each other. Mr. Baxter tells you that his client, the present appellant, told him that the Messrs. Broomhead, the solicitors for the respondents, were pressing him for the execution of these deeds, and that he took Mr. Baxter with him to their office because it was there that the deeds were to be executed. Mr. Baxter says that he perused the deeds, and, having so done, he allowed his client to execute them. As Mr. Baxter allowed his client to execute the deeds, he must be taken to have had a perfect knowledge of what the contents of the deeds were, and he would know whether they agreed with the instructions which he had received from his client upon the subject, and which he is not called upon to disclose; so that we find that in 1850 (six years after these transactions occurred) his memory is perfectly and accurately impressed with the character of the deeds, and at that time he so accurately recollects their effect that he describes the deed of purchase and reminds Mr. Broomhead that he specially settled it with him. That special settlement, I should assume, from Mr. Baxter's character, would have been a necessary consequence of his being told that his client felt himself to be under some degree of pressure with reference to the deeds to be executed, and if the Messrs. Broomhead were pressing him to execute them, he would take care that his client was justly treated, and that the deeds represented just what had taken place between the parties, and I have no doubt that he did so. Then, that being so, there only remains the question last suggested by Mr. Jemmett, that we might give leave to amend, in order to enable the appellant to make out a case of undervalue and of undue pressure, in a sense in which the Court of Chancery would say that the proceeding was fraudulent, by reason of undue advantage being taken of a person in distress. Now, in the first place, as regards the value of the property we have really nothing to show that the property was in any way taken at an undervalue. There were a variety of schemes suggested. Mr. Jemmett commenced by opening a prospectus to satisfy us that the property was of greater value. But, although that prospectus was issued by certain speculators, no company was ever formed. No persons were found weak enough to act upon the prospectus, and nothing has been shown in the way of evincing the opinion of any person in the world that the value of the property was more than was given; but, beyond that, this case is remarkable as being one of re-purchase, and certainly in a case where six years are allowed for the repurchase, it would be a very difficult thing for any person to overthrow an arrangement of that kind, on the ground of pressure, or on the ground of a want of opportunity for thought and consideration; for the party has six years to think about it, and to go about and consult whomsoever he pleases, and to see if there is anyone who will give him more. The appellant had a most reputable and able solicitor to advise him during the whole of those six years, a gentleman than whom it would be hardly possible to select a better to advise him, and to find him a person to advance money upon any undertaking that was likely to be successful. Then how can we say that there is the slightest evidence of undervalue? How can we say that there is the slightest evidence of any pressure being put upon him, when, on the contrary, we find that indulgence was granted to him for a year and a half beyond the six years? How can we say that any injustice has been done him by Messrs. Wright? The litigation is an unfortunate one. It is a case in which a person having sold his property is vexed at having been obliged to part with it, and makes vain attempts to recover it at the expense of those from whom, at the time of the sale, he received its full value. Upon the whole, it seems to me that what I ought to suggest to your Lordships is that you should dismiss this appeal. Being a pauper case, of course costs cannot be given. Therefore the appeal will be dismissed in the usual form, but without costs.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack. The case, indeed, is abundantly clear. There is no ground for supposing, under the circumstances that appear before us, that there was any over-reaching on the part of the Messrs. Wright, or any unfair advantage taken of the appellant. The deeds, therefore, which were executed must be taken to express the real intention and agreement of the parties. Now, the deed is clearly a deed of sale, with a power of repurchase within six years, given to the appellant upon certain conditions. The argument of the appellant amounts, as I understand it, to this—that the appellant having failed to execute that power which is given to him by the deeds, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee reverts, and the power of redemption revives. Now, I confess that it appears to me only necessary to state this view of the appellant's case to show that it is utterly without foundation. Under these circumstances, I agree with my noble and learned friend that this appeal should be dismissed, and I agree with him also in the opinion that this is not a case in which we ought to grant any leave to amend.

Lord COLONSAY.—I have nothing to add to what has been stated. It appears to me that looking at these deeds, which are clearly a deed of sale with an agreement to re-acquire by purchase, and looking at the history of the previous proceedings, there was nothing unreasonable or unfair in such a transaction, taking it as it appears upon the evidence before us. Then the question comes to be, whether there is any reason why these deeds should not receive their full effect according to the clear construction to be put upon them. I have heard no reason. It is suggested that it really was a transaction of a hidden character; that it was a mortgage that was really intended between the parties, although they put it in another form. That is a suggestion which has no support from any facts appearing before us. Therefore I can have no doubt of the judgment we ought to pronounce—that we should dismiss the appeal.

Lord CAIRNS.—I cannot help feeling that this is a case that presses with peculiar hardship on the respondents in the appeal, because they have to meet litigation carried on at your Lordship's bar without the ordinary means by which, in the case of one not suing as a pauper, they would to some extent be reimbursed the expenses incurred. Upon the merits, it appears to me that the appeal altogether fails. The transaction which is impeached is, on the face of the deeds, clear and distinct. No words of any conveyance could more clearly have described the transaction. It is a transaction in which a mortgagor parts with his whole right and equity of redemption in consideration of the sum due from him at the time to the mortgagee. And in this particular case the deed further stipulates that if he shall be minded within a limited time to become the purchaser back of that which he has sold, he may do so on certain terms. Now, if that was the real transaction, and not a mask of some transaction of a different kind, I am not aware of any rule of law, or of any principle upon which courts of equity have hitherto acted, that would stamp that transaction with any kind of illegality or unfairness. It appears to me to be a transaction into which a mortgagor and mortgagee may well enter, supposing there is no fraud or unfairness in the matter. This being the transaction on the face of the deeds, is there any colour for the suggestion that it was not the real transaction between the parties? I attended with anxiety to the evidence given in the case of that which happened at the time, and that which is said to have happened afterwards, between the parties, what we may term the register between the mortgagor and mortgagee, and in the whole of that evidence I have been unable to place my finger on any one fact or statement, on either side, during the number of years that elapsed after the execution of these deeds, which would raise in my mind even a suspicion that the deeds did not truly and accurately describe the transaction between the parties. On the contrary, I find expressions used, upon the one side and upon the other—or, I perhaps should say, expressions used on the part of the Messrs. Wright and those acting with him, and not in any way controverted on the other side—which assigned to Messrs. Wright the same position which the deeds upon the face of them assigned to them. I cannot avoid adverting to one matter which happened subsequently to the execution of the deeds, and which left on my mind a very disagreeable impression. I recollect another suit in the same names—a suit of Gossip v. Wright, instituted in the Court of Chancery by the children of the appellant—as to which all that the appellant can say is that he did not take an active part in it, but he carefully abstains from saying that it was not a suit promoted by him and carried on with his concurrence and support. In that suit the children of this appellant alleged as the foundation of their claim against the Messrs. Wright, that they had become the purchasers, out and out, of the equity of redemption of this property, and on that assertion they were able to substantiate a claim, according to the well-known and established principles of the court, against the Messrs. Wright, by which they obtained from them payment of a charge on the estate. Without that assertion, the Messrs. Wright would have been under no liability whatever to have paid anything to those children. After that suit, conducted in the presence of the appellant (because he was a defendant in the suit) conducted by his own children, for him to turn round now, at this distance of time, and insist that all that was maintained in that suit was a fiction, and that, although his children recovered money upon the faith of their assertion that Messrs. Wright had purchased the equity of redemption, no such purchase ever took place. I say for an appellant so to act appears to me to be an act which cannot be passed over in your Lordships' House without some observation and reprehension. As regards the application which was finally made to us, to allow an amendment of the appeal, I am glad to find that your Lordships are not in any way disposed to entertain that application. It appears to me that such an amendment, if made, would entirely fail. That Mr. Gossip, the appellant, had professional advice of the most eminent kind at the time of the execution of these deeds, is perfectly clear. Then with regard to what is said as to the sale having been at an undervalue, I cannot find any evidence whatever upon that point. I find that, after a number of years had elapsed, a speculative company was set on foot, and certain statements were made as to the value of the property. But it is to be observed that at the time when this transaction took place, viz, in 1844, when the deed in question was executed, the property, with the exception of a very small portion of it, was poor land utterly unproductive; it was entirely a matter of speculation what the effect of warping might be and to what extent it would make it productive; but there is no evidence whatever upon which I can lay my finger at this moment that would lead me to say that the sum of money in consideration of which the equity of redemption was conveyed was in any way insufficient. Therefore, I see no evidence on which the appeal could be sustained, even if amendments were allowed. I entirely concur with my noble and learned friends that the appeal must be dismissed.

Jemmett.—My Lords, will you permit me to make an observation? I did not sign this appeal, and therefore I had not occasion to consider whether in formâ pauperis the appellant might appeal to this House or not. But I appeared in support of this appeal at your Lordship's bar because I felt it my duty to do so, as having been counsel in the case in the court below.

COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, March 22.

(Before Mr. Dodson, M.P., Chairman; Mr. Rickards, and Mr. Bonham Carter, Referees.)

Midland and London and North-Western Railway Companies' Bill.

Objections to the locus standi of: (1.) The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company; (2.) The North British Railway Company.

Abandonment of railway—Competition—Through routes—Traffic arrangements—The English and Scotch traffic agreement.

A Bill was promoted by two railway companies to enable them to enter into agreements that would place it in the power of one of the companies to dispense with the construction of an independent and competing line authorised in 1866, which it was proposed by the Bill to abandon. Petitions against the Bill were deposited by two other railway companies, one to the north and the other to the south of the authorised line, but not actually in contact with it, complaining of the proposed abandonment, on the ground that their traffic would or might be impeded by the loss of this new and independent route between England and Scotland, and that the Bill placed in the hands of the promoters powers of unduly favouring and influencing the course of traffic:

Held, that the petitioners respectively had a locus standi.

The Bill, among other objects, proposed to sanction the abandonment of the Settle and Carlisle Railway, a line seventy-seven miles in length, and authorised in 1866, after a severe contest. By means of this line a new and independent route from the Midland districts to Carlisle, the starting point of most of the great railway systems of Scotland, was to have been afforded. In lieu of this direct communication, the Bill now proposed to sanction arrangements between the Midland and London and North-Western Companies, under which traffic coming from the Midland Railway and going northwards would find its way on to the North-Western system at Lowgill, a point considerably south of Carlisle, by means of the Ingleton and Lowgill branch, which forms a connecting link between the Midland and North-Western Railway systems. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, whose territory does not actually touch, but lies somewhat to the south and east of the line proposed to be abandoned, and the North British Company, whose system would join the Settle and Carlisle Railway, when completed, at Carlisle, petitioned, each in their own behalf, against the powers of abandonment and arrangement sought by the Bill.

The locus standi of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company was objected to, on the following grounds:

1. The Bill does not contain any provision for taking, using, or interfering with any lands, railways, stations, works, or accommodations of the petitioners, or for running engines or carriages upon or across the same, or for granting any facilities over or in respect thereof.

2. The petition does not allege, nor does the Bill disclose, any such competition or interference with competition, as according to the practice of Parliament entitles the petitioners to be heard against the Bill.

3. The allegations of the petition with respect to competition, or interference with competition, are inapplicable, and are not such as to entitle the petitioners to be heard against the Bill.

4. The Bill does not contain any provision whereby the agreement referred to in paragraph 6 of the petition (as to conveyance of traffic on the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway) is altered or affected.

5. The proposed abandonment of the Settle and Carlisle Railway does not so affect any property, right, or interest of the petitioners as to entitle them to be heard against the Bill.

6. The petitioners have not any property in the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, nor have they any such right or interest therein, or in respect thereof, as entitles them to be heard against the Bill.

7. The petition does not contain any allegation upon which, according to the practice of Parliament, the petitioners are entitled to heard against the Bill.

The objections taken to the locus standi of the North British Railway Company were precisely similar in their nature, but contained an additional allegation to the effect that there were not in the Bill any provisions by which the existing arrangements as to traffic between that company and the Midland Company would be altered or affected.

Denison, Q. C. for both the petitioning companies.—The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company are directly affected by the provisions of this Bill. They now have access to Carlisle by the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, with respect to which an agreement exists between themselves and the London and North-Western Company; and they also join the Midland Railway at Colne, and have running powers over that line as far as Skipton. The London and North-Western Company, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company, are competitors for traffic over the whole of Lancashire, and pretty nearly the whole of Yorkshire. When the agreement between them as to the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway comes to an end in 1876, the whole of their relations will be changed, and the Lancashire and Yorkshire may be left to their own resources for getting beyond Preston, and may be driven into the hands of the Midland Company. It is, therefore, important that the Midland Company should be left free to deal with us, without any connection with the London and North-Western. Supposing the Ingleton and Lowgill branch of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway to form properly part of the London and North-Western system—a matter which is disputed—the petitioners, under the existing or some future agreement with the North-Western, may get their traffic carried over that branch; but if it should turn out otherwise, then the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway may find some years hence that they have a totally independent company to deal with. The Midland Company propose by this Bill to agree with the London and North-Western for joint use, though not joint ownership, of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway from Lancaster to Lowgill, and also of the Lowgill to Ingleton branch. This would give them a line between Settle and Carlisle nearly as short as the one they propose to abandon. The Lancashire and Yorkshire, as long as its agreements subsist with the London and North-Western, can have its traffic carried by the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway up to Carlisle, as if it were London and North-Western traffic. But in the case of traffic originating as far east, for instance, as Manchester, it would be more advantageous for the Lancashire and Yorkshire, if the direct Settle and Carlisle line were constructed, to hand over that traffic to the Midland Railway at Skipton for conveyance to Carlisle, or to agree with them for running powers. But now, if the Midland Company acquire by agreement the power of using the Lancaster and Carlisle line, they will not be able to depute that power to any other company, and their own direct line to Carlisle will meanwhile be given up. Next, let us see the position, under the Bill, of the North British Railway. These petitioners will be as seriously affected, north of Carlisle, by the abandonment, as the Lancashire and Yorkshire are south of that point; being engaged in active competition with the Caledonian Railway Company. The Waverley line, that viâ Hawick to Edinburgh, was granted to the North British Company as a new and independent line; and in continuation of it they are greatly interested in having an independent route from Carlisle to the south, free from the control of the London and North Western. Accordingly, when the Settle and Carlisle line was projected, the North British Company gave to the passing of the Act every assistance in their power. By a decision of the Court of Chancery, the Waverley route has been held to be free, and a fortiori the Settle and Carlisle line would be free, from the provisions of what is known as the "English and Scotch traffic agreement." It follows that the North British and the Midland Companies would have the strongest interest in carrying all the traffic in their power by the Settle and Carlisle line, when made, for they could keep in their own pockets every pound they received on that line, instead of being subject, as under the English and Scotch agreement, they would be to a per centage distributable among the other companies to that agreement. The Lancashire and Yorkshire, like the North British, were no parties to that agreement; and their interest accordingly lies in finding a route to Scotland free from its provisions. Such a route has been authorised by Parliament in the case of this Settle and Carlisle Railway; and a Bill for the abandonment of a portion of that route, is the one against which they now seek a locus standi. There is nothing in the Standing Orders which limits in the smallest degree the discretion of the court in admitting parties to be heard against an abandonment Bill. Even if the case were doubtful, it is one of such magnitude, of almost national importance, that the court will be slow to exercise their discretion in the direction of shutting out the petitioners. (Counsel further read and relied upon paragraphs in the petition of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company, which stated that the Bill did not contain any of the provisions usual for giving publicity to agreements between the companies, and did not incorporate the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act 1863, which gave to the Board of Trade control, and provided for the periodical revision of such agreements; that the agreement contained in the schedule of the Bill was in all respects equivalent to a transfer to the Midland Railway Company of a joint ownership during fifty years of the portion of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway between Ingleton and Carlisle, whilst the 23rd clause would enable the two largest railway companies in the kingdom to make from time to time, at their discretion, secretly, and without any control, agreements for a portion of all their revenue, and as far as their profits were concerned, to effect a virtual amalgamation; that the Midland Company thus becoming joint owners of a main ingredient in the Western route to Scotland, might by acting in concert with the London and North-Western Company, place such impediments in the way of Lancashire and Yorkshire traffic, and extend such facilities and advantages to the traffic arising on their own systems as would ultimately secure to themselves a monopoly; that the power to construct the Settle and Carlisle railway was deliberately sought by the Midland Company, the absolute need of that line for the purposes of their own traffic established, and the benefits to the public demonstrated; that there was no ground for pretending that the Midland Company were prevented by pecuniary difficulties from fulfilling the duty thus voluntarily undertaken, inasmuch as the company, according to the Bill itself, had issued in shares the necessary capital; that it was of evil precedent for a company to obtain powers from Parliament for the execution of a great public work, and to use those powers, not for accomplishing the purpose intended by Parliament, but as a means of making a better bargain with a rival company; and finally, the petition asserted that the real nature of the interest possessed by the North-Western Company in the Lowgill and Ingleton branch of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, forming the proposed avenue of approach to Carlise by the Midland Railway, was misrepresented by the Bill.

The paragraphs of the North British Company's petition specially relied upon by counsel were to the effect that the Waverley route—by which the distance from Edinburgh to Carlisle was ninety-eight miles—had been recognised by Parliament as a competing route with the Caledonian Railway—by which the distance from Edinburgh to Carlisle was 101 miles—and the petitioners placed under restrictions in the use of its competitive powers against the Caledonian Company; that the Midland Company having developed a new line of communication between London and the North, viâ Bedford, Leeds, and Ingleton, mutual arrangements were entered into between them and the petitioners for facilitating the transmission of traffic upon their systems through Carlisle; that the London and North-Western Company not only obstructed the transmission of traffic between the petitioners' railways and their own system, but, being lessees of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway (over which between Ingleton and Carlisle all Midland traffic between England and Scotland must pass), they also by every means in their power impeded the flow of traffic between the Waverley and Midland routes, refusing to allow the passenger carriages of the petitioners to pass between Carlisle and Ingleton, though they allowed free transit between the same points to the carriages of the Caledonian Company; that the North-Western dislocated the goods, as well as the passenger traffic of the petitioners in manner set forth in the petition; that in order to obviate difficulties experienced in the conveyance of traffic to and from Scotland, and also to accommodate important local interests in the North of England, the Midland Company in 1865 projected the Settle and Carlisle line, which the petitioners strongly supported; that in connection with that Bill, and in the same session, an agreement with the Midland Railway Company was entered into and confirmed, establishing a joint goods station at Carlisle, and measures had since been taken to acquire land for that purpose; that the abandonment of the Settle and Carlisle line, now proposed, would not only deprive the petitioners of an independent means of communication with the important districts which that railway was intended to traverse, but would render it more difficult for them to obtain free transit for their goods, &c., to Liverpool, Manchester, and other places in England, over the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway; that, including the Waverley route, there were three existing lines of railway communication from Scotland to Carlisle, and were the Settle and Carlisle line abandoned the Lancaster and Carlisle would constitute the sole approach for the traffic of those three railways to and from points south of Carlisle; that the proposal to hand over the exclusive control of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway to the London and North-Western and Midland Companies, was one accordingly pregnant with danger; lastly, that the object of the powers of arrangement contained in the Bill was to give to the Midland Company a use satisfactory to themselves of the Lancaster and Carlisle line, but to prevent their extending those advantages in the slightest degree to any other company.

Venables, Q.C. for the promoters.—The Lancashire and Yorkshire Company will not be affected by this Bill in any way entitling them to a hearing. They neither touch nor come near the Settle or Carlisle Railway, which it is proposed to abandon. On one side they come in their own right to Preston, and there join the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway; on the other they join the Midland system at Colne, from which point to Skipton they have running powers, but those powers extend no further in a north-westerly direction. That being the case they clearly have no claim to a locus standi on the ground of the abandonment. If the Lancashire and Yorkshire want to send any traffic to Carlisle from Colne now, they must hand it over at Skipton to the Midland Company; and they will equally have to do that whether this Bill passes or not. As to any contemplated agreements between the Midland and North-Western Companies, what can it signify to the Lancashire and Yorkshire whether the line from Ingleton to Carlisle be worked by the Midland or by the North-Western? With respect to the agreement between the London and North-Western and the Lancashire and Yorkshire for the use of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, the Bill in no way interferes with that. Then as to the allegation that the London and North-Western and the Midland companies may place impediments in the way of the petitioners' traffic so as to secure for themselves a monopoly, that might still have been done had the Settle and Carlisle line been made. But the question for this court to consider is this: No fresh power of obstruction is created by the Bill, for the Midland Company will only do under it what they might have done had their own line been constructed. We contend that the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway is too far from the Settle and Carlisle line to give them a claim to be heard; and this view is supported by the fact that last year when the proposed amalgamation of the Midland Company with the Glasgow and South-Western Company was under consideration, the Lancashire and Yorkshire petitioned and their locus standi was refused, the argument being that they were too remote. The Bill does not assume that the Midland Company will have larger rights than the London and North-Western in the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway, nor does it confirm any lease or agreement respecting that line. Supposing the London and North-Western to have no rights whatever in that line, or in the Ingleton and Lowgill branch, as the petitioners rather suggest, then the Midland will get half of nothing, which cannot injure anybody. The Bill, no doubt, is founded on the assumption that the Lancashire and North-Western have rights over that line; but it cannot matter to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company that the Midland are granted a share of whatever rights the London and North-Western Company may possess. Then as to the petition of the North-British Railway. The English and Scotch agreement has been imported into the argument; but it is plainly beside the question, for that agreement expires this year.

Denison.—It was to endure for fourteen years from the 1st Jan. 1856, and thenceforward till determined by six months' notice.

Venables.—Then if this Bill should operate prejudicially, there will be an additional reason for giving notice to terminate the agreement. The North British, as the proprietors of the Waverley route, wanting free intercourse with the Midland system, supported the Settle and Carlisle Railway. But the Midland Company now offer them what is equivalent to a line in their own hands, i.e., a line in which they will have equal user and control with the London and North-Western Company.

Denison.—But the Midland Company cannot act as owners of the line, and let in other companies?

Venables.—Not singly; but by arrangement with the North-Western it might be done. At any rate, as to the carriage of traffic, whether the traffic be that of the North British or of any other company, they will have the same powers as the London and North-Western Company. They will certainly not be able to give the North British running powers over the Lancaster and Carlisle line; but they have not got them at present, neither have they running powers over the Settle and Carlisle line. Consequently the petitioners will lose nothing by the abandonment. Their traffic will be conveyed as freely over the Lancaster and Carlisle line as it would have been over the Settle and Carlisle. As to the joint goods station at Carlisle, the Bill does not interfere with the argreement on that head. With respect to the allegations about loss of communication with Manchester and other English towns, the petitioners will have a route practically as short as by the abandoned line. By whichever of the existing routes Scotch traffic gets to Carlisle, from that point onwards, it must pass into the hands of two English companies, the London and North-Western, and the Midland. Whether the Settle and Carlisle line be made or not, there will still be the same two companies for the Scotch lines to deal with. And for such portion of their traffic as is intended for the Midland line, whether that traffic be carried on to the Midland system at Settle by a direct line to that point from Carlisle, or by the existing railway passing through Lowgill and Ingleton, can matter very little to third parties.

After consultation, the Referees allowed the locus standi in the cases both of the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and of the North British Railway Company.

Abandonment Bill—Competing line—Traffic arrangements—Access to station.

A Bill promoted by two railway companies to sanction traffic arrangements having for their object to render unnecessary a competing line, authorised in 1866 at the instance of one of those companies, and now proposed to be abandoned under the Bill, was opposed by a third company, on the ground of apprehended monopoly and diversion of traffic, but chiefly on the ground that access to the station at C., of which station the petitioning company was joint owner, was proposed to be retained under the Bill, though the competing line, in respect of which that access had been obtained in 1866, was about to be abandoned:

Held, that the petitioners had no locus standi.

The Bill was one (vide sup.) "for confirming an agreement between the Midland and London and North-Western Railway Companies, with respect to the use of the Lancashire and Carlisle Railway; for the abandonment of the Settle and Carlisle Railway; and for other purposes."

The locus standi of the petitioners was objected to on the following grounds:

1. The Bill does not contain any provisions for taking, using, or interfering with any lands, railway stations, or accommodations of the petitioners, or for running engines or carriages upon or across the same, or for granting any facilities over or in respect thereof.

2. The petition does not allege, nor does the Bill disclose, any such competition, or interference with competition as, according to the practice of Parliament, entitles the petitioners to be heard thereon against the Bill.

3. With respect to the statements contained in paragraphs 16 and 17 of the petition (representing that the running powers and facilities at present enjoyed by the petitioners would be diminished) the Bill does not contain any provision whereby the running powers therein referred to are in any way altered, prejudiced, or affected.

4. The Bill does not contain any provision whereby the agreement (i, e., the English and Scotch traffic agreement) referred to in paragraph 18 of the petition is in any way altered, prejudiced, or affected.

5. The proposed abandonment of the Settle and Carlisle Railway does not prejudice or affect the petitioners in such a way or to such an extent as, according to the practice of Parliament, entitles them to be heard against the Bill.

6. The petition does not contain any allegations upon which, according to the practice of Parliament, the petitioners are entitled to be heard against the Bill.

Clerk, Q. C., for the petitioners.—The Caledonian Company might object to this Bill on the ground merely of its being an abandonment Bill; but they do more. They rest their claim to a locus standi principally upon the fact that the Bill gives power to the Midland Company to make arrangements with the London and North-Western Company, which will be very prejudicial to the petitioners' interests. The Caledonian Company are joint owners with the London and North-Western Company of the Citadel Station at Carlisle, and are accordingly entitled (Standing Order 129) to be heard against the Bill, the 28th clause of which enacts that certain parts of the Settle and Carlisle Act of 1866, shall remain in force as regards the use of the Citadel Station, notwithstanding the repeal of other parts of that Act. In 1866 when the Midland Company came with their independent Settle and Carlisle line affording a new channel of traffic for Scotch traffic to the south, certain powers of using the Citadel Station were conferred upon them in consideration of specified payments. They now seek to abandon the Settle and Carlisle line, but at the same time to take advantage of all those arrangements which were sanctioned in 1866 under an entirely different state of circumstances. The Midland Company now occupy a widely different position from what they did in 1866. They then came with a competing line to the London and North-Western Railway Company, whereas now, they put forward a proposal which is virtually for amalgamation with them. It will be a great injustice, if one joint owner of a joint station be allowed to hand over its interest, without the other joint owner being heard. Under the Bill, and the heads of agreement contained in the schedule, the London and North-Western and the Midland Companies with regard to traffic coming from any part of their extensive systems to Carlisle to be exchanged with Scotland, may make such arrangements as they think fit, provided only that they are not inconsistent with the heads of agreement. The result of such an enactment, if passed, would be, that the companies might make arrangements in favour of one only of the three Scotch companies, diverging at Carlisle, and might direct the traffic along the line of whichever of those companies they chose, or they might impose onerous conditions on any or all of those companies in giving them a through rate. Under the Scotch Amalgamation Bills, companies, standing in the position in which the Caledonian Company stands towards the present promoters, were heard, and obtained facilities and running powers and protective powers over the whole of the amalgamated systems. This may not be an amalgamation Bill, as far as the shareholders of the North-Western and Midland are concerned; but practically it is an amalgamation Bill in its effects upon other companies. We contend that the whole object of the Bill is to diminish competition; in the first place, by the abandonment of the line from Settle to Carlisle, and, in the next place, by the very wide power of making agreements taken in the 23rd clause. By the Act of 1865, under which running powers were given to the Midland Company and to the London and North-Western Company over the Scotch lines, the Caledonian Company obtained power to run from Carlisle to Ingleton, there to join the Midland Railway, which at that time was a line competing with the London and North-Western. The power so given to the Caledonian Company was a valuable protection, but if the Bill passes in its present shape, that power will virtually become useless. The Caledonian Railway Company, therefore, claim the right of going before a committee to ask, in the interests of the public, that they shall have further powers given them over the system of the Midland Railway, in view of the entire alteration of circumstances which will take place, when the Midland Railway is brought to Carlisle along the rails of the London and North-Western.

Venables, Q. C. for the promoters.—There is no pretence for saying that the petitioners are injured. When the Settle and Carlisle Act was under discussion in 1866, it was admitted, on all hands, that the Midland Company must get to Scotland through Carlisle, and the only question was, whether they should go from Settle to Carlisle by a direct line, or should follow the course of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway. To the Caledonian Company, and to every other Scotch company, it is imma-passes along the Settle and Carlisle line, as proposed in 1866, or along the Lancaster and Carlisle line, as now proposed. Their only interest is that it should reach Carlisle. When the Settle and Carlisle Bill was before Parliament, the Caledonian Company petitioned and obtained a locus standi, because the Midland proposed to take powers over the Citadel Station; and the Caledonian contended that the Midland should do exactly what they are going to do by this Bill. Now, however, the promoters take no new powers over the Citadel Station; they simply leave matters with respect to that station as they were left in 1866; the clause in the Act now in force is continued, and will be used for the same purposes which were then contemplated, i.e., to take the Midland traffic into the station. The Caledonian Company are no more affected by the change in the mode of approaching Carlisle than they would be by a deviation of the authorised Settle and Carlisle line. The Midland Railway Company, in fact, will come into Carlisle by the same door as before.

The CHAIRMAN.—Yes; but they will come in arm in arm with the London and North-Western.

Venables.—We shall come in the same way that we already have the right to come, striking the Carlisle station at precisely the same point. No change is made in any existing agreement with the petitioners. As things stand at present, the Midland Company and the London and North-Western Company have a separate interest to exchange as much traffic as possible with the Caledonian Company. When the Bill passes, they will have a joint interest to do the same thing. Objections of a very similar character to those now raised, and apprehensions closely resembling those expressed by the petitioners, have been urged on a former occasion, and held not to constitute ground sufficient for granting a locus standi:

North British and Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Companies Bill 1865; Petition of the Great Northern Railway Company, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 401.

The Caledonian doubtless wish to take this opportunity of trying to get running powers somewhere. But the question for the court is, have the petitioners any substantial interest under the Bill, and what is the injury that will be done to them?

The COURT, after consultation, decided that the Caledonian Company had not a locus standi.

Locus standi disallowed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, June 23.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

ALLEN v. JARVIS; JARVIS v. ALLEN.

Accounts—Solicitor—Bills of costs—Direction to taxing master to assist the judge—Cons. Order XL., rule 25—Order in chambers—No adjournment into court—Appeal from—Application for leave to appeal.

J. was solicitor of A., the testator in these causes, for many years before his death, and was appointed one of his executors. He delivered his bills to the testator's widow, an executrix, and the amount was paid by a cheque drawn by J. himself upon the bankers of the executors, who were three in number. This was in June 1843, soon after which J. died; and in 1865, a suit to execute the trusts of the will was instituted, and accounts of moneys received by the executors were directed. J.'s executor carried in the bills as items of discharge of his testator's estate, and the M. R., in chambers, without being attended by counsel, directed the taxing master "to tax and settle the bills" in respect of items which the persons beneficially interested in the estate questioned:

Held, on appeal against this order, that, as the Cons. Order above referred to provided that the judge may direct the taxing master to assist him in settling the costs, the order was erroneous, and it was varied by substituting a direction to the master to inquire and state whether any, and which, of the disputed items were fair and proper to be allowed, and to what amounts respectively.

Where under the above circumstances a judge has made an order, it is irregular for him to give leave to appeal against it, and application for such leave must be made to the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal motion to discharge an order of the Master of the Rolls made in chambers, by which his Lordship had, under the 25th rule of the 40th Consolidated Order, directed the taxing master to tax and settle the bills of costs of Weston Jarvis deceased, who had acted as solicitor for the testator in the cause, in respect of certain items specifically complained of by the plaintiffs, in order to assist the chief clerk, in taking the accounts directed by the decree in the cause, to decide upon a proper allowance to Weston Jarvis's executors in respect of such bills.

The circumstances were as follows:

The testator in the two causes afterwards mentioned, Thomas Allen, by his will, dated the 14th Sept. 1841, after appointing his wife Fanny Allen, Fountaine Hogge, and the aforesaid Weston Jarvis, his executors, and making divers specific bequests, gave and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to Weston Jarvis and Whincop Jarvis upon trust for his wife for her life, or so long as she should continue his widow, and after her death or second marriage upon trust for the said Fountaine Hogge for life, and after his death upon trust for the first son of the said Fountaine Hogge who should attain the age of twenty-one years, or die under that age leaving male issue; and if there should be no such son, then upon trust for Stephen Allen for life, with ulterior limitations in favour of the son of Stephen Allen and otherwise, which it is unnecessary now to state.

Upon the death of Thomas Allen, which took place on the 25th Oct. 1841, the will was proved by all the three executors. Mrs. Allen never married again, and died on the 16th Jan. 1857, having by her will appointed the said Weston Jarvis and Whincop Jarvis, and also Edward Hogge and William Seppings, her executors. Weston Jarvis died on the 19th Oct. 1857, having by his will appointed as his sole executor the said Whincop Jarvis, who duly proved the same. Fountaine Hogge died on the same day as Weston Jarvis, but later in the day, and he was the last survivor of the three executors of the testator Thomas Allen. His sole executrix was Caroline Clarke, who thus became the sole legal personal representative of the testator also.

The gift over to Stephen Allen and his son took effect on the death of Fountaine Hogge, by default of such son of his as the will mentioned, and Stephen Allen became entitled to the residuary personalty for his life. On the 2nd May 1865 h and those interested therein in remainder instituted the suit of Allen v. Jarvis, to which Whincop Jarvis (as executor of Weston Jarvis), Edward Hogge and William Seppings (as executors of Mrs. Fanny Jarvis), and Caroline Clarke (as executrix of Fountaine Hogge, and, therefore, legal personal representative of the testator Thomas Allen), were named defendants. The bill alleged, amongst other things, that Weston Jarvis had been the solicitor of the testator, and had improperly retained in respect of bills of costs parts of the residuary personal estate, and it prayed execution, under the direction of the court, of the trusts of the will of Thomas Allen, and the usual accounts against his executors.

About the same time Whincop Jarvis filed his bill against the persons interested as aforesaid for execution of the trusts of the will.

Both causes were heard together, and on the 11th Feb. 1867 the Master of the Rolls made a decree in both, by which accounts were directed of the receipts of Weston Jarvis and the other executors, and those who represented them. Amongst other items which Whincop Jarvis, on the accounts being taken, claimed to have allowed to him as executor of Weston Jarvis, were bills of costs of Weston Jarvis, which amounted together to 599*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* It was alleged that these bills were incurred by the testator in his lifetime, and that the business was done between the years 1830 and 1841. After his death Weston Jarvis delivered these bills to Fanny Allen, and they were paid, as it appeared, by a cheque for the aggregate amount, dated on the 23rd June 1843, which was drawn by Weston Jarvis alone, and was paid out of the banking account of the executors of the testator, Thomas Allen.

The 25th rule of Cons. Ord. XL., provides that where an account consists in part of any bill of costs, or where the judge is authorised to fix the amount of costs under the 24th rule, the judge may direct the taxing master to assist him in settling such costs . . . and the taxing master, on receiving such direction, shall proceed to tax such costs, and shall have the same powers . . . as if the same had been referred to him by an order, and he shall return the same with his opinion thereon to the judge by whose direction the same were taxed.

Acting under this order the Master of the Rolls made the order now complained of to the effect already stated. It was made in chambers by the judge in person, but without the presence of counsel. Soon afterwards the defendant Jarvis made an ex parte application at the Rolls for leave to appeal against it, although the case had not been adjourned into court, or argued by counsel, and his Lordship granted the application.

The appeal was now brought on, but it was not until considerable progress had been made in the arguments that their Lordships became aware of the circumstances under which the appeal was brought before them.

Jessel, Q. C. and Batten supported the appeal, and Southgate, Q. C. and Cracknall his Lordship's order.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—This case comes before us in a most unsatisfactory position, and the further discussion of the matter has only tended to confirm the impression which was entertained and expressed by the Lord Justice and by myself, that an appeal ought not to be brought before this court under circumstances similar to the present; and I entirely agree with what the Lord Justice has said during the argument, that such an appeal as this will not be allowed for the future in this court. And, speaking with the greatest respect for his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, I am satisfied that, if the matter had been brought to his attention, he would not have thought of giving any direction as to liberty to appeal to this court. The proceedings of this court must be conducted in a regular way, and an application for leave to appeal in an irregular manner to this court must be heard by us and us alone. I hope, therefore, it will be understood that, although for the sake of saving expense—as this matter had proceeded so far before we were aware of all the circumstances under which it came before us—we have thought right to deal with it, we shall not do so on any future occasion in a case similarly circumstanced.

Proceeding then to that which is the matter in dispute, it appears that the testator in this case died in 1841, but that the decree under which we are now proceeding, which is a decree for an account, was not made until the 11th Feb. 1867; and it is obvious from the mere statement of these dates, that the executors against whom these accounts are directed are necessarily placed in a position of considerable difficulty when called upon to bring in a discharge under such a decree. But, on the other hand, the court in taking such an account always bears in mind (and, from my long experience in the Rolls Court, I may say that, of all judges of this court the Master of the Rolls especially bears in mind) the length of time which has elapsed, and always in taking the account gives to the person rendering the account such a reasonable allowance in respect of that lapse of time as the justice of the case requires. But upon this present appeal motion, which is a proceeding under that decree, which does not in any degree question the justice of the decree or any portion of it, we must take it to be a fact clearly established, that justice requires that a decree for a general account should be made against these executors, including Mr. Lewis Whincop Jarvis, the executor of Mr. Weston Jarvis. Then under these circumstances he brings in a discharge in the ordinary manner, and among the items in that discharge are included certain bills of costs. It appears to me that it would be impossible to contend with any success that the parties beneficially interested, who have obtained that decree, and who are consequently entitled to that account, are not entitled to question those items.

Then, if they are entitled to question them, the general order of the court (the 40th Cons. Ord. Rule 25), is that the judge taking that account, where a part of it relates to a bill of costs, or where the judge is authorised to fix the amount, may direct the taxing master to assist him in settling the matter. And it would be, I think, a very strong thing for the Court of Appeal to interfere with the discretion of the judge who had, in taking such an account, desired the assistance of the taxing master, in settling the account. That is the first abstract question which we have to decide, viz., whether this order ought to be discharged or not; and it appears to me, having regard to the fact that there is a general decree for an account, that the plaintiff's right to that account is indisputable, that this is an item in the discharge, that these bills of costs are items included in the accounts, and that the judge has desired the assistance of the taxing master, we cannot discharge that order.

Then there arises the question, which really comes to be reduced to a question of words, as to the terms in which such an order ought to be expressed. It is admitted, of course, that after this lapse of time the matter as between solicitor and client is settled; the question is, whether the executor, or the executor of the executor, is to be allowed these amounts. And then we find that in this particular case the bill of costs was the bill of costs of one of the executors, and that he, in conjunction with his co-executors, was in fact paying his own bill. That, of course, very greatly strengthens the case in favour of the persons beneficially interested in the estate when they come and say that the matter must be looked into. Then it is to be looked into. But the terms of the order, which I do not believe were brought to the notice of the learned judge at all, do not, as is the usual form familiar to us all, direct the moderation of these bills, but they direct that the taxing master is to tax and settle the bills. That certainly is not according to my impression of what has always been in the practice of the court the proper form, without anything more to direct the moderation of the bill, under circumstances such as exist in the present case; that is to say, where the testator has been dead for a great length of time, where the bills have in fact been paid, and where the question in substance is, whether these bills are fair and proper, and such as ought to be allowed to the executors in their discharge under the existing circumstances. I think, therefore, that without in the least degree interfering with the judgment, or with the discretion, of his Lordship the Master of the Rolls (for I believe that neither judgment nor discretion has been exercised by him at all with reference to the terms of this order), the order ought to be modified in the way I have suggested, by striking out those words by which it is directed that the taxing master shall tax and settle the bills, and making it an order that he shall inquire and state whether any and which of the disputed items marked in red ink in the bill referred to marked 174 are fair and proper to be allowed, and to what amount respectively.

But I may again say if the discretion and judgment of the Master of the Rolls in such a matter had been exercised, and if he had wished to have the assistance of the taxing master with respect to these particular items, I should have been very loth indeed to have interfered with such a discretion. But as I am satisfied that no such discretion has been exercised by him, and that the matter has not been brought to his attention at all, I am bound to exercise my own discretion in the matter without any such restraint. I think, therefore, that the justice of the case will be best met by leaving the matter entirely unprejudiced, to be decided in the usual way by his Lordship, and under the very unsatisfactory circumstances in which this case has been brought before the Court of Appeal, I think the right course with respect to costs will be to direct that both parties in this matter should bear their own costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I quite agree with what my learned brother has said as to the very unsatisfactory manner in which this appeal has been brought before the court. It is also clear to my mind that the form of this order was not brought to the attention of the Master of the Rolls, and certainly that it was not brought to his attention, regard being had to the mode in which the chief clerk proposed to send the matter to the taxing master.

Now, with respect to the two items, the one numbered 174, which is the subject matter of the appeal, although a great lapse of time with reference to that item has taken place since these costs were incurred, and since the sums were paid, yet, having regard to the fact that there is a decree for an account, and the much more important fact that the executor has paid himself, I think it right that there should be an inquiry to ascertain whether, as regards the particular items complained of, the bill is a fair and proper bill or not. That is the proper form, and not the form adopted by the order, which was to tax and settle the bills, and of course if the taxing master followed the order, he would simply tax in the ordinary way, and not adopt the course which is the right and proper one, namely that the mere items appearing upon the face of the bill should be looked at, and, having regard to those items, that the master should say whether they are fair and proper items.

That being so, the order will be varied as my learned brother has suggested, and I quite concur with him in saying that neither party ought to have the costs of this appeal; and I may repeat that, whenever an appeal is brought in the shape in which this appeal is brought before the court, we shall undoubtedly decline to hear it.

ALTON v. HARRISON.

POYSER v. HARRISON.

Fraudulent deed—Security to creditors—Possession by debtor notwithstanding conveyance of whole of his property—Preference—Subsequent sequestration—Statute 13 Eliz. c. 5.

By an order in the above-named suits H. was ordered to pay into court by a day fixed a sum found due from him in respect of certain trust moneys. He became aware that sequestration in respect of those moneys would be issued against him, and before the day for payment into court he executed a deed whereby he assigned by way of mortgage the whole of his property to trustees for the benefit of five of his principal creditors, not including amongst these the persons interested in the trust moneys. The deed contained a proviso for redemption on payment of the debts due to the five creditors within six months, and another proviso that H. should continue in possession of the property for six months, but not so as to let in or permit any execution, sequestration, or other process, and in case any such should be enforced, or attempted to be enforced, that the possession of H. should cease and determine. Default was made by H. in payment of the trust moneys, upon which a writ of sequestration was issued, and the sequestrators seized part of the property of H. On motion by the trustees under the deed the sequestrators were ordered to withdraw, that possession might be delivered to the trustees, and on appeal,

Lord Justice Giffard confirmed that decision, the question being whether the deed was invalid under the statute of 13 Eliz., and not whether it was a fraudulent preference of the five creditors.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs in the first suit against an order of Stuart, V.C., the hearing of the original motion before whom is reported in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1001, where the circumstances are fully stated.

Dickenson, Q. C. and Solomon appeared to support his Honour's order.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—I will not trouble you, Mr. Dickinson. I have no doubt that Mr. Harrison executed this deed at a time when he knew perfectly well that execution would be issued against him under the decree. Of that I have not the least doubt. At the same time I have no doubt also but that the law has been most accurately laid down by the Vice-Chancellor, and consistently with a large body of authorities which now exist on the subject. What the Vice-Chancellor says in his judgment is this: "In this, as in all other cases of the same kind, the question is as to the bona fides of the transactions. If the deed of mortgage and bill of sale was executed by Harrison honestly for the purpose of giving a security to the five creditors, and was not a contrivance resorted to for his own personal benefit, it is not void, but must have effect."

Now there is not a suggestion but that under this deed these five creditors are to have the property, and that they are secured by it. There were, in point of fact, but two arguments raised upon the deed—the one, upon the form of the proviso in the deed with reference to the retention of possession by Mr. Harrison; and the other, that the deed comprises the whole of the bankrupt's property. With reference to the form of the proviso in the deed, I cannot infer, and certainly should not infer from that, that this deed was not to operate according to its tenour and effect. It is, in point of fact, a mortgage, and a mortgage which was not to be absolute for six months unless, previously to that time, there was execution; and, if previously to that time execution issued, then the trustees were to take possession of the property. Upon the evidence there can be no question but that the deed was intended to have that effect. That is so much as to the form of the deed, and so much as to the circumstances attending it.

Then, with reference to its comprising the whole of Mr. Harrison's property, we are not now dealing with bankruptcy at all, this being a question raised as between the execution-creditor and these five creditors who are secured by this deed. I asked the question, during the argument, why proceedings in bankruptcy have not been taken. The only answer I got was that a decision upon the validity of this deed was desired on this application. I can quite understand a decision being desired on this application, because, if this deed were held to be bad, then the result would be precisely that which is now complained of. The execution-creditor would be paid in full, and the other creditors would be left without anything. I have no hesitation in saying that, in principle, there can be no difference under the Statute of Elizabeth whether a man prefers his creditors with part of his property, or whether a man prefers his creditors with the whole of his property. If the deed is bona fide and without fraud (which means this, if the deed is to operate according to its tenour and effect, and is not a mere cloak for providing something for the benefit of the person who makes it), then that is a good deed, and you cannot complain of it under the statute.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. I think further it never ought to have been brought, and one has some satisfaction in thinking also that the bankrupt laws afford means by which any injustice in a case of this sort may readily be avoided; for certainly it would be exceedingly unjust to set aside this deed in order that one particular execution-creditor should be paid in full, to the detriment of all the other creditors.

Re THE LONDON AND COUNTY GENERAL AGENCY ASSOCIATION (LIMITED);

Ex parte PULBROOK.

Practice—Order settled—Appointment for passing—How to be made—Notice of—Cons. Ord. I, Rules 24, 25, and 27.

When it is desired to have a time fixed by word of mouth for passing and entering an order, which the parties have attended to settle, it should be done, in the presence of the parties, by the registrar himself; and when applications for an appointment are made to the clerk of the registrar, they should be simply applications for fixing a time in writing, which must be then served on the other parties in the manner prescribed by the General Orders.

And accordingly where, after appearing before the registrar to settle an order, the parties adjourned to the room of the clerk, from whom the solicitor having the carriage of the order obtained an appointment to pass it, of which appointment he alleged that he forthwith gave notice by word of mouth to his opponent, but which notice that opponent declared he never heard or was aware of, leave to vary the order, notwithstanding that it had been passed and entered, was given.

This was an original application, by special leave of the Court of Appeal, on behalf of Mr. Anthony Pulbrook, a solicitor of the court, that an order made by their Lordships in the matter of the winding-up of the London and County General Agency Association (Limited), upon an application of Mr. James Little, might be discharged or set aside, notwithstanding that the same had been passed and entered.

The order which it was now sought to discharge or set aside was dated the 23rd June 1869, and by it their Lordships ordered that Mr. Little's name should be struck out of an order of Stuart, V.C., dated the 18th Nov., by which his honour had settled Mr. Little's name on the list of contributories of the association, and out of an order of their Lordships dated the 10th Feb. 1869, refusing with costs an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor's order, thus retaining Mr. Little's name upon the list. The report of the hearing upon which the Lords Justices made the order of the 10th Feb. 1869, is in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 157, as Hare's case, the facts being that Mr. Hare, Mr. Little, and numerous other persons had been shareholders in the London Offices Company (Limited), which had amalgamated with the London and County General Agency Association, and, as it was alleged by the official liquidator of the latter, had, under arrangements between the two companies, accepted shares in the latter in lieu of those which they had held in the former. In disputing their liability in the association, Mr. Pulbrook had acted in conformity with a resolution of the London Offices Company, and in chambers, before the Vice-Chancellor, and before the Lords Justices, had professedly represented the whole body of these shareholders, including Mr. Little, but without any express authority from Mr. Little, who by his affidavit alleged that he had never authorised Mr. Pulbrook to appear for him or to use his name, and that until after their Lordships' order of the 10th Feb.

was made, he was not aware that any application had been made on his behalf.

Their Lordships, by their order of the 23rd June, directed that Mr. Little's costs of the application, and the costs of the official liquidator, should be paid by Mr. Pulbrook, excepting such costs as were occasioned by numerous affidavits filed on behalf of Mr. Little, which that gentleman was ordered to pay. But when the minutes of the order were prepared, it appeared that numerous other documents stated to be irrelevant, and of which the respondent, Mr. Pulbrook, had had no notice, were introduced into the list of evidence, as appeared by an affidavit of Mr. Pulbrook's clerk, John Hughes Crossman, in which he stated that on the 29th June he attended on behalf of Mr. Pulbrook to settle the minutes of the draft order; that he objected to the minutes being drawn up in any other way than that the whole of the costs of the affidavits above referred to should be paid by Little, and not a portion of such affidavits only; that he succeeded in that contention, and then noticed that a long list of evidence was attached to the draft order, and he objected to its insertion. The registrar decided that he must insert the evidence in the order, "whereupon I stated that my principal, Mr. Pulbrook, was out of town, and that I thought he would apply to the court on the subject, and the minutes of the draft order were settled by the registrar, subject to the said A. Pulbrook applying to the court as to the evidence to be inserted. The said registrar did not, on the occasion of the settling of the minutes of the said order, in my presence, name any day for the passing thereof, and I am positive that nothing whatever was said by the registrar when we were before him, as to fixing any day or obtaining any adjournment for the passing of the said order, and on leaving the room of the said registrar with the said George Kenrick (the solicitor for Mr. Little) and Messrs. Ditton and Warmington's clerk (solicitors for the official liquidator), I asked Mr. Kenrick to let me then take a copy from the draft order of the evidence proposed to be inserted; but he stated that he could not wait, and that if I called at the registrar's office on the next day I could then take a copy. I accordingly attended on the following day, and for the first time obtained a copy of the evidence proposed to be inserted, and I then told the clerk of the registrar that Pulbrook was going to apply to the court for leave to speak on the minutes, and asked him to stop the said order. And I say I did not then, or on any other occasion, hear, nor had I in any manner directly or indirectly notice, that any appointment whatever had been given for the passing of the said order, and I was not informed by the said Messrs. Rooks, Kenrick, and Harston, or by anyone on their behalf, of any day whatever having been fixed for the passing of the said order, and I never attended the passing of the said order, or knew anything whatever about it, and had I known of such appointment I should have attended the same and objected to the passing of the said order until after an application had been made to the court to speak upon the minutes."

Mr. Pulbrook stated by affidavit that he was absent from town on the 29th June, and being informed by Crossman of what had taken place, he, on the 2nd July, wrote to Messrs. Rooks, Kenrick, and Harston, a letter, in which he stated that, under the circumstances, he was compelled to apply for leave to speak on the minutes, and would instruct counsel to apply that same day, but that in the mean time he must request that they would not proceed with the order. The application was made on the 2nd July, that being the first day on which their Lordships (who were then frequently engaged at the Privy Council) sat, and granted. Mr. Pulbrook then stated that he at once saw the registrar and produced counsel's brief with the indorsement that leave had been so granted, and he also saw the registrar's clerk, who referred to his book and said that "the order had been left for passing and entry the day before, but had not then been given back to the parties as having been passed and entered; whereupon I told him that I had had no notice of passing, and requested him to stop the said order, and he wrote the word 'stop' in the column of his book wherein the date for entry would have to be inserted; and I say that in the common course of practice an order left for passing on the 1st July would not be delivered out, passed, and entered, until the 3rd July. I never knew or heard in any manner whatever of any appointment for passing the said order on the 1st July or any other date; and I never sanctioned or authorised any person on my behalf to attend the passing of the said order, neither, as far as I am aware, did any person attend on my behalf the passing of the said order; and, had I been aware of any appointment to pass the same, I should have attended and objected to the passing thereof until I had applied to the court to vary the minutes, and the passing thereof without my knowledge has taken me by surprise."

The statement of Mr. Crossman as to what took place before the registrar on the 29th June was confirmed by the affidavit of Mr. Edward Cairns, the clerk of Messrs. Ditton and Warmington, who then made the following statement: "The registrar did not, on the occasion of settling the minutes of the said order, in my presence, name any day for the passing thereof, but after we had left the registrar's room, and the presence of the registrar, the said George Kenrick went up to the junior clerk in the outer room, and afterwards came to me and told me that Thursday, the 1st July, at 1.30 p.m. was fixed for passing the said order. I did not hear the appointment given, or know that the said George Kenrick went up to the clerk for the purpose of obtaining it; and the said J. H. Crossman was not, as I believe, with him when he obtained it, and I did not hear the said G. Kenrick tell the said J. H. Crossman of the said appointment, and unless the said G. Kenrick actually told him, as he did me, I do not think the said J. H. Crossman would have heard of it, for I certainly should not have known it myself but for the statement to that effect made to me personally in a low tone of voice by the said George Kenrick. I attended the appointment to pass the said order, but neither the said J. H. Crossman, nor the said A. Pulbrook attended, and to the best of my knowledge no one attended on behalf of the said A. Pulbrook. . . . I examined the engrossment of the order to see if I had any objection to it, and then signed it in pencil and handed it back to the said G. Kenrick, and I did not go before the registrar to pass the said order."

Mr. Kenrick made an affidavit in which he stated that the registrar finally settled the said order on Tuesday the 29th June, and that he immediately, in the presence of Crossman and Cairns, proceeded to the outer room and obtained from the clerk of the registrar, in the usual course of practice, an appointment which he thereupon entered upon the notice paper prescribed by the practice of this honourable court for Thursday the 1st July at 1.30 p.m. to pass the said order; that he thereupon informed Crossman and Cairns of the appointment he had so taken, and the entry on the said notice paper was made by the registrar's clerk in their presence and in his (the deponent's) presence, immediately after the said order had been settled; that where the solicitors attend on the settlement of an order, it is not the practice to give any more formal notice of the appointment to pass than that already stated; "that both the clerks of Mr. Pulbrook, and of Messrs.

Digitized by Google

Ditton and Warmington, took a note of the appointment in my presence, and the clerk of Messrs. Ditton and Warmington in due course attended on the 1st July to pass the said order," when he also attended, and the same was left with the clerk to be signed, passed, and entered in the usual course. He stated that "the said order was settled by the registrar on the 29th June without any qualification whatever, and in accordance with all the objections" made by Crossman, and he was not aware until the 5th July that leave to give notice of motion to vary the minutes had been granted. Mr. Jones, an articled clerk of Mr. Kenrick, confirmed that gentleman's statements; that Mr. Kenrick applied to the clerk for an appointment to pass the order, when Mr. Pulbrook's clerk was present, and did so in a tone of voice loud enough for him (the deponent), who was then about to leave the room, to hear. And another articled clerk, Mr. Goodfellow, stated that he heard Mr. Kenrick apply for an appointment, and heard the clerk state the time; "and I thereupon saw Mr. Kenrick turn round to the clerks attending on behalf of Messrs. Ditton and Warmington, and on behalf of Mr. Pulbrook, who were standing close behind him, within reach, and I heard the said Mr. Kenrick give them notice of the appointment to pass."

The statement that the order was not finally settled was confirmed by an entry in the registrar's book, "settled subject to court," and in the column of the clerk's book there was a short word written in pencil, but so much effaced as to be illegible; and it was suggested that this was the word "stop," mentioned in Mr. Pulbrook's affidavit.

The decision depended upon the 27th rule of the 1st Cons. Order, which is as follows: "When the draft decree or order has been settled by the registrar, he shall name a time, in the presence of the several parties, or else deliver out an appointment in writing of a time for the passing the decree or order. And in the latter case such appointment shall be served on the opposite party in like manner as is directed by the 24th and 25th rules of this order with reference to an appointment to settle the draft decree or order." And the 24th rule provides that a copy of such appointment shall be served on the opposite party one clear day at least before the time fixed thereby for settling the draft decree or order; and the 25th provides that service shall be effected by leaving a copy of the appointment at the place of service of the party to be served, or by sending a copy by post to that place.

When the motion to vary the minutes (leave to make which was granted on the 2nd July) came on, the respondent objected that the order was already passed and entered, and this appearing to be really the case, their Lordships ordered the motion to vary to stand over, with liberty to Mr. Pulbrook to move to set aside or discharge the said order, the two motions to be then in the paper together.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Brooksbank, in support of the motion, contended that whatever Mr. Kenrick might honestly believe that he had done, the Consolidated Order had not been complied with; that no time was named by the registrar himself in the presence of the parties, and that no written appointment for passing was ever made at all. Then there was a conflict of evidence, and in such circumstances the onus probandi was on the party insisting that notice had been properly given to show that what the order required had been actually done.

Karslake, Q. C. and Bradford, for Mr. Little, contended that the universal practice of the registrar's office had been strictly followed in this case, that for certain purposes the clerk of the registrar was equivalent to the registrar himself, and that an appointment by the clerk was the same as if made by the registrar. The registrar did not himself keep the appointment book, and it was impossible that he should personally attend to matters of such routine. Crossman himself stated that after the adjournment to the outer room he had held some conversation with Kenrick, and was therefore near enough to him to hear what was stated to himself as well as to Cairns.

Greene, Q. C. and Cracknall, for the official liquidator of the association, took no part in the argument.

Brooksbank was called upon to reply upon the question of costs only.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—The only question I have to decide on this motion really is whether the 27th rule of the 1st order has been complied with or not. As regards written notice, it is clear that no written notice was given; therefore, we must turn to the first part of the order, and that is in these terms: "When the draft decree or order has been settled by the registrar he shall name a time in the presence of the several parties, or else deliver out an appointment in writing, of a time for passing the decree or order." Therefore, the question is, whether I can be satisfied upon this evidence, which is very contradictory, that there was that description of notice of the time when this order was to be passed. The onus of proving the affirmative rests entirely upon Mr. Kenrick, and he says, according to his notion that proper notice was given. But, on the other hand, we have the evidence of Mr. Cairns and of Mr. Pulbrook's clerk, and I think it is clear that Mr. Pulbrook's clerk did suppose and did say, at that meeting on the 29th, that his principal he supposed would make a motion before the judge to have the minutes varied. Well, it is scarcely possible that the clerk should not have objected to the 1st of July if his attention had been clearly and distinctly brought to the 1st July having been fixed as the day for passing the order. I do not think that that day was fixed and said so that he did hear it. It might have been said so that he might have heard it, but I think that in order to the fixing of the day according to the terms of this order there must really be such an amount of notice in the presence of the parties, as that the parties must have known and had an opportunity of objecting to the day. Therefore, I am satisfied on this evidence that, the affirmative resting on Mr. Kenrick, Mr. Kenrick has not proved that affirmative. I do not think it necessary to go through the evidence. It is contradictory. Mr. Kenrick probably went up to the office, and went straight to the clerk, and got the time fixed, and may have said to three or four people standing by that it was fixed, but I think he was bound to do more than this, and unless he could prove what he swears he does not satisfy me that he gave such notice as is required by the rule. Therefore this order must not stand in the way of the motion which, I understand, is the next motion in the paper to vary these minutes.

I have no doubt that a very loose practice has grown up in the registrar's office. And in the future I desire to lay down this: that where it is desired to have a time fixed by word of mouth for passing and entering the order, that should be done in the presence of the parties by the registrar, and that when applications are made to his clerk they should be simply applications for fixing a time in writing. And if that is followed for the future no such question as this can ever again arise which has occupied the court for several hours. Mr. Greene's client will, of course, have his costs out of the estate of the association. There will be no other costs of the motion.

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED);

COUPLAND'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Creditor holding collateral security—Proof of claim.

Messrs. C. drew two sets of bills of exchange on the B. company, under the authority of the B. company's letter of credit, against two cargoes of cotton. The first set of bills were accepted, but not paid by the B. company, and the second set were not accepted, as the B. company had been ordered to be wound-up before the bills were presented. Messrs. C. sent in a claim in the winding-up to prove for the difference between the amount of the bills and the proceeds of the sale of the cotton. At the date of making this claim Messrs. C. were not holders of any of the bills, and the cotton was unsold. They afterwards took up the bills and sold the cotton, and were admitted to prove for, and received dividends upon, the difference between the amount of the bills and the proceeds of sale of the cotton.

They now sought to increase their claim by the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the cotton:

Held, that, as at the date of their claim, Messrs. C. were not holders of the bills, and had not sold the cotton, they were only entitled to prove for the difference, and not for the gross amount of the bills without deducting the proceeds of the sale of the cotton.

Summons accordingly dismissed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Messrs. Coupland Brothers, of Liverpool, that the amount which they had been admitted to prove as creditors of the banking company might be increased by the sum of 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*, being the value of certain securities deducted from the amount of their claim upon the banking company.

Messrs. Coupland's claim was in respect of six bills of exchange for sums amounting to 56,785*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, drawn under two letters of credit granted by the banking company in favour of Messrs. Coupland and Co., of Bombay, who were identical with Messrs. Coupland Brothers of Liverpool; one of these letters of credit was granted at the request of Messrs. W. H. Daunt and Co., and the other at the request of Mr. M. J. Wilson.

In Nov. 1865 Daunt and Co. instructed Coupland's Bombay firm through the Liverpool firm to purchase for them a quantity of cotton, and at the same time transmitted to the Bombay firm a letter of credit issued by the banking company, whereby Coupland and Co. were authorised to draw upon the banking company bills of exchange to an amount not exceeding 23,150*l.*, to be drawn at six months' sight, accompanied by corresponding bills of lading, to be given up to the banking company on their acceptance of the drafts.

In pursuance of these instructions Coupland and Co. purchased for Daunt and Co., and shipped to England, 1000 bales of cotton, in respect of which they drew upon the banking company two bills for 11,698*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.* and 11,451*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* respectively, which were negotiated at Bombay, and remitted to England, and duly accepted by the banking company.

In March 1866 Mr. Wilson gave similar instructions to the Bombay firm for the purchase of cotton, and sent a similar letter of credit on the banking company for 50,000*l.* The cotton was purchased and sent to England, and Coupland and Co. drew upon the banking company four bills of exchange, amounting altogether to 33,635*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.* These bills were also negotiated at Bombay, and remitted to England, but the banking company had stopped payment before they were presented, and on presentation of them the acceptance was refused, and the following answer was given, "Cannot accept; refer to Coupland Brothers as drawers."

On the 27th April 1866, the banking company was ordered to be wound-up, anp the usual advertisement was issued requiring claims to be sent in on or before the 22nd June 1866. On the 8th June 1866, Coupland Brothers sent in the particulars of their claim for the whole amount of the bills in a letter, in which they stated that the proceeds of sale of the cotton would be applied in reduction of the amount of the bills. At that time Coupland Brothers were not holders of the bills, and the cotton was not sold, but they subsequently took up the bills, and the cotton was sold, and produced 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*; and on the 23rd April 1867, they sent in to the official liquidators of the banking company an account in which they gave credit for the 39,035*l.* 5*s.* 2*d.*; they were then admitted to prove as creditors for 17,778*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, the balance remaining due on the whole amount of the bills, after deducting the proceeds of the sale of the cotton. The first three dividends were accepted by Coupland Brothers on this amount without any question, but they now sought to prove for the whole amount of the bills without deducting the proceeds of sale of the cotton, on the authority of Re Barned's Banking Company, Johnston's case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266. The chief clerk decided against the claim, and the case was adjourned into court.

Jessel, Q. C. and Westlake, for the appellants, submitted that this case came within the decision in Johnston's case. (sup.) They also referred to Kellock's case, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidators, contended that the present case differed materially from Johnston's case, inasmuch as at the date of the claim Coupland Brothers were not holders of the bills, and the cotton had not been sold.

Jessell, Q. C. replied.

Lord ROMILLY.—This is a case of great peculiarity, but I ko not think it comes within Kellock's case, and the cases which followed it, where the rule as to the administration of assets in Chancery applies, and not the rule as to the administration of assets in bankruptcy. The state of the caseis this: It is true that these gentlemen have a claim for 56,000*l.*, but the cotton was to be deducted from it, and instead of making a claim for the whole 56,000*l.*, if they could have made it, they made a claim in June 1866 before the cotton was sold, in which they only claimed the balance after deducting the cotton. They claimed no doubt 22,000*l.*, which was more than they would be entitled to; but, in fact, at that time neither was the cotton sold, nor were the bills taken up by them, and they were entitled to have, and, I think, properly and justly claimed, the amount which would come to them after payment of the sums derived from the sale of the cotton. This case appears to me perfectly distinct from the other cases, which were cases where the person had got the cotton and proved for the whole amount of the bills which were then due. I am of opinion, therefore, that the decision of the Chief Clerk is right, and that the official liquidator was right in only allowing the 17,000*l.* odd. Therefore, I must dismiss the summons. I shall give no costs, because it was a very proper case to bring before the court; but the official liquidator must have his costs out of the estate.

PEARCE v. MORRIS.

Mortgage—Acceptance by mortgagee of amount tendered —Right to conveyance and title-deeds.

A., who had contracted with a mortgagor for the purchase of a portion of the mortgaged property, tendered to the mortgagee the full amount of his principal, interest, and costs, which was accepted by the mortgagee, who, however, refused to convey the legal estate, and to deliver up the title-deeds to A.:

Held, that the mortgagee, having accepted A.'s tender, was bound to convey the legal estate and to deliver up the title-deeds to him, and must pay the costs of the suit for not having done so.

This was a suit to compel a mortgagee to convey the legal estate in the mortgaged property, and to deliver up the title-deeds to the plaintiff, who had contracted with the mortgagor for the purchase of a portion of the mortgaged property, and had paid the mortgagee the full amount of his principal, interest, and costs.

By two indentures, dated respectively the 25th March 1867 and the 11th March 1868, Robert A. Ward mortgaged a piece of freehold land, situate at Maidenhead, to John Crowdy, to secure the repayment of two sums of 1000*l.* and 1400*l.*, and by an indenture dated the 2nd April 1868 he further mortgaged the same piece of land to secure the repayment of the sum of 500*l.* to a Mr. Mackay.

On the 25th Jan. 1869 the three mortgages were transferred to the defendant, William Morris, and on the following day he gave notice to the mortgagor that he would proceed to sell the property under the power of sale contained in the mortgage-deeds within a fortnight, unless he was meanwhile paid the full amount of his principal, interest, and costs. The plaintiff, who had some time previously entered into a contract with the mortgagor for the purchase of a portion of the mortgaged property and accepted the title, subject to certain requisitions being complied with, tendered to the defendant on the 29th Jan. 1869 the full amount demanded by him for principal, interest, and costs, which tender was accepted by the defendant. The plaintiff then requested the defendant to execute a conveyance of the legal estate in the property to him, and to deliver up the title-deeds; but the defendant refused to do more than give the plaintiff a receipt for the amount paid, on the ground that he was trustee of the property for the persons entitled to the equity of redemption.

The plaintiff accordingly filed the present bill praying for a declaration that he was entitled to have the legal estate conveyed to him and the title-deeds delivered up.

Southgate, Q. C. and Villiers, for the plaintiff, submitted that the mortgagee, having accepted a tender of his principal, interest, and costs, from the plaintiff, was estopped from denying his title to redeem, and was bound to convey the legal estate and hand over the title-deeds to him, notwithstanding the fact that there might be other persons interested in the equity of redemption. They cited

Wicks v. Scrivens, 1 J. & H. 215.

Jessel, Q. C. and Nalder, for the defendant contended that the plaintiff, not having completed his purchase, was not entitled to a conveyance of the legal estate, and that the court could not make a decree to that effect in the absence of any of the persons interested in the equity of redemption. The acceptance of the tender was not an admission of the plaintiff's title to redeem, as the mortgagee was obliged to accept the tender or to run the risk of losing subsequent interest.

Lord ROMILLY.—I feel no doubt whatever about this case. When a mortgagee refuses to accept payment from a person who offers to pay him the full amount due to him for principal, interest, and costs, he does so, as Mr. Jessel very properly said, at his own risk; he need not accept it from a person who is a mere stranger to the estate; but if the person making the tender happens to be entitled to redeem, the mortgagee loses his subsequent interest if he does not accept the tender. But when a mortgagee accepts money from a person claiming to be entitled to redeem, it does not lie in his mouth to say that that person was not entitled to redeem him, and he cannot raise the question which he might have raised before he accepted the money. When he receives the money he admits that the person who pays it was entitled to redeem him, and, being redeemed, he is bound to convey the legal estate, and to deliver up the title-deeds to the person who redeemed him. Then, as I asked Mr. Jessel in the course of the argument, who is damnified? The mortgagee is not, because he has received everything he is entitled to, nay more, all that he claims to be entitled to. The mortgagors are not injured, because B. has only been substituted for A., and they are entitled to the same account and equity of redemption against B. as they before had against A. But if a person who has been paid off, and who admits that there is nothing due to him, can turn himself into a trustee for the purpose of creating costs (for that is what it amounts to), it becomes a very serious question for every person concerned, and one which this court ought most earnestly to discourage. As an ordinary rule a mortgagee, who is called on to receive his money, is entitled to have six months' notice, which gives him plenty of time to ascertain whether the person who has given him notice to redeem is entitled to redeem him or not. If the mortgagee threatens to sell the property, unless he is redeemed, and a person comes to him offering to redeem, then he is entitled to inquire whether that person is the mortgagor, or the agent of the mortgagor for that purpose, or whether he is in any other capacity entitled to redeem him, as, for instance, a puisne incumbrancer. If the mortgagee does not choose to inquire, he refuses the tender at his own risk; but he is quite safe if he takes the money, gives the estate up and conveys the property. He has nothing more to do with the property; nobody can make him liable for anything; the mortgage is transferred to another person who is liable in respect of it in a suit for redemption by the mortgagor, exactly as the original mortgagee was. I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Morris, having accepted the money from the plaintiff, was bound to convey the legal estate to the plaintiff, and must pay the costs of the suit for not having done so. There must be a decree for conveyance and handing over the title-deeds to the plaintiff, and if the parties should differ about the form of the conveyance I will settle it myself in chambers.

In 1846, W., an officer of a company, took ten shares in the company in the name of D., in order to qualify him to become a director of the company, which D. had consented to become on W.'s undertaking, that until an Act of Parliament was obtained limiting the liability of the shareholders, he (D.) should not be asked to sign any contract, nor be considered as an ordinary shareholder. No such Act was ever obtained. D.'s name was entered on the list of shareholders, he appointed a proxy to vote for him at a meeting of the company, and he received a dividend on his shares, but he never made any payment in respect of the shares, and, though he received many circulars and applications for calls in which he was treated as a shareholder, he never took any notice of them.

At length, in 1849, on W.'s explaining to the directors the circumstances under which the shares had come into D.'s name, and the undertaking upon which he had consented to become a director, they agreed to compromise the matter by cancelling his shares on payment of all calls which had been made on them, and a resolution to that effect was accordingly passed at a meeting of the board.

1861 the company was ordered to be wound-up, and in 1869 the official manager sought to enforce a call against D. in respect of the shares which had stood in his name.

On an application by D. to have his name removed from the list of contributories:

Held, that the compromise having been acquiesced in for twenty years could not now be opened; that D. was not properly a member of the company, and that his name must be removed from the list of contributories.

Lord Belhaven's case, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 595; 3 De G. J. & S. 41, followed.

This was an application by Mr. Thomas Griffles Dixon to have his name removed from the list of contributories to the Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, under the following circumstances.

In the year 1846 Mr. Dixon was requested by his brother-in-law, Mr. Daniel Wilkie, who was the manager of the company for Scotland, to become a member of the board of directors for Scotland, to which he assented, on Mr. Wilkie's verbal assurance and undertaking that until an Act of Parliament was obtained limiting the liability of the shareholders, he should not be asked to sign any contract nor be considered responsible as an ordinary shareholder. Mr. Dixon made no application for shares, but Mr. Wilkie took the shares in his name, and paid a deposit of 10*l.* thereon on the 23rd June 1846, and Mr. Dixon's name was entered on the list of shareholders, but he never signed the deed of settlement, and never paid any calls in respect of the shares which stood in his name.

On the other hand Mr. Dixon on the 4th May 1846 signed a proxy authorising a Mr. Fenton, a shareholder of the company, to vote for him at a meeting of the company to be held in London on the 13th May 1846. In this proxy Mr. Dixon was described as a shareholder in the company. He also received a dividend on his shares amounting to 6s. in Jan. 1847, and gave a receipt for it.

Applications for the payment of calls were made to Mr. Dixon in Feb. and Aug. 1848, and on several other intervening dates, but he took no notice of these applications till August, when he wrote a letter to Mr. Wilkie, reminding him of the undertaking, on which he had consented to become a director. The letter concludes with these words: "I may remind you that you put down my name and paid the deposit yourself, and you have never asked me to repay you the amount, whatever it is. I wish well to the company, and have uniformly insured my stock with it, but I do not think that under the circumstances I can fairly be held a responsible shareholder."

In Oct. 1848 Mr. Dixon received printed circulars giving notice of the annual general meeting of the company, and of a special general meeting to be held on the 13th Nov. at Chippenham, Wilts, at which meeting it was proposed to determine how far it might be practicable and desirable to permit certain shareholders to retire from the company on certain terms. At the meeting at Chippenham an arrangement was entered into by which certain shareholders were allowed to retire from the company on making certain payments, and giving up their shares to the company. [A full account of the Chippenham arrangement will be found in Lord Cairns' judgment in Houldsworth v. Evans, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211.] Mr. Dixon did not attend the meeting, and did not come within the Chippenham arrangement. Circulars and notices, treating Mr. Dixon as a shareholder, continued to be sent to him from time to time, and he persisted in taking no notice of them till the early part of 1849, when he requested Mr. Wilkie to take the necessary steps to have his name removed from the list of shareholders. Accordingly, on the 2nd March 1849, Mr. Wilkie wrote a letter to the London secretary of the company, stating the circumstances under which Mr. Dixon had become a shareholder, and requesting that his name might be removed from the list. After some correspondence it was in the result agreed that Mr. Dixon's name should be removed upon payment of all the calls which had been made on his shares; and at a meeting of the directors held on the 17th April 1849, it was (amongst other things) resolved that the ten shares of Mr. Thomas G. Dixon be cancelled.

This resolution of the directors was never submitted to any meeting of the shareholders of the company, but in the balance-sheet presented to the general annual meeting of the shareholders on the 23rd Nov. 1849 was included a sum received on account of "shares cancelled," one of the items being "40*l.* received from Mr. Dixon in respect of ten shares." This balance-sheet was audited and the auditors' report was presented to the meeting by the directors and adopted.

Mr. Wilkie died in Dec. 1849. He had paid the 40*l.* in consideration of which Mr. Dixon's shares were cancelled, no payment having ever been made by Mr. Dixon in respect of the shares.

The only clause in the deed of settlement of the company relating to the compromise of claims by the directors is the 164th, which is in the following words:—"That it shall be lawful for the board of directors to pay or discharge any debts or claims owing by or made against the company upon any evidence they shall think proper, and to enter into and make any compromise or composition with respect to any claims made against or owing to the company, and to accept any security, real or personal, for any debt or debts owing to or made by the company, as the board shall think proper; and in case any question or dispute shall arise between the company and any other person or persons, body or bodies, politic or corporate, either to refer the same to arbitration or to settle it in such manner as the board of directors shall think proper."

The company was ordered to be wound-up on the 28th April 1861.

After the cancellation of his shares, Mr. Dixon heard nothing more from the company till March last, when he received notice that the official manager had taken out a summons for a call against him. Mr. Dixon thereupon took out a cross-summons to have his name removed from the list of contributories, and this summons was adjourned into court.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and G. N. Colt, for Mr. Dixon, contended that he was not liable as a shareholder even in 1849; that at all events in 1849 there was a bonâ fide dispute between him and the company as to his liability, and that the compromise which was then made was valid under the 164th section of the company's deed of settlement. They cited

Re The Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, Brotherhood's case, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 56, 142; 31 Beav. 365.

Moreover the lapse of time (twenty years) during which Mr. Dixon had nothing to do with the company rendered it impossible that his name should be fixed on the list of contributories. On this point they cited

Prendergast v. Turton, 1 Y. & C. 98;
Clegg v. Edmondson, 8 De G. M. & G. 787;
Tatam v. Williams, 3 Hare 347.

Southgate, Q.C. and Bush, for the official manager, contended that the present case was quite distinguishable from Lord Belhaven's case (sup.), for there the compromise was reported to a meeting of the shareholders, and by circular to the general body of the shareholders; but the present case was identical with Houldsworth's case in Houldsworth v. Evans, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; L. Rep. 3 H. L. 263. They also cited or referred to the following cases:

Lindley, for the executors of Houldsworth, who had been fixed on the list of contributories by the decision of the House of Lords in Houldsworth v. Evans (sup.), supported the official manager.

Lord ROMILLY.—I feel considerable difficulty about this case. There is no doubt what my opinion has always been. I think that a lapse of twenty years is a bar to such a claim as the official liquidator's in this case, except in case of fraud. I sat very reluctantly in the House of Lords on appeal in other cases in this company, and I did so only because another Lord had also had the case before him. There was a difference of opinion. I agreed with Lord St. Leonards, but there being three opinions the other way, judgment was given against my view. Having expressed that view in the House of Lords, I cannot take the other view now. I cannot distinguish Smallcombe's and Brotherhood's cases from Houldsworth's, or in substance from Spackman's case, and Lord Cranworth expressed a strong opinion in favour of not putting Spackman on the list. I think I must decide the case very much as if no decision had been given on this question. Mr. Dixon appears to me to have grave grounds for disputing his liability; if he had been kept on the list years ago, he would have had his remedy against Wilkie, but that is now impossible. I will compare this case with the other cases in this company, and will give judgment on Monday.

July 26.—Lord ROMILLY.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Dixon's name ought not to have been put on the list of contributories. I will explain the grounds of my decision immediately. The facts are these. The company was formed in 1845. Dixon never executed the deed. That of itself amounts unquestionably to very little, for whatever the effect of it might be at law, in equity it amounts to very little. He consented to act as director in Scotland (I am enumerating all the things that tell most against him), and he did all this at the instance of Daniel Wilkie, and he held the shares at Daniel Wilkie's instance, Daniel Wilkie paying for them. On the 4th May 1846 he executed a proxy for the purpose of voting on these ten shares, and the vote was accordingly taken. On the 26th June Wilkie paid in his name a deposit of 10*l.* on the shares, and in 1847 he received a dividend of a few shillings upon the shares. The consequence of all this is that up to that moment, it is quite clear, he was a shareholder. Though he had not executed the deed, he had consented to take the shares, he had executed the proxy and had received dividends, and his name was returned as in the list of shareholders up to and in the month of Nov. 1848. It was not returned afterwards. Then what took place was this. [His Lordship stated the circumstances relating to the cancellation of the shares.] Now what is the nature of the transaction as it stood at that time? The state of the authorities on the subject is very unsatisfactory; it is such that, the more I look at them the more I feel it impossible to reconcile everyone of them according to the principle which is laid down; I do not think anybody has ever yet succeeded in doing so, or will be able to do so, and you are therefore obliged to deal with each case separately. Upon the whole I think this case comes more near Lord Belhaven's case (sup.), than any other. I am quite clear the directors had power to compromise questions where there were real questions to be compromised. Now was there a real question to be compromised in this case? Mr. Wilkie, whom I consider to be proved to be the agent of the company, asked this gentleman (Dixon) to become a shareholder, which he consented to do, provided the liability was limited, and provided that certain other things were done. In consequence of this he allowed his name to be retained till the Bill was thrown out of Parliament. Thereupon he called upon Wilkie to cancel his shares, and say he was no longer a member of the company, and he obviously intended to take steps for that purpose. The result was that the directors thought that it was very hard upon him to be kept upon the list, and they acceded to Wilkie's view that if he were kept on the list it would be discreditable to the company, and would shake confidence in Mr. Wilkie's proceedings, as it would appear that they had got Mr. Dixon to be a member of the company on certain false pretences. Thereupon they sanction his withdrawal, and from that time nothing further takes place so far as he is concerned. This has nothing to do with the Chippenham arrangement. It is not in the slightest degree connected with or affected by that. In the meantime a great number of other transactions are entered into by the company; Mr. Dixon has nothing to do with them, he has no power or control over them, but now at the end of twenty years he is called upon to be put on the list of contributories. I do not mean to blame the official liquidator for taking no steps for that purpose before, for I do not exactly know the length of time which has been occupied in the proceedings in the Court of Chancery and the House of Lords, under the winding-up for the purpose of settling what the law was on this subject. No doubt a great many years have been occupied in that manner, and of course the official liquidator is not accountable for the delay in not proceeding against Mr. Dixon during all that period of time. But the evil to Mr. Dixon is exactly the same. He might have taken some steps against Mr. Wilkie if he had known that the whole of the transaction was absolutely irregular and illegal. Upon the whole I do not think that the transaction was absolutely void. The utmost that can be said of it is that it was voidable. The directors had full power to compromise questions; they considered that this was compromising a question. If they improperly exercised their judgment in compromising a question to the injury of the shareholders, then the shareholders and the company might have come to set that aside; but they cannot say that it was absolutely void from the beginning and that no time is a bar. I am of opinion that this compromise having been acquiesced in for twenty years without any step having been taken against Mr. Dixon, the official liquidator cannot open the question now and put him in a situation from which he could easily have extricated himself, if what is being done now had been attempted twenty years ago. Nothing would have been more easy then than for him to have got somebody to take the shares and to have got out of the concern altogether. Therefore, although I cannot say that the question is free from difficulty, or that it does not come very near the dicta in the nine or ten cases which have been reported in this company; indeed, it comes very near the dicta on both sides—I am obliged to judge of it for myself alone as it now stands, and I am of opinion that Mr. Dixon is not properly a member of the company, and that his name ought to be taken off the list of shareholders. I must give Mr. Dixon his costs, as I do not put him on the list, and the official liquidator must have his costs. It is very obvious that if the company had become prosperous, and Mr. Dixon wished to become a member of the company, it would be impossible for him to do so, and no step on earth could have restored him to that position. Therefore it is a one-sided transaction, and there is not an equal degree of fairness in now seeking, twenty years after the transaction. to make him liable for debts which he never contracted.

GRIFFITH v. THE CAMBRIAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Land taken by railway company—Unpaid vendor—Decree for specific performance—Act restraining proceedings—Leave to prosecute decree notwithstanding Act.

A., whose land had been taken by a railway company for the purposes of their undertaking, obtained a decree for specific performance against the company. An Act was then passed, which provided that no proceedings against the company should be continued or commenced during the period of five years unless with the leave of the High Court of Chancery.

On a motion by A. for leave to prosecute his decree.

Held, that he must have leave to do so, unless the amount due to him was paid by a given day.

This was a motion under the 36th section of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868 for liberty to prosecute the decree in the suit by proceeding to a sale of certain lands, mentioned in the decree, which had been taken from the plaintiff, for the purposes of their undertaking, by the Aberystwith and Welsh Coast Railway Company, which was now merged in the defendant company.

The plaintiff filed his bill in 1867, and obtained a decree for specific performance against the company and a declaration that he was entitled to have a lien as an unpaid vendor upon the land taken from him by the company, for his unpaid purchase-money, interest, and costs.

By his certificate, dated 15th Feb. 1869, the chief clerk certified that there remained due to the plaintiff, for purchase-money and interest, the sum of 125*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*; and by a further certificate, dated 21st April, he found that there was due to the plaintiff for costs the sum of 164*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, making together the sum of 290*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* Having in vain made several applications for payment of the amount, the plaintiff at length served notice of the present motion.

The 36th section of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868, under which this motion was made, provides that from and after the passing of the Act, and except as by the Act provided, no actions, suits or other proceedings against the company, or affecting the property of the company, except proceedings against the company as carriers of goods or passengers, or in respect of liabilities contracted after the passing of the Act, shall be continued or commenced during the period of five years, unless with the leave of the High Court of Chancery to be obtained on summons or motion in a summary way, and upon such terms as the court may impose; provided that the costs of any action or suit or other proceedings against the company, or affecting their property, which shall be discontinued pursuant to this Act shall be in the discretion of the court, and, if allowed, may be added to the debt.

Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and Chute, for the plaintiff, argued that the plaintiff should be allowed to prosecute his decree, as a similar permission had often been granted by the court under the 87th section of the Companies Act 1862, which was similar to the 36th section of the Cambrian Railways Act. They cited

Symes v. Cambrian Railway Company, 3 W. Notes, 284;

Fry, Q.C. and Humphreys, for the company, contended that the cases under the Companies Act 1862 did not apply to the present case, as the object of the two Acts was quite different, that of the Companies Act 1862 being to facilitate the winding-up of companies which had ceased to work, while the object of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868 was to prevent actions for a given time, in order that the company might continue a working company. They cited,

Re Cambrian Railways Company's Scheme, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 278.

Lord ROMILLY, without calling for a reply, said that the plaintiff must clearly have liberty to prosecute his decree. The company had taken possession of his property, and he must be paid for it. He would have leave to go on with the decree on or after the third seal in Michaelmas Term, if not paid by that time. The company must pay the costs of the motion.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, June 11.

SKIDMORE v. BRADFORD.

Advancement—Obligation—Contract to purchase.

B. agreed to purchase certain property, but having represented to the vendor that the purchase was intended for a nephew, whom he had adopted, the contract was drawn up in the nephew's name. Subsequently the nephew, on the understanding that B. would pay the purchase-money, signed the contract. B. paid part of the purchase-money, but died before the day fixed for the payment of the whole:

Held, that B.'s estate was liable for the payment of the balance.

This was an administration suit. The facts were as follows.

Jacob Bradford, the testator in the cause, wholesale ironmonger at Manchester, had adopted his nephew, Edward Bradford; and brought him up to and given him the management of part of his business.

In Feb. 1867, the testator contracted with one Charles Johnson to purchase a warehouse in Oak-street, Manchester, for the sum of 5000*l.* On the 14th of the same month the testator called upon Johnson, who produced the agreement for the purchase, which purported to be made between Johnson and the testator, and stipulated inter alia, that the purchaser was to pay down a deposit of 2000*l.*, and to pay the residue of the purchase-money on the 25th March 1868, when he was to be let into possession, and in case the purchase was not then completed, the purchaser was to pay interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum.

The testator, however, objected to having his name inserted in the agreement, and said that as he had made the purchase for the benefit of his nephew, Edward Bradford, he wished his name to be substituted for his own.

This was accordingly done, and the testator then paid Johnson 1000*l.* in part payment of the purchase-money, and said he would get his nephew to sign the agreement. The receipt for the 1000*l.* was, in accordance with the testator's direction, made out in his nephew's name.

Subsequently the nephew signed the agreement.

In March 1867 the testator gave his nephew a further sum of 500*l.*, on account of the deposit and the receipt for this amount, as on the previous occasion was made out in the nephew's name.

In May 1867 the testator died intestate, leaving the balance, 3500*l.*, of the purchase-money unpaid, and making no provision by his will, or otherwise for its payment.

The question now to be decided, on further consideration, was whether the residue of the purchase-money was payable out of the testator's estate.

Charles Hall and Russell Roberts for the plaintiff.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Fischer, for Edward Bradford, the nephew, submitted that, as the testator had represented that the purchase of the warehouse was intended as an advancement for his nephew, his estate was liable to make good the representation on the faith of which the nephew had been induced to sign the contract. They cited

Crosbie v. McDoual, 13 Ves. 148;
Reddington v. Reddington, 3 Ridg. P.C., 106;
Hammersley v. De Biel, 12 C. & F. 45.

Karslake, Q. C., C. T. Simpson; Greene, Q. C. and Haddan; Schomberg, Q. C., Jackson, and T. A. Roberts, for various parties interested in the testator's estate, opposed the claim of the nephew on the ground that he was a mere volunteer. They cited

Money v. Jorden, 5 H. of L. Cas. 185;
Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 140, 149.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The case is governed by Crosbie v. McDoual (sup.) If Edward Bradford, the nephew, had been a mere volunteer, there is no principle on which he could come to this court to have the testator's act of bounty completed, and his claim admitted against the testator's assets; but if on the faith of the representations of the testator, he has involved himself in any liability, or has incurred any obligation, he cannot be considered a volunteer, and the testator's assets will be liable to make good the representation on the faith of which he has acted. It has been proved beyond all doubt that the real contracting party was Jacob Bradford; that in making the purchase, his object was to benefit his nephew; that the vendor knew all the circumstances of the purchase; that when the contract was prepared, the testator desired his nephew's name to be inserted therein, and that in consequence of that insertion, the nephew came under a legal obligation to pay the purchase-money. This liability to be sued having been incurred on the faith of the representations of the testator that he would give him the warehouse, brings the case within that portion of the judgment in Crosbie v. McDoual, where Lord Erskine, in adopting the argument of Sir Samuel Romilly says: "Suppose a man the frequent guest of another in the country, adjoining whose seat is a piece of ground that would add considerably to the beauty and enjoyment of the place, but an enormous price is asked; that the guest attached to the place desires his friend to contract for that piece of ground for him, and says he will pay for it, and the other contracts accordingly and pays far beyond the value; would a court of equity permit the man to recede from his engagement? would not that be considered a fraud in respect of the consideration, an engagement contracted at the request of another, into which without that motive the party contracting would not have entered? The Statute of Frauds has nothing to do with it. . . . The principle of law upon these actions is, that though upon a mere voluntary promise, an action at law does not lie, yet if one binds himself to pay, and does pay money in consequence of an obligation undertaken by another, the one has money which in equity and conscience ought to be the money of another; and that is not nudum pactum." Applying this principle to the present case, I am of opinion that the assets of the testator are liable to make good the obligation which has been incurred by Edward Bradford, and that he is entitled to have the balance of the purchase-money paid out of the testator's estate.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, July 22.

BURTON v. EARL DARNLEY.

Practice—Ward of court concealed—Evidence as to residence of ward—Solicitor of parent—Privilege.

E. B., being made a ward of court on bill filed, and a guardian appointed, the mother resisted the order, and removed E. B. to Spain. The mother subsequently came to England and an order was made for delivery up of the ward in a limited time, and her former solicitor was examined in court as to her residence and other matters, and claimed professional privilege:

Held, that he was bound to answer such questions; and generally, that no solicitor or officer of the court, or other person, can refuse to answer any question, or do, or abstain from doing anything, whereby the court is prevented from discovering the residence of its ward.

This was the renewal of an application that Mrs. Burton, mother of Eliza Laura Emma Burton, should within a time fixed, deliver up the said Eliza Laura Emma Burton. Mrs. Burton, who was left a widow in 1865, her husband, Col. Burton having then died, placed her daughter, who was entitled to a considerable fortune, at school at Bayonne. In Sept. 1867, Admiral Burton, who had been appointed testamentary guardian, filed the present bill to be appointed guardian, and that his ward might be appointed a ward of court; and the Vice-Chancellor made the order as vacation judge. Mrs. Burton refused to obey that order, but the French court, on being applied to, confirmed it. She then removed her daughter to some part of Spain, and from that time their residence could not be discovered. It had recently transpired that Mrs. Burton was in England, and a petition having been presented on the 25th June 1869, an order was made upon Mrs. Burton to deliver up the ward, and was served upon her solicitor, Mr. Alfred Markby, but the order not being obeyed, and her residence not being known, he was ordered to attend, and the matter having stood over, he was now examined viva voce by Cotton, Q. C. (Fischer with him) in support of the motion.—Mr. Alfred Markby's evidence was, in substance, that he was the solicitor of Mrs. Burton, but had ceased to be so yesterday. He was aware that she did not obey the order of the court, from which he meant it to be inferred that she had been guilty of contempt; that he communicated the fact to her of the existence of the suit, and that Admiral Burton had been appointed guardian, which appeared by certain letters. But he felt a difficulty as to where the line was to be drawn with respect to disclosing private communications between him and his client; at the same time, having no objection, if he was compelled, to disclose them, and no desire to keep back any information from the court. The question was as to his professional duty, it being clear that a solicitor was not at liberty to disclose confidential communications, whilst he was the solicitor of the party. He believed Mrs. Burton was in England.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Mrs. Burton has set the court at defiance for two years. Mr. Markby is an officer of this court, and I am of opinion that he is bound to answer the questions to enable the court to obtain possession of its ward. On this point no line can be drawn. No officer of this court can aid or abet in concealing the residence of a ward.

Mr. Markby then said that Mrs. Burton was, or lately had been, at 36, Oxford-terrace, Hyde-park; he had addressed a letter to her there; he had ceased to be her solicitor in consequence of a previous arrangement. It was his decided impression that he did not communicate the order made on the petition to her.

Cotton, Q. C. said that the question now was whether there should be an order to commit Mrs. Burton for contempt. She was, in fact, perfectly aware of the whole proceedings. She had ineffectually fought the question in the French court. There could be no doubt that the order ought now to be made, and that she must stand committed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case Eliza Laura Emma Burton, the daughter of Colonel Burton, who died in 1865, up to 1869 resided with her mother, and is now of the age of fourteen. An application was made to me in Sept. 1867, as vacation judge, upon a bill just filed to appoint a guardian, on the representation that she had been placed by her mother in a day school at Bayonne; and this application was on the affidavit of Admiral Burton, the guardian. I made the order till the first day of Michaelmas Term. That was resisted by Mrs. Burton, but the French court to whom she applied gave effect to my order, and it became her duty to deliver up the child to the guardian. Instead of that she set the court at defiance in a manner I never knew before, and possibly never may again, and removed the child to Spain, and every effort was ineffectual in discovering where she was to be found. I may mention that the child was in possession of a very large fortune, and it was of the highest importance that she should be taken care of and properly educated. There being reason to believe that Mrs. Burton had come to England, an order was made that she should appear; and a petition, which was presented on the 25th June last, was served upon Mr. Alfred Markby, her solicitor, to show that he was in communication with her and that letters had passed between them; and on affidavit of service, on the 7th July, I made an order that she should within a time limited deliver up the ward. On the evidence that has been given to-day it must be understood that I give my decision that no solicitor, in consequence of any privilege connected with his client, as in the present case, with respect to Mrs. Burton, and no officer of this court or other person can decline to answer any questions, or be at liberty to conceal any fact, enabling the court to discover the residence of its ward; and this is the result of deliberate consideration on my part. Mr. Markby with great propriety has told us the extent of his communications and the nature of them, although he will not undertake to say that he told Mrs. Burton of the order of the 7th July; but I have no more doubt of its being made than that it was served; and I am satisfied that she is setting the court at defiance, and that she is aware of this order. Mr. Markby has now told us her address, and therefore I now make the order for delivery up of the ward.

RAMSBOTHAM v. SENIOR.

Practice—Ward of court—Solicitor's privilege—Concealment by mother—Production of envelopes of letters.

The mother of two wards of court concealed their residence and her own from the trustees and the court, but wrote to her solicitor giving no address:

On summons for the production of such envelopes, order made.

This was a summons taken out to compel Mr. Patterson, the solicitor of Mrs. Senior, the mother of two infant wards, a son and daughter, aged respectively five and six years, to produce certain envelopes of letters containing no address, and received by him from her. It appeared that the children were entitled to 10,000*l.* a year, and their mother to 2000*l.* a year, under the will of the father of the infants; and they having been made wards of court, the mother attended before the Vice-Chancellor in chambers on more than one occasion, and promised to follow the advice which he then gave her, and to keep the wards within the cognisance of the trustees. These promises, however, had not been kept; she had removed the boy from a tutor with whom he was, and with whose conduct the Vice-Chancellor was well satisfied, and had taken both herself and her children out of the knowledge of the court and the trustees, and their place of abode could not be discovered. Mr. Patterson, her solicitor, had, however, received letters from her, although such letters threw no light upon the matter, inasmuch as they contained no address.

Prendergast, Q. C. and Renshaw, in support of the summons.

J. Pearson, Q. C. and Wickens appeared in opposition to the summons.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The object of this summons is to compel Mr. Patterson, the solicitor of Mrs. Senior, the mother of the infant wards, to produce the envelopes of letters received from her by him, there being not the slightest imputation on his conduct. The children are respectively aged five and six years, and, Mr. Patterson having attended me, I put the question to him whether he knew their residence, and he told me that he did not; and I am satisfied the fact is that this lady, the mother of two children entitled to 10,000*l.* a year under the will of their father, is educating and bringing them up with the greatest impropriety. I have seen her repeatedly in chambers, and given her my advice, which she said she would follow; whereas she has been playing at hide-and-seek with the trustees, which alone renders her liable to be proceeded against, and, in addition, having undertaken to let them know where she was, in defiance of that she absented herself with her children, and all efforts have been in vain to discover where she is. Being entitled to 2000*l.* a year under her husband's will, I have directed the bankers to stop making any payment to her on that account, in hopes, if possible, of forcing her to capitulate. That, however, is not now the question, but whether Mr. Patterson, her solicitor, from whom she has concealed her residence, but to whom she has written, can be compelled to produce the envelopes of those letters, it being possible (not probable) that if they are produced it may turn out that the letters have been posted where she resides, and it may lead to the discovery of her residence. My impression in chambers was, and is now, that no officer of this court nor other person can have any privilege to keep back any information which may lead to such discovery. I don't agree with Mr. Wickens in his view on the subject. I think it would be aiding and abetting in concealing the residence of the ward. Now, with respect to the privilege; I believe I am right in saying the rule is, that the privilege is not that of the solicitor, but of his client, and therefore, if the client has none, the solicitor has none. Now, this is the case of a lady who has been guilty of a contempt of this court in defying its order and taking away children who ought to be under its custody; and I cannot imagine an instance of greater impropriety. She can have no privilege to conceal their residence, in itself a contempt of court of the highest kind. If she has none, how can her solicitor? It is indifferent to him, and he can have no object except to do what is right, and his duty towards the court. This is in fact the bill of the wards themselves, and the principle expressed in most of the cases on the subject leads to an opinion upon which I am more decided than before, that no person, whether solicitor or not, has any privilege in any way to do or abstain from doing that which has the effect of concealing a ward from the court. I do not put the case on the circumstances occurring with respect to Mrs. Senior in particular, for where it is a question of giving up wards of court there is no difference on the question of privilege. The court has a right to say that a child shall not remain anywhere except under the right legal control, and I have the gravest duty to perform as to who should have the dominion. When the mother brings them before me I shall consider whether the girl shall remain with her, or with the guardian, or go to a proper school. As to the boy, it was a great act of contempt to take him away from the person with whom he was placed, for I saw the gentleman, and he gave me the highest opinion of his ability and diligence; and I have invited counsel to tell me if there is anything to be found in the practice of this court or the suggestion of any principle that any person, whether an officer of this court or not, is permitted to conceal the residence of a ward, or to do anything preventing the court which has the custody of the wards from putting them under the proper custody, and this protection thus afforded them is of the highest importance. With respect to Mrs. Senior's moral character there is no fault; but, supposing wards were in the possession of a woman of abandoned character, the court will remove them from such undue influence and put them under proper control. But can it be for the public benefit, and for the preservation of civil rights, that a solicitor should not be at liberty to disclose that which is the privilege of the client when it tends to conceal the residence of a ward? There is a wide distinction between this and the ordinary cases of privilege, and the principle can have no application in such a case as this. I believe that I made a right order in Burton v. Earl Darnley (ante, p. 292), where I directed a solicitor to answer a question, and decided that it was the duty of anyone to do so in such a case, and if he knew anything tending to afford the required information, I should tell him to disclose it. In most cases, no doubt, it may be a question whether he has papers or documents which may be privileged, or which he may be bound to produce; but I intimated in chambers, and I have carefully considered it to-day—and I had occasion during the last week to think much of it—that I could find no authority, and none has been supplied me, which concludes the question, but it is left open. I therefore decide that no solicitor can be privileged to refuse to give the court any information which will discover the residence of a ward. There must therefore be an order for production of the envelopes.

Re KEARSLEY'S TRUSTS.

Will—Construction—Vested interest.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to trustees to invest same and pay the income to her three daughters, M., H. and H., and the survivors, so long as they should continue unmarried, with similar directions on their deaths or marriage to go over for the benefit of the other five daughters. She also provided that in case the last survivor of her daughters should die without having been married, then "immediately after her decease" the residue should be "in trust for all my daughters who shall have been married, in equal shares and proportions; but in case any one or more of my said last-mentioned daughters shall be then dead," as well the original as any other share or shares of her so dying, should be in trust for the children or child of such daughter or each of such daughters respectively in equal shares, if more than one, to be vested at twenty-one:

A child of one of the married daughters, A. G., attained twenty-one, and died unmarried:

Held, that her share went over for the benefit of the other daughters of the testatrix.

This was a petition filed by the personal representatives of Anne Gorst to obtain the construction of the will of a testatrix under which as it was contended, Anne Gorst took a vested interest in a portion of the residue of testatrix's estate, under the following circumstances:

Ann Kearsley, the testatrix, by her will dated 25th Jan. 1838, bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to trustees, upon trust to invest same (with the usual powers to charge, &c.), and pay the income unto equally and amongst her daughters Mary, Harriet, and Henrietta, and the survivors and survivor of them, during such period of their lives as they should continue unmarried. If any of her said daughters who should be unmarried at her death should afterwards marry, her or their life estate was to cease and be in trust for her other unmarried daughters, in equal shares, during such period of their lives as they should continue unmarried. She also made a provision for daughters who should marry after her decease, and directed that in case the last survivor of her said unmarried daughters should die without having been married, then, "immediately after her decease" the residue should be in trust for "all my daughters who shall have been married, in equal shares and proportions; but in case any one or more of my said last mentioned daughters shall be then dead," as well the original as every other share or shares of her or them so dying should be in trust for the children or child, "and of such daughter or each of such daughters respectively, in equal shares, if more than one to be vested, at twenty-one." She afterwards directed, "in case such deceased daughter or daughters respectively shall not have had any child or children, or, having such, all of them shall die under the age of twenty-one years, and without having any issue, him, her, or them surviving," the original and other shares of each such daughter should be upon such trusts for the others or other of the married daughters and children as were then declared concerning the original share or shares of such daughters.

At the time of making her will, the testatrix had eight daughters living, four of whom were unmarried, viz., Mary, Harriet, Henrietta, and Elizabeth; and four married—Anne (the wife of S. Gorst), Catherine (the wife of S. Young), Margaret (the wife of Jno. Gorst), and Charlotte (the wife of Charles Robinson.)

Anne Gorst had one daughter, who attained her age of twenty-one, and died unmarried in 1836.

The testatrix did in 1839.

In Sept. 1865 the surviving daughter, Harriet Kearsley, died, and the fund then fell into possession.

The trustees paid the fund representing the residue of testatrix's personal estate into court, and the question now raised was whether on the death of the testratix the interest which Anne Gorst took under the will became vested, or whether it was devested at her death and went over for the benefit of the other daughters, such of them as had had children.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and B. L. Chapman, for the petitioners, the representatives of Anne Gorst, contended that a vested interest could not be devested except by express words. It could not be said that Anne Gorst had not had a child, although that child had died without having been married, but she had reached her age of twenty-one, and therefore the share of Anne Gorst did not go over.

De Gex, Q. C. Cutler, and Otter for parties taking adverse interests to Anne Gorst, and Peck for the trustees, were not called upon by the court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that there could be no doubt as to what the intention of the testatrix was, as expressed by her will. It was perfectly plain. If either of the daughters should have a child, at her death it was to take a vested interest. If, on the other hand, she should have none, the share was to go over for the benefit of the other daughters. Anne Gorst had not a child surviving at the death of the testratrix; she therefore took no interest in the fund; that share consequently went over.

Order and declaration accordingly.

Criminal information—Libellous article in a newspaper pending an inquiry.

A party having been charged before the coroner with the crime of murder, a newspaper, pending the inquiry, published an article strongly reflecting upon him as a murderer. Having been committed for trial, he was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour.

Upon an application by him for a rule for a criminal information for such article, the court declined to interfere on the ground that there was no personal malice suggested, and that the article could now exercise no prejudicial influence.

Littler moved on the behalf of William Smith for a rule calling upon Francis Goodlake, the publisher of the Times newspaper, to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for a libellous article inserted in that paper of the 29th Sept. last, reflecting in very strong language upon the applicant as the brutal murderer of his wife.

It appeared that in the said month of September the applicant was charged before the coroner of Middlesex, with having at Hounslow been guilty of murder by killing his wife. Whilst the inquiry was pending, the article in question appeared. At the termination of the inquest the jury brought in a verdict of guilty of wilful murder, whereupon the applicant was committed to trial; and, upon such trial before Lush, J. at the Central Criminal Court, the jury found him guilty of manslaughter, and he was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour, which term he is now serving.

It was now contended that the article was unjustified by the circumstances and the evidence, and was a serious and injurious reflection upon the accused. [COCKBURN, C.J.—As the facts have been thoroughly sifted at the trial, and he has been acquitted of the murder and found guilty only of manslaughter, it is difficult to see how he has been prejudiced.] He may be greatly prejudiced in this way; many persons may have read the article who had seen no account of the trial.

The COURT were of opinion that as there was no reason to suppose that the writer of the article was influenced by personal malice, and as the article could not now exercise any prejudicial influence, they ought not to interfere by the summary and prerogative process of a criminal information, but leave the party to his ordinary remedies.

Application refused.

Held, by the Court of Error (Cockburn, C.J. and Keating, Lush, Brett, and Hayes, JJ.) reversing the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the 68*th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act* 1845, although included under the heading "with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement" introduced between sects. 15 & 16 of that Act, is nevertheless expressly excluded and excepted out of the City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.) by the 3*rd section of that Act; and that consequently the owner of a house and premises which had been injuriously affected by the public works of the defendants executed under the powers vested in them by the last-mentioned Act, for which no provision for compensation was thereby specially made, was not entitled to compensation from the defendants' under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act* 1845. (Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas-Light Company, 26 L. J. 276 Ch., distinguished.)

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Pigott and Cleasby, BB.), delivered in Michaelmas Term last, upon a special case, which involved the construction to be put upon certain sections of the City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii, local and personal), and also of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18). It was originally an action for damages done to the plaintiff's house and premises by certain public works executed by, or under the orders and authority of, the defendants in pursuance and by virtue of the powers vested in them as Commissioners of Sewers by their said Act; and the plaintiff also claimed compensation for the said damage under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

It appeared, from the facts stated in the special case, that the plaintiff was a licensed victualler, who was possessed of a house and premises, which he occupied as a tavern or hotel, in Liverpool-street, in the City, and that he claimed compensation from the defendants under the City of London Sewers Act 1848, on account of his premises having been "injuriously affected by reason of the defendants, as Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, having, in the course and progress of their improvements and alterations in the said street, under sect. 120 and the general powers of their Act, caused the ground and soil of the said street to be raised and made level, whereby the pavement in front of the plaintiff's house was raised above its former level, and consequently above the entrance to the said house. The facts connected with the case are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485; reported also 38 L. J. 17, Ex.; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 1), so that it is unnecessary further to refer to them here. But the following sections of the general and special Acts of Parliament, referred to and relied on in the arguments of counsel, and the judgment of the Court of Error, may succinctly be stated:

The City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii) ss. 2, 3, and 190 (under which the work in question was done), enacts that:

> For the purpose of enabling the commissioners to be appointed in pursuance of this Act to effect the purchases by this Act authorised, and to carry into execution the real purposes of this Act, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, shall be incorporated with and form part of this Act; and the provisions of the said Act shall be applicable to the purposes of this Act, except so far as the said provisions, or any of them, are inconsistent with this Act, or are hereinafter declared not to extend thereto; and in construing the said Act, the commissioners to be appointed in pursuance of this Act shall be deemed the promoters of the undertaking for which such lands are required."

By the 3rd section it is provided:

> That the provisions in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act contained relating to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, and also the provisions therein contained directing lands not wanted to be sold, and that the lands not sold shall vest in the owners of adjoining lands, and that the lands intended to be sold shall be offered to adjoining owners, and requiring owners to claim their right of pre-emption within six weeks, and also with respect to the recovery of forfeitures, penalties, and costs, shall not extend to this Act or to the purposes thereof.

By sect. 120 (which authorises the doing of the works in question in this case) it is made

Lawful for the commissioners from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within the city, or any part thereof respectively, to be paved or repaved when and as often, and in such form and manner, and with such materials, as the commissioners shalt think fit, and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised or lowered, and the course of the channels running in, into, or through the same, to be turned or altered in such manner as they shall think proper, and all such mains and pipes as now lie, or hereafter shall be laid underground, to be taken up and new laid in such places, manner, and form as they shall judge best."

In this section nothing is said about compensation.

But by sects. 153, 156, 159, 236, and 239 of the Act compensation in certain cases therein specified is provided for, as for instance by sect. 153 it is enacted:

That if any building which shall in any part thereof project beyond the regular line of the street in which the same may be situate, &c., shall at any time be taken down to be rebuilt or altered, it shall be lawful for the commissioners to require the same to be set backwards to such a line and in such manner as the commissioners shall direct, for the improvement of such street the commissioners making full compensation to the owner of such building for any damage which he may sustain thereby.

And by sect. 159 the commissioners are empowered to remove existing projections, and are to make compensation for any damage caused by such removal. And by sect. 236 it is enacted that in all cases where the amount of any damages, costs, or expenses is by this Act directed to be ascertained or recovered in a summary manner, or any damages, costs or expenses are by this act directed to be paid, and the method of ascertaining the amount and enforcing the payment thereof is not provided for, such amount in case of dispute shall be ascertained and determined by any justice of the peace, &c.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), sect. 5, enacts that Wherever it may be convenient in some cases to incorporate with Acts of Parliament hereafter to be passed some portions only of the provisions of this Act, for the purpose of making any such incorporation it shall be sufficient in any such Act to enact that the clauses of this Act with respect to the matter so proposed to be incorporated (describing such matter as is described in this Act in the words introductory to the enactment with respect to such matter), shall be incorporated with such Acts; and thereupon all the clauses and provisions of this Act with respect to the matter so incorporated shall, save so far as they shall be expressly saved or excepted by such Act, form part of such Act.

By sect. 68 it is enacted that

If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by, the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in any case shall exceed the sum of 50l., such party may have the same settled either by arbitration, or by the verdict of a jury, as he shall think fit; and if such party desire to have the same settled by arbitration, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing to the promoters of the undertaking of such his desire, stating in such notice the nature of the interest in such lands in respect of which he claims compensation, and the amount of the compensation so claimed therein; and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount so claimed, and shall enter into a written agreement for that purpose within twenty-one days after the receipt of any such notice from any party so entitled, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner herein provided; or if the party so entitled as aforesaid desire to have such question of compensation settled by jury, it shall be lawful for him to give notice in writing of such his desire to the promoters of the undertaking, stating such particulars as aforesaid, and unless the promoters of the undertaking be willing to pay the amount of compensation so claimed, and enter into a written agreement for that purpose, they shall, within twenty-one days after the receipt of such notice, issue their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury for settling the same in the manner herein provided, and in default thereof they shall be liable to pay to the party so entitled as aforesaid, the amount of compensation so claimed, and the same may be received by him, with costs, by action in any of the Superior Courts.

Under the heading, or introductory words, "with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement," are included and comprehended all the sections of the Act from sect. 16 to sect. 68, inclusively.

The court below gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, and held that he was entitled to compensation (see ante, vol. 19 L. T. Rep. N. S., p. 485), and the defendant appealed to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the question, whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to compensation from the defendants, now came on to be argued.

Joseph Brown, Q. C. (with whom was J. O. Griffits), appeared for the defendants, and submitted that the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation. It was clear, he contended, that compensation was not intended by the Legislature to be given in the present case, since it was expressly provided for in certain cases by various sections of the City of London Sewers Act, as for instance, by, amongst others, the 153rd, 156th, 159th, 236th, and 239th, which showed that, where it was intended to be given, it was expressly provided for. The present case, therefore, was either an intentional omission on the part of the Legislature, or a casus omissus through oversight. The defendants were a public body too, acting for the public good, and not a private body acting for their own or any individual's benefit or advantage. Unless, therefore, they can be shown to have acted illegally, unjustly, or oppressively, they could not be made liable. [Cockburn, C. J.—I do not think we can assume that the Legislature intended to give power to the defendants to injure individuals, and yet to give the latter no compensation.] The sections above referred to show the cases in which compensation is to be awarded. The Governor, &c., of The British Cast Plate Glass Manufacturers v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794, and Boulton v. Crowther, 2 B. & C. 703, show that the Legislature may well have given these powers to the commissioners in certain cases without qualifying them by any liability to make compensation. The general heading "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement," inserted between sects. 15 and 16 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, applied to and controlled all the sections from 16 to 68 inclusive, and all these sections would be, by virtue of sect. 5 of the same Act, incorporated by using the words of the said heading, and in the same way they were all excluded or excepted by the use of the same form in sect. 3 of the City of London Sewers Act 1848. That the operation of sect. 68 was intended to be excluded was shown by the various sections giving another mode of compensation. [Cockburn, C. J.—If sect. 68 is not to be taken as giving compensation to persons whose lands are "injuriously affected," what other clause in the Act is there which provides compensation? It is so extraordinary an omission that it would almost seem that it was assumed and understood that it gave compensation.] Sect. 68 only points out the mode of obtaining or assessing compensation, and does not give the right to it, as it is in all railway Acts the compensation itself is given by the Railway Clauses Act, and the mode of compensation is pointed out by sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. So that even if sect. 68 be not excepted in the present case, still it relates to procedure only, and has no further operation.

Keane, Q. C. (with whom was T. Barnard), for the plaintiff or respondent, contra.—As in the court below so here the first question was whether sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 was or not incorporated in the City of London Sewers Act 1848 by sect. 2 of the latter Act, and it was contended on the part of the plaintiff that it was. It had been argued by the other side that if it were to be held as incorporated it was so only as relating to procedure; but if that were so, yet being incorporated for that purpose only, the right to compensation would follow necessarily and by implication. The case of Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas Light Company, 26 L. J. 276, Chan., was applicable here. There it was held by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) and Crompton and Willes, JJ., that sect. 68, although included under the heading or division of the clauses relating to the "purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement," was not excepted by the particular section of the special Act which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, "except so much as related exclusively to the purchase and taking of land by compulsion." Leader v. Moxon, 3 Wils. 461; 2 Black. 924, was also in favour of the plaintiff's view of the statute.

Brown, Q. C. in reply.—There was an excess of authority by the commissioners in Leader v. Moxon, and the decision in Broadbent's case turned on the peculiar wording of the Gas Act, and the introduction of the word "exclusively" in the excepting clause of the section of the Special Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. lv.) which incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act (see the judgment of Willes, J.) [LUSH, J.—The title to compensation there had been already given.] I rely not only on the peculiar words of the 3rd section of our Special Act, but also on this that if sect. 68 had been incorporated all the various other sections providing compensation would have been superfluous. (He referred also to sect. 6 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, and sect. 6 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27.) The learned Baron below seems to have acted on the view that the commissioners had acted oppressively. But if the Legislature has not by express enactment given compensation in a case like the present the court cannot make the enactment for them.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are all of opinion that in this case the judgment of the court below must be reversed. The case is a claim on the part of the plaintiff for compensation by reason of his house and premises having been "injuriously affected" by certain works done by or under the authority of the defendants as Commissioners of Sewers, in altering the level of one of the streets of the metropolis. Now, looking at the Act under the powers of which the defendants have done the acts complained of (the 11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.), it appears that power is given to them to do the works in question, but that no provisiion is thereby made for the granting or giving compensation to anyone whose property may thereby be "injuriously affected," as the plaintiff's premises have been in the present instance. But then it has been contended on the part of the plaintiff that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is incorporated by sect. 2 of the special Act; and that by sect. 68 of the former Act, although it only relates to and points out the mode of procedure to be adopted by a person entitled to compensation, in order to obtain the same, yet nevertheless it must be taken by implication, seeing that it is the only clause in the Act relating to land "injuriously affected," that a right to compensation is thereby given in cases where land has been "injuriously affected" by anything done under that Act itself, or any special Act incorporating it. There can be little doubt that, if we were to decide that sect. 68 is incorporated in the special Act, then compensation might be implied; but unless we were so to decide, we need not express any opinion with respect to the validity of the argument for the plaintiff on that point. We are, however, all of opinion that sect. 68 is not so incorporated. Now, sect. 2 of the special Act expressly incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, yet by the 3rd section of the special Act it is expressly enacted "that the provisions in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act relating to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement" shall not extend to the Special Act or to the purposes thereof. Now, the meaning of that exception is plain enough and turns on the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act itself, by the 5th section of which it is provided that, in order to prevent the necessity of inserting seriatim in the special Act all the various clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act which it might be desired to incorporate therewith, it should suffice either for incorporating or excluding the various sections following and contained under any particular heading in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, to do so by referring to the heading or introductory words preceding the series of questions about to be incorporated or excluded. Now, we find that between sects. 15 and 16 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act there is introduced the following heading, namely, "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows:" and that there is no other title or heading introduced into the Act until after sect. 68, and then comes a fresh heading. It is, I think, therefore, impossible to say that sect. 68 is not to be taken as included under the heading immediately preceding sect. 16, and which runs thus: "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands, otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." Taking that, and the fact of a fresh heading occurring after sect. 68, it seems to me clear that it is included with all the other sections subsequent to sect. 15 under the heading introduced between sects. 15 and 16, and equally clear that it is excluded from the special Act by the 3rd section of that Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.) But, besides that, it has been pointed out by Mr. Brown, on the part of the defendants, throwing considerable light, I think, upon the matter, that whereas compensation is given in a particular set of cases by sect. 159 of the special Act, it is there expressly declared that the compensation to be given shall be ascertained and awarded through the medium of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, under its 68th section. Now, if that section had not been expressly excluded by sect. 3, there would clearly have been no necessity for the introduction of this provision in sect. 159 of the special Act. Then, the case of Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas light Company (ubi sup.) was said by the learned counsel who argued the case for the plaintiff to be an authority in his favour, and against the view which we are now taking of the statute. I think, however, that upon looking closely into it that case is clearly distinguishable, for in that case the local Gas Act incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act except so much only of it as related exclusively to the purchase and taking of land by compulsion, and to the recovery of forfeitures, penalties, and costs. Excluding, therefore, these two specified things, it left altogether untouched that portion of the Act relating to compensation in respect of lands which were "injuriously affected," and consequently sect. 68 and the other sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act were not recited, but remained untouched by the exception in the special Act in that case, a circumstance which, in my judgment, serves to render it clearly distinguishable from the present case. The result of the matter then is that we cannot hold sect. 68 to be incorporated in the special Act when, in express terms, it appears to be excluded; and even if we were prepared to hold that, if it were incorporated, it would give a right, by implication or inference, to compensation in such a case as the present, yet since it is expressly excluded from the special Act, we cannot hold that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation. The judgment of the court below must therefore be reversed.

BLACK v. JOBLING.

*Will not forthcoming—Codicil admitted to proof—Revocation—*1 Vict. c. 26, s. 20.

A testator made a will and codicil which he retained in his own custody, and he subsequently executed a second testamentary paper which he described as a second codicil, and which he handed to his grandson, a legatee under it. At his death the will and the first codicil could not be found, whereupon the second codicil was propounded.

The court held that as the second codicil had not been revoked by any of the modes indicated by the statute, it was entitled to probate as a separate and independent paper.

Ebenezer Black, a farmer, late of Grindon, in the county of Northumberland, died May 8th, 1868, having in Feb. 1865 duly made and executed a will, and in Oct. 1866 a codicil. This codicil varied the will by substituting an annuity of 100*l.* for a bequest of fifty shares in the Hartlepool Docks and Railway Company to his daughter Ann Jobling. It also directed his trustees to sell his interest in the farm of Fenham-hill, and to hold the moneys arising from the sale in trust for the five children of the same Ann Jobling. On the 25th May 1867 he executed a deed of gift of the farm at Fenham-hill in favour of his daughter and her children in the following terms:

I, Ebenezer Black, in the township of Grindon, in the parish of Norham, and also the occupier of the farm of Fenham-hill, in the county of Northumberland, on a lease of seven years unexpired, at the yearly rent of 700*l.*, paying all rates and taxes, do give and devise all the property of the stocks, crops, and implements of husbandry on the said farm of Fenham-hill aforesaid to my daughter Ann Jobling and her children under the covenants and conditions as stated in the lease for their benefit respectively, my grandson Thomas Jobling to have the management of the farm as steward, and keep regular accounts from year to year, and also to pay all servants' wages, rents, taxes, and cesses from the produce of the farm during the continuance of the lease, and for so doing the said Thomas Jobling is to have 15*l.* a year, and after the expiration of the lease the whole of the stock, crops, and implements of husbandry will be sold and converted into money, and equally divided, share and share alike, amongst my five grandchildren, having already made a provision in my will in favour of my said daughter Ann Jobling by giving her an annuity of 100*l.* a year during her life. As witness my hand the 25th day of May 1867. EBENEZER BLACK.

Witness to the signing hereof,
ADAM WHITE,
Writing clerk, Berwick.

On the 19th Oct. 1867 he executed the following testamentary paper:

Grindon, 19th Oct. 1867.

I, Ebenezer Black, farmer, Grindon, parish of Norham, and county of Northumberland, having already bequeathed to my five grandchildren, issue of my daughter Ann Jobling, to wit, Mary, Thomas, Jane, William, and Ann Jobling, the lease, stock, and profits, with everything upon and relating to the farm of Fenham Hall, they paying all rents, taxes, and whatever charges may come against the said farm of Fenham-hill, in addition to which I now bequeath to each of the above named children of my daughter Ann, the sum of three hundred pounds sterling money, when they attain the age of twenty-one years, out of capital, to be paid to them individually by my executors.

EBENEZER BLACK.

Signed by the testator as a codicil to his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, in his presence, and in the presence of each other, have hereunto subscribed our names as witnesses.

THOMAS HOOD MITCHELL.
ANDREW ELLIOTT.

This paper was given to the defendant, the testator's grandson, and remained in his possession, the testator himself retaining the custody of the will of 1865 and the codicil of 1866. At his death these two papers could not be found, and the defendant thereupon propounded the testamentary paper of Oct. 1867. The plaintiff pleaded that the paper was not executed in accordance with the provisions of 1 Vict. c. 26; that, if well executed, it was intended as a second codicil to his last will and testament; and that the testator had destroyed the said will and first codicil with the intention to revoke them, and the second codicil likewise.

The case was tried before Lord Penzance.

Dr. Deane (Pritchard with him) for the plaintiff.

Staveley Hill (Tristram with him) for the defendant.

T. H. Mitchell proved the due execution of the paper. He stated that on the day it bore date the testator called at the Berwick Union Workhouse, of which witness was the master, and asked him to write a "codicil to his will," observing that his capital was increasing, and that he had 1100*l.* which he wished to give to the family of his daughter, and that he "had already provided a little for them by a farm and the stock upon it." The witness then wrote out the paper, copying the attestation clause from a printed form, and when it was executed the testator took it with him, saying that he should put it aside with his will and other papers.

Thomas Jobling, the defendant, deposed that in Dec. 1867, the deceased gave him the paper, and said that it was something for the family, and that he did not wish his son, James Black (the plaintiff), to know of it.

Dr. Deane argued that when he executed the second codicil of 1867, the testator had his will present to his mind, and meant it to be an addition to his will. It must, therefore, stand or fall with the will.

Staveley Hill submitted that the first codicil was practically anulled by the deed of gift, and the evidence showed that the testator intended the paper of 1867 to be independant of the will entirely. It was therefore entitled to probate as a separate and substantial instrument.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29.—Lord PENZANCE.—In this case the deceased died, having made several wills, but upon his death no will was found. There was, however, in the hands of a legatee an instrument made by the testator, and called a codicil of the 19th Oct. 1867. The codicil recited that the testator had already "bequeathed," as he called it, to his grandchildren everything upon and relating to a certain farm; and it then goes on to say, "in addition to which I now bequeath to each of the above named children of my daughter Ann the sum of 300*l.* sterling when they attain the age of twenty-one years, out of my capital, to be paid to them individually by my executors." And the question in the case is whether that paper can be admitted to probate.

The codicil, I should say, speaks of his having "bequeathed his farm." It is in evidence that he had previously disposed of it by deed of gift; but the person who drew the codicil, and who was called as a witness, could not say whether or not the deceased was at the time speaking of the deed of gift which he made in May 1867, and which was produced to the court. The ground relied upon against the codicil was that a codicil stood or fell with the will. No doubt that was a general proposition which obtained in the Prerogative Court, but it was subject to certain exceptions. I took the trouble to ascertain what under the old law were the exceptions, but the result of the cases does not appear to me to be by any means satisfactory. The earliest case is the case of Barrow v. Barrow, 2 Lee, 235. There the testator made a will and a codicil, the whole effect of the codicil being to give the residue of his property to his wife. He afterwards burned the will, saying it was useless, Mr. Wood (the gentleman who drew the codicil) having made his will for him. And there the court held that it was clear the codicil was not destroyed by the burning of the will, but was a substantial instrument or testamentary schedule. The codicil gave the residue, and no one could say what was the residue unless he had read the will which disposed of the other portions of the property, but the court, nevertheless, held that it was not destroyed by the burning of the will, but was entitled to probate as a substantive testamentary instrument. The next is the case of Medleycott v. Assheton (2 Add. 231), which was decided in 1824. There the will was made in April 1820, and in Dec. 1820 the testatrix wrote a codicil, giving 100*l.* each to the two trustees named in her will, and dividing some trinkets among her family. In Jan. 1824, she looked over the papers in her writing desk, several of which she burnt, and a few days afterwards wrote to her attorney desiring him to destroy her will. The court held that it was altogether a question of intention, and that the legal presumption that the codicil fell with the will might be rebutted by showing that the testatrix intended the codicil to operate notwithstanding the revocation of the will, and as the circumstances were not sufficient to establish such an intention the codicil was held invalid. The next was the case of Tagart v. Hooper (1 Cart. 289), wich was decided in 1836. The paper was found in the writing-desk of the deceased, and it commenced thus: "This is a codicil to my last will, and to be taken as a part thereof." The court, in pronouncing for the paper, held that in all cases where a codicil had been considered void by the destruction of the will there were circumstances which showed that the codicil was dependent upon the will. That put the burden of proof the other way. In the other cases it was laid down that the presumption was that the codicil was revoked where the will was revoked, but in this it was held that where the codicil was so revoked there were circumstances which showed that it was dependent on the will. These are all the cases on the point before the passing of the statute, and certainly their consideration leaves upon the mind no very definite idea of what is meant by "dependent on the will." In one sense, any codicil that makes any disposition of property at all must be considered to be dependent on the will which disposes of the rest, for the codicil conveys only a part of the testator's intention regarding his property, and the motives inducing that particular part of his intention cannot with any certainty be dissevered from the motives which induced the disposition of the rest. It is difficult, if not impossible, to predicate of a particular bequest in a codicil that the testator would have made it if he had disposed of his other property in any different manner than that expressed by his will. It may be that the independence of the will spoken of must be something of a more limited character. And the meaning of the cases may be that a codicil is independent of the will, unless it is of such a character that the giving validity and effect to it without the will to which it was intended to be attached would produce some manifest absurdity. I am not sure that even this rule is capable of being easily applied to all the cases that might arise, and I have serious doubts whether such a rule is to be gathered from the cases with sufficient distinctness to justify the court in adopting it. But all these cases occurred before the Wills Act. Now the 20th section of that Act is most distinct and positive in its terms. It says, "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid (marriage), or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator." And I should have had no hesitation in holding that the intention of the section was to do away with all implied revocations, and relieve the subject from the doubt and indistinctness in which the cases had involved it. But there have been two cases decided since the Act. The first of these is, In the Goods of Halliwell, 4 Notes of Cas. 400. There the codicil was dated Sept. 5th 1845, and commenced thus: "This is a codicil to the will of one R. H., and which I desire to be added to my will," and it related solely to accounts between himself and his partner, containing no bequest or appointment. The testator died on the 7th Sept. 1845, and he expressly declared, shortly before the making of the codicil, that he had made a will, and that it was then in existence. In that case the court said that, supposing the will to have been destroyed by the deceased, the codicil would, upon the general principle, fall with it, but held that there was an exception in favour of the paper, inasmuch as it seemed to have been made for a particular purpose, and admitted it to proof. Then comes the case of Clogstoun v. Wallcott, 5 Notes of Cas. 623, in which the will was made in 1840, and the codicils in 1842. In April 1846 the testator destroyed the will, and in doing so expressed anxiety about the codicils, observing to his brother, "It will not affect the codicils, will it?" In that case for the first time the Wills Act was cited, and the way the learned judge referred to it was as follows: "Under the old law the effect of destroying a will was, by presumption, to defeat the operations of the codicils to that will; but by the present law there must be an intention to destroy. Here, however, the deceased did not mean to destroy the codicils, which remain entire, but, on the contrary, he expected at the time and declared afterwards that the parties interested in the codicils would have the benefit of the legacies he had given them. I am of opinion that the court is bound to pronounce for the validity of the two codicils and I decree probate of them to the brother, who is executor according to the tenour in the first codicil." Since this court was established a case occurred (Greenwood v. Cohen, 2 Sw. & Tr. 364) which was heard in 1860, and in that case Sir Cresswell Cresswell said, "I think it has been established by the cases cited at the bar, that previous to the passing of the 1 Vict. c. 26, a codicil was primâ facie dependent on the will, and that the destruction of the latter was an implied revocation of the former; and, moreover, that Sir H. J. Fust was of opinion that no alteration of this principle was made by the passing of the statute. The question then is entirely one of the intention of the deceased. Where a will and codicil have been in existence, and the will is afterwards revoked, it must be shown, by the party applying for probate of the codicil alone, that it was intended by the deceased that it should operate separately from the will, otherwise it will be presumed that, as the will is destroyed, the codicil is also revoked." Now, in reviewing these decisions, I cannot perceive that the effect of the statute has been fully considered by the court. Sir Cresswell Cresswell seems to have thought that it had been decided that the statute made no difference, and passed it by as having been so; and Sir Herbert Jenner Fust dismissed the point without any reasoning whatever, merely affirming that the statute had made it necessary that there should be an affirmative intention to revoke. But the statute says nothing of the kind, and unless it makes an actual revocation necessary, it does not interfere with the existing law at all. In this unsatisfactory state of the decisions, I think I shall do best in such a case as the present by adhering to the statute, and by holding that as this codicil has never been revoked in any of the modes indicated by the statute as the only modes by which a codicil is to be revoked, it remains of full force and effect, and is entitled to proof.

Will—Revocation by memorandum—Administration—Practice.

A testator cancelled his will by obliterating his signature and appended to it a memorandum to this effect: "This my last will is cancelled, and as yet I have no other."

The court granted administration with the memorandum annexed.

Algernon Hicks died April 26, 1869, leaving a will duly executed on Aug. 4, 1864. Subsequent to the execution he had struck his pen through his signature, and through several of the bequests, and he had appended to the will the following memorandum, which was duly attested:

April 14, 1868.

Mem. This my last will is hereby cancelled, and as yet I have no other.

Dr. Tristram moved on behalf of the widow of the deceased for a grant of administration with the memorandum annexed. He cited

Brenchley v. Still, 2 Roberts. 182;
In the Goods of Hubbard, L. Rep. 1 Prob. & M. 153.

Lord PENZANCE.—You are entitled to the grant of administration because the will is clearly revoked, but I doubt whether the grant ought to include the memorandum.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 22.—Lord PENZANCE.—The question in this case was whether a paper signed by the deceased, and which in terms revoked a will under which it was written, was or was not properly executed. The court, upon the whole, came to the conclusion that it was, and was prepared accordingly to let the administration go. But then the question arose whether the administration should go with this paper annexed as being of a testamentary character, or whether it should go without the paper annexed? Now, the section of the statute (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 20) which deals with the revocation of wills, says that "no will or codicil or any part thereof shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same," &c. The language of the statute, therefore, implies that a will may be revoked either by a subsequent will, or by a codicil executed as a will, or by something which is neither a will nor a codicil, namely, "some writing declaring an intention to revoke" the will. I had serious doubts whether this paper ought not to be looked upon merely as "some writing," and consequently, neither a will nor a codicil, so as properly to be made the subject for probate or administration with the will annexed. A case was, however, cited (Brenchley v. Still, 2 Roberts 162) in which a paper not quite similar to this, inasmuch as the writer began by calling it a codicil, but which in substance was the same as this, because it did nothing and effected nothing except the revocation of a previous will, that case was cited, and there the learned judge thought that probate ought to go of the paper. In deference to that authority, I think that in this case also the proper course will be to allow the grant to go with the paper annexed.

Dr. Tristram.—Will the grant include the revoked will?

Lord PENZANCE.—No; in Brenchley v. Still, the previous papers that were revoked were not annexed.

Testamentary suit—Minor—Guardian ad litem—Practice.

Where the mother had been appointed by will guardian of her child, a minor, the court refused to appoint the paternal uncle guardian ad litem for the purpose of disputing the will until the mother had been cited.

David Jenkins died Nov. 28, 1867, and by his will dated Nov. 26, he appointed his wife sole executrix of his will, and guardian of his only child, a minor aged eight years.

The will was proved on Dec. 14, 1867, and Bayford now moved the court to appoint John Jenkins, the paternal uncle of the minor, his guardian ad litem for the purpose of calling in probate of the will, and testing its validity. He relied on Sidney Smith's Chancery Practice, 7th edit., vol. 1, pp. 271, 273.

Lord PENZANCE.—Will he give security for costs?

Bayford.—He will be liable for them.

Lord PENZANCE.—This may be merely a vexatious suit. I don't think I ought to grant the application behind the mother's back. You must first cite her to show cause why the uncle should not be appointed guardian.

Walker v. The South Eastern Railway Company. (a)

Smith v. The Same.

Liability of railway companies for misconduct of their servants upon their premises.

A railway company, whose rules authorise their officers to take into custody persons committing assaults, or taking part in affrays upon their premises, are liable for arrests by their officers, upon their premises made without reasonable cause. And if the company's solicitors afterwards conduct a prosecution, maliciously and falsely instituted by their officers, against the parties arrested, without (so far as appears), reasonable inquiry into the facts; the company are also liable for the malicious prosecution, and the depositions before the magistrate upon which he commits the prisoners for trial, afford the company excuse.

These were actions for assault, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution, the actions having arisen out of the same transaction, and being tried, by consent, together. To the counts for assault and false imprisonment, the company pleaded a justification on the ground of assaults alleged to have been committed by the plaintiffs upon their officers. To the other counts for malicious prosecution, the company pleaded not guilty.

M. Chambers and Baker Greene, for the plaintiffs.

Ballantine, Serjt., Joyce, and E. Clarke, for the company.

On the 30th June 1867, the plaintiff Walker went by the company's line from London to Gravesend and back. He went as second class passenger, and at Gravesend, on his return journey, third class passengers were put into the carriage with him, upon which he remonstrated, and an altercation ensued between him and the company's officers. When he reached the London station, an altercation took place between the company's servants and another passenger, in which plaintiff took part.

Upon this the inspector turned upon him, and accused him of having caused a disturbance at Gravesend, and one of the company's servants roughly pushed him beyond the barrier, and then thrust him outside the yard, and kicked him as he went out. Another altercation then arose between the company's officers and the other plaintiff Smith, who also was treated with great violence, and in the end, as he resisted, he was given into custody; and the plaintiff being observed not far off, he also was given into custody, and both parties, although they offered to give their addresses, were taken to the station house and locked up. Upon their being brought before the magistrate, he remanded them, more than once, for further inquiry, and in the result he committed them both for trial, on the charge of violently assaulting the company's officers. At the trial, at the Surrey Sessions, the jury stopped the case, and they were both acquitted. They then brought these actions.

It was now admitted on the part of the company that all the acts complained of were committed by their officers upon their premises. It was likewise admitted that the company's officers were authorised by the rules to take into custody persons committing assaults or taking part in affrays; but they were also directed to exercise the authority with care and caution, and not in cases of persons whose addresses were known. It was also admitted that the conduct of the company's men had been wholly unwarrantable, and not only so, but outrageous. And although it appeared that they had been struck in the affray, this was after the acts of outrageous violence on their part. Finally, it was admitted that the company's solicitors had conducted the prosecutions, and, so far as appeared, they had done so without any examination of the case. The depositions taken before the magistrate, being put in by the plaintiffs, were relied upon by the company as proof of reasonable cause, but they were taken after the case had been taken up by the company's solicitors; and moreover, the company's officers, who had committed the acts of violence and made the depositions, were not now called as witnesses to sustain the case they had then set up.

Walker's case had been tried before Martin, B., who thought the company only liable for the original arrest, and not for the subsequent acts; and the jury having given a verdict for 170*l.*, a new trial had been granted; the verdict being on that view deemed excessive.

Ballantine, Serjt., for the company, submitted that the company were not liable even for the arrest or assault, still less for the subsequent violence, as it was unauthorised, and in violation of the rules:

Limpus v. The General Omnibus Company, 32 L. J. 34, Ex.

Kelly, C. B., however, thought otherwise; the arrest and assault having been committed by the company's servants upon their premises, and while engaged in the performance of their duties as the company's servants.

Ballantine, Serjt. then submitted that the company were not liable for the acts of wilful tort committed by their servants; at all events, not for malicious acts.

Kelly, C. B., however, observed that though this might have been a question a quarter of a century ago, it could hardly be so now, as it had been held that a company or corporate body could be liable for libel: (Whitfield v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, E. B. & E. 115; Welton v. Woodcock, 27 L. J., Ex.)

Ballantine, Serjt. urged that upon the depositions there appeared reasonable cause for the prosecution; or, at all events, that they afforded an excuse to the company for pursuing the prosecution, but

Kelly, C. B. observed that the depositions were taken after the company's solicitors had taken up the prosecution, presumably with the company's authority, and without, as it appeared, any inquiry. Moreover, he was of opinion that there was no reasonable cause.

At the close of the case,

Kelly, C. B. said:—The case divided itself into three stages or portions: the original assault upon the plaintiffs; the giving them into custody on the charge of assault; and the subsequent prosecution. Although, however, these were distinct portions of the transaction, he considered that the company were liable for the whole; nor did he see any distinction between the previous acts of the officers and the subsequent prosecution, because the company had adopted it. With regard to the original assault, it was the duty of a company to provide themselves with proper officers and servants; and as they were entrusted with power to appoint police constables for the preservation of order throughout their premises (Mahoney v. Besley, 4 F. & F. 544), they were bound to take care that these officers conducted themselves with propriety, and did not

(a) Reported by W. F. Finlason, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

commit wanton acts of violence upon their passengers upon their premises. For what had been done in this case either as to the assault or the arrest, it was admitted that there was no justification. As to the prosecution, he was of opinion that there was no reasonable cause for it, as the case for the company's servants (which they were not here to support) was shown to be false. That being so, the case was made out, and on that count, as he had already said, he considered the company liable on this as on the other counts. It was admitted that their solicitors had conducted the prosecution, and, as far as appeared, without any inquiry into the facts. The depositions were after the prosecution had been taken up, and afforded no excuse to the company. The case, therefore, became one of damages.

Verdict for each plaintiff for substantial damages; the jury giving 50l. in each case for each head of complaint, and the costs and expenses incurred in the defence.

KELLY, C. B. gave leave to move, as his opinion had been contrary to that of Martin, B. on the former trial.

Parry, Serjt. and G. Tayler for the defendant.

The defendant had been assignee of a bankrupt, against whom a prosecution had been directed by the Court of Bankruptcy for fraudulently making away with part of his property, and the plaintiff had offered himself as bail. Thereupon the defendant (as the plaintiff's evidence went) said of the plaintiff that he was a party to the fraud. This, however, he denied, and the words he admitted were that he believed, from what he had heard, that the plaintiff was mixed up in the fraud. The words were spoken to a party to whom such a statement as that might reasonably be made.

KELLY, C.B. to the jury.—The question is whether the words spoken were those alleged by the plaintiff, or admitted by the defendant; and, in the latter case, whether they were spoken in the honest belief that they were true, or maliciously, and knowing that they were untrue, and with the intention of injuring the plaintiff.

The jury found that the words spoken were those admitted by the defendant; that is, that he believed the plaintiff to be mixed up in the fraud, and that he spoke the words honestly believing them to be true.

KELLY, C. B. directed a verdict for the defendant.

SHERIFF COURT OF LANARKSHIRE.

Feb. 4 and May 19.

GIBSON AND ANOTHER v. HILLSTROM AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—"As near thereunto as she may safely get"—Capacity of harbour—Offer to lighten ship—Obligation on ship—Demurrage—Custom.

The ship F. was chartered to carry a full cargo from Alexandria to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburgh, "or as near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of tide, and deliver the same, and so end the voyage," fifty running days to be allowed for loading and discharging, and ten days on demurrage if required, at 6l. per day. The ship received orders to proceed to Glasgow, and she arrived at the Tail of the Bank of Greenock on the 25th Dec. 1863. There was not, at all states of the tide, water enough in Glasgow harbour to let the ship lie afloat, and the pursuer required the consignees to take delivery at Greenock. They refused, but lightened the ship, and required the pursuer to proceed to Glasgow. This he did under protest on the 21st Jan. 1864:

Held, that the defenders were liable for the demurrage resulting from the delay, inasmuch as the pursuer was not bound to lighten his ship in order to proceed to Glasgow.

By the custom of the port ships were used to lighten at the Tail of the Bank and then discharge, but the pursuer was a foreigner commanding a foreign vessel, and the reference to the custom of the port in the charter-party was deleted before signature:

Held, that the pursuer was not affected by such custom.

Schilizzi v. Derry and Parker v. Winlow discussed and distinguished.

This was a claim by shipowners against the indorsees of a bill of lading for 129*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, for demurrage consequent on the failure of the latter, the defenders, to take delivery of the cargo according to the terms of the bill of lading and charter-party.

The Sheriff-substitute before whom the cause was first heard found the following to be the facts: That by charter-party, dated 15th Aug. 1863, entered into at Alexandria between the principal pursuer, as master of the ship Frey, and Messrs. Naegeli, Koller, and company, as charterers thereof, the said vessel was chartered to carry a full and complete cargo of beans and wheat, on a voyage from Alexandria to a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent, between Havre and Hamburg, calling at Queenstown or Falmouth, at the master's option, for orders, which it was agreed should be given by return of post from London, in reply to the master's letters to the charterers' agent, otherwise the lay-days to count, "or as near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of tide, and deliver the same, and so end the voyage." That in the printed form of the said charter-party the words "according to the custom of the port," after the words "deliver the same" above quoted were deleted before signature. That by the said charter-party it was further stipulated, that payment of the freight should be due and made on true and right delivery of the cargo, and that fifty running days, Sundays excepted, should be allowed the charterers for loading the ship at the said port of Alexandria, and discharging at the port of discharge, and ten days on demurrage, if required, at six pounds per day. That the defenders were consignees of the said cargo, and endorsees or holders of the bill of lading therefor; that the said ship left Alexandria on the 27th Aug. 1863, twelve lay-days having been consumed in lading, and that she arrived in Falmouth on the 13th Nov. thereafter; and that the principal pursuer, having on the same day intimated his said arrival by letter to the charterers' agent in London, received orders from the said agent on the 10th of the following December to proceed to Glasgow, which he did accordingly; that the ship arrived at the Tail of the Bank off Greenock on the 25th day of the said month, and that the defenders required him to proceed with the cargo to Glasgow for discharge; but that he refused to do so, except on payment of a sum above freight, which sum the defenders declined to allow, and that the reason of the pursuer's said refusal was that there was not sufficient water in the harbour of Glasgow to allow the said ship to lie afloat there with her cargo at all times of tide; that the pursuer required the defenders to take delivery of the said cargo at the Tail of the Bank, but that the defenders refused to do so; that shortly after the arrival of the vessel at the Tail of the Bank, the defenders had the cargo of the said vessel lightened by removal at that place of 1000 bolls of grain, and thereupon required the pursuer to take the said vessel to Glasgow, reserving all questions between the parties. That the draught of the said vessel with her cargo at the Tail of the Bank was 17 feet 9 inches in salt water, which is equivalent to 18 feet 1 inch in fresh water, and that the greatest depth of the harbour of Glasgow at low water was then from 16 feet to 16½ feet. Therefore that the pursuer was justified in refusing to take the said vessel to Glasgow harbour with her full cargo. That by the custom of the port of Glasgow vessels drawing more than about sixteen feet water arriving at the Tail of the Bank with cargoes similar to that of the Frey are in use to be lightened by the discharge there of a sufficient portion of their cargoes to enable them to lie in Glasgow harbour at low water without grounding, and are in use after such lightenings to proceed to Glasgow harbour for discharging the remainder of their cargoes; but that the said vessel belongs to Finland, and that the pursuer is a native of Finland, and that it is not proved either that he was aware of the said custom of the said port, or that a similar custom prevails generally in other river ports. Therefore, and in respect that the parties agreed to delete from the charter-party the words "according to the custom of the port," as hereinbefore stated, that the pursuer was not bound, on account of the said custom, to lighten the said vessel as before stated at the Tail of the Bank, and to bring her up to Glasgow for discharge of the rest of the cargo; that vessels are sometimes but rarely discharged at the Tail of the Bank, and that it was not impracticable to have discharged the cargo of the said vessel there; that it was not proved that the defenders required the pursuer to proceed to any other place within the terms of the charter-party where the vessel could lay afloat at all states of the tide and there discharge the cargo; that, in these circumstances, the delay caused in the discharge of the said vessel beyond the lay-days stipulated in the charter-party was occasioned by the fault of the defenders, in requiring the pursuer to lighten the said vessel at the Tail of the Bank, and proceed to Glasgow for completing the discharge, as hereinbefore set forth, and that they are therefore liable to the pursuer for demurrage in respect of the said delay. That the time of demurrage was at least fifteen days, and that the defenders are liable therefore in the sum of 90*l.*, being at the rate of 6*l.* per day—being the rate stipulated in the said charter-party: That the other charges specified in the schedule to the summons, amounting to 39*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, were incurred and paid by the pursuer on account of the said ship, in taking her from the Tail of the Bank to Glasgow, and that in the circumstances above stated, the defenders are liable therefor in respect that the pursuer took the said vessel to Glasgow at the defenders request, not having been bound to do so. And to this finding he appended the following note:—The question in this case is—whether, on the one hand, the defendants were justified in requiring the pursuers either to proceed to Glasgow harbour with the Frey with her full cargo, or to lighten her at the Tail of the Bank, so that she could float in Glasgow harbour at all states of the tide, and then to proceed to Glasgow to complete the discharge? or whether the pursuer, on the other hand, was justified in refusing to take either of these courses? It is proved by the evidence of the harbour-master, that the greatest depth at low water in Glasgow harbour at the time was 16 to 16½ft., and that even this depth was limited to a small portion of the harbour. It is also proved that the Frey drew 17ft. 9in. in salt water, which is equal to 4in. more, or 18ft. 1in. in fresh. Consequently she could not therefore lie afloat in Glasgow harbour in all states of the tide. The pursuer depones that on a former voyage the vessel grounded at low water in Glasgow harbour, and suffered some damage in consequence, which may account for his determined refusal to go there again with a full cargo. It is further proved that the Frey could not have gone to Glasgow harbour with full tide, and have been, before low water, lightened of a sufficient part of her cargo to be able to float in the harbour at low water. It is thus clear, and the defenders did not seriously dispute, that under the charter-party, as narrated in the interlocutor, the pursuer was not bound to take the Frey to Glasgow with her full cargo. The next question is, whether he was bound to lighten her at the Tail of the Bank where she lay, and then proceed with her to Glasgow harbour? If the solution of this question depended on the custom of the port, the defenders would succeed; for it is proved by the witnesses, Clark, Taylor, Bald, Perossi, Ritchie (harbour master), Robertson, and Jackson, that vessels are in use thus first to lighten and then discharge. But there is no proof that the custom was known to the pursuer, who, as a foreigner, and commanding a foreign vessel, may well be presumed to have been ignorant of it. Neither is it proved that a similar custom prevails in regard to river ports generally, although it appears to exist in some. In this state of the evidence, the Sheriff-substitute is satisfied that the pursuers were not bound by the custom of the port of Glasgow, and that the question must be decided without regard to that custom: (Sweeting v. Pearse, 7 Jur. (English) N. S. 800; and Kirchener v. Venus, 12 Moore's Priv. Co. Cas. 362, compared with Brereton v. Chapman, 1831, 7 Bing. 559, noticed afterwards.) The fact that the clause in the charter-party regarding the custom of the port, was deleted before signature, greatly strengthens this view; showing, as it does, that the pursuer purposely excluded the consideration of such local and partial customs as affecting the contract: (Maclachlan on Merchant Shipping, p. 333-4.) The question thus comes to be—whether, independently of the custom referred to, the pursuer was bound to lighten his vessel at the Tail of the Bank, and proceed with the rest of his cargo to Glasgow, to complete the discharge? There is no direct precedent on this question, and the authorities quoted at the bar do not throw much light on it. The case of Whitwell v. Harrison, 2 W. H. & G., 127, cited by the pursuer, arose on a policy of insurance on a vessel to her discharging port, and until she had moored at anchor twenty-four hours in safety. The vessel was chartered to Wallasay Pool, in the Mersey, "or as near thereto as she could safely get, and there discharge her cargo." She came abreast of the pool, but could not enter on account of her draught of water. The discharge of the cargo therefore began outside, and the crew were there discharged, as if the vessel had arrived at her destination. It appeared that the master intended only to lighten the vessel; but the discharging went on, and if no accident had occurred, and there had not been sufficient water for the vessel in the pool, her whole cargo would have been discharged outside. After she had been moored for twenty-four hours outside, she fell over, and was damaged. It was held that the owners could not recover under the policy. The ground of the decision was, that the whole dealings of the master with the vessel, the cargo, and the crew, had been the same as if she had arrived at the port of discharge; and that these patent facts should not fail in their legal consequence, because the master intended merely to lighten his vessel outside, and complete the discharge in the "pool." Neither the decision, nor the opinions expressed by the judges in it, bear out the proposition, for which the pursuer quoted it, namely, that the discharge of a cargo cannot be divided, and that whenever it is begun, that place becomes the port of discharge; and consequently, that any removal after that to complete the discharge elsewhere, would not be covered by the insurances. Nor is the pursuer's case aided by Brown v. Johnston, 1 C. & M. 440, quoted for him, where it was held that the lay-days commence from the time when the vessel is placed in the hands of the dock company's officer for discharge, although the actual discharge could not begin till some days later, owing to the crowded state of the harbour. On the other hand in the case of Brereton v. Chapman, 7 Bing. 559, founded on by the defenders, the question arose on a charter-party from Hamburgh to Wells, "or as near thereto as she could safely get." She arrived at the entrance of the port, and drawing too much cargo to be able to proceed to the port full, she discharged some of her cargo, and then proceeded to the port to complete the discharge. By the custom of that port, the lay days do not commence till the vessel arrives at the quay. It was held that they began to run only from the vessel's arrival there, being the usual port of discharge. The opinions of the judges, as reported, do not refer to the custom of the port; but it can hardly be doubted that that was an important element in the case, and sufficient to distinguish it from the present. This case, however, meets the pursuers' argument that the discharge cannot be divided, but must be held to commence, as to the whole cargo, at the place where the vessel is merely lightened by a partial discharge. It would also show that if the Frey had lightened at the Tail of the Bank, and then proceeded to Glasgow to discharge the rest of the cargo, the lay days would have counted from her arrival at the latter place. But that is a very different thing from holding, as the defenders contend, that a vessel which is not bound by the special custom of the port so to lighten, is bound to do so at common law. The cases of Schilizzi v. Derry, 4 El. & Bl. 873; and Bastifill v. Lloyd, 31 L. J. 413, Ex., on which the defenders founded, merely decided that where a charter-party requires the vessel to go to a certain port, or as near thereto as she can safely get; and when, on her arrival outside the port, there are merely temporary impediments to her proceeding to it, the existence of these "does not excuse non-performance of the contract." (See Pollock, C. B. in Bastifill v. Lloyd.) In the one case, the impediment was the low water at the mouth of the Danube preventing the vessel from getting up to her port; and in the other, she could not get up to her port at once, from having arrived during the neap tides. These temporary obstacles were regarded as of the same class as bad winds or stormy weather, and as being within the risks of the voyage, which must fall on the owners. In the present case, the obstacle was permanent in its own nature, with respect to the discharge of the cargo as a whole. The cases of Schilizzi v. Derry, and Bastifill v. Lloyd, do not at all indicate that, where an impediment to the vessel with her full cargo reaching the harbour is, in its own nature permanent, the master is bound to overcome it by discharging part of the cargo outside the harbour, and then to proceed to the harbour with the remainder. In the case of Schilizzi v. Derry (sup.) Lord Campbell, C. J., is reported to have observed, that the meaning of the charter-party to go to certain ports, "or as near thereto as she may safely get," must have been "that the vessel is to get within the ambit of the port, if she cannot reach the actual harbour." But here it is not proved that the vessel could have lain afloat in any part of the river within the ambit of the port of Glasgow; and, at all events, the defenders did not require her to do so, so as to bring the case within the principle of Parker v. Winlow, 7 El. & Bl. 942. The defenders attempted to prove that they required the master to go to the port of Greenock for discharge. But their only witness on that point (Clark the defender) is contradicted by that of the pursuer; and the fact is therefore not proved. Besides, it is not pretended that the port of Greenock is within the ambit of the port of Glasgow, and there is no authority for holding that the charterer can arbitrarily require the master to go to a place beyond the "ambit of the port of discharge," and there discharge. If he had gone into Greenock, and discharged there, he might have imperilled the insurances by the deviation. There being thus no precedent on the question, it must be decided on principle, with reference to the construction of the charter-party. In this point of view, it is important to observe—(1st) That the Tail of the Bank was a place where the cargo could have been discharged, although perhaps with some difficulty, for a considerable part of it (1000 bolls) was discharged there; and (2nd) that cargoes of grain, similar to that in question, have been in some instances, fully discharged there. (Evidence of defender Clark.) The words of the charter-party required the vessel to go to a "safe port," within certain limits, "or as near thereunto as she may safely get and lay afloat at all times of tide, and deliver the same, and so end the voyage." Granting that, under the dictum of Lord Campbell, she should have gone to a safe place of that description within the ambit of the port if there had been one, still, there being none, what does the charter-party indicate as the alternative in case of inability to lie afloat at the port to which she was ordered? The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the charter-party was complied with by the master going for discharge to a place where the vessel could lie afloat, and where the discharge was practicable, such place being as near to the port as she could reach in accordance with the proviso as to her lying afloat. It is not a good objection to this that the place is an open roadstead, for that is the case at many ports; as, for example, the Cape of Good Hope, Port Elizabeth, St. Denis: (See on this, Cockey v. Atkinson, 2 B. & Ald. 460.) The defenders did not pretend, and there is nothing to show, that the Frey might have got nearer to Glasgow than the Tail of the Bank, in accordance with the proviso referred to. From this point of view, the case of Whitwell v. Harrison, above quoted, is an authority in the pursuers' favour, for it proceeds on the footing that the discharge under a charter-party nearly similar, might have been completed outside the port, when the vessel could not get into it with her full cargo. Again, the opposite view involves great indefiniteness in the obligation which would lie on the vessel. It depended on circumstances beyond the master's control, whether he could have got a berth at Glasgow with 16½ft. at low water, or one with a good deal less, and, consequently, he could not anticipate the amount of lightening that might have been required. If he had lightened enough only for a berth of the former class, and had been ordered into one of the latter, his insurances would have been imperilled, at least for the usual twenty-four hours after arrival, for the vessel would not have been within the condition of the charter-party. Nay, more. He might have been ordered from Plymouth to a port with so little water at low tide that he would have had to put out as much as half his cargo, or even more. before getting into harbour. Yet, according to the defenders' argument, he would have been obliged to do so. The Sheriff-substitute considers that the charter-party does not lay on the vessel obligations so indefinite, and that, on the contrary, its proper meaning (the custom of the port being excluded) is, that she required to be brought to the nearest place where she could lie afloat at all states of the tide, and where discharge was practicable, and that this was done when she was anchored at the Tail of the Bank. He is further of opinion that the master was justified, under the charter-party, in refusing to lighten the vessel there, and then proceed to Glasgow to complete the discharge, and that the defenders were not justified in requiring him to do so. The circumstance mentioned by the master, that he could not take in a full cargo at Glasgow, owing to the draught of his vessel, is not of much moment. Still, what effect it has is in the pursuer's favour, for it helps to explain and justify his refusal to go to that harbour. It is of no moment, according to the view thus explained, whether he would have agreed to go to Glasgow on payment of an extra allowance, either to himself or to the owners, for he was entitled to refuse to go there except on his own terms. On the other hand, the refusal of the defenders to pay him an extra sum of 25*l.* or 35*l.* (pursuer's evidence), which was not much, considering the extra risk incurred, is an unfortunate feature of their case, for it places them in the position of parties staking their case on the law, as to the obligation to lighten the vessel, being in their favour. In the whole circumstances, as thus explained, the Sheriff-substitute considers that the detention of the vessel has arisen from the defenders' fault, and that they are liable to compensate the pursuers therefore. The parties were agreed that the detention beyond the lay-days was at least fifteen days—thus:

	Days.
Spent at Alexandria in loading (excluding Sundays)	12
From 17th Nov., when the vessel might have received orders at Falmouth (where she arrived on 13th Nov.) to 10th Dec., when she was ordered to Glasgow (excluding Sundays)	20
From 25th Dec., when she reached the Tail of the Bank, to 5th Feb., when the discharge was completed (Sundays excepted)	36
	68
Deducting lay-days allowed	50
Leaves days of detention	18

being beyond the fifteen concluded for, which, at 6*l.* per day, as in the charter-party, is 90*l.* The defenders pleaded that, as the charter-party stipulated for only ten days' demurrage at 6*l.*, the five days beyond that time are not to be held as demurrage, but detention beyond the demurrage contemplated by the parties, and as such, falling to be dealt with as damages. For the allowance on that head, they contended the master has not a title to sue, founding on Brownker v. Scott, 4 Taunt. 1,—where it was so held in the Court of Common Pleas; but it does not appear whether in regard to a British or foreign vessel. The Sheriff-substitute has not been able to find any Scotch authorrity countenancing this view in regard to the master of a foreign vessel, who, on the contrary, is held, when in this country, to represent the owners generally with regard to the voyage: (Bell's Com. 384; see also Sm. Merc. Law, 119.) He has therefore repelled this plea.

On appeal to the Sheriff the decision was affirmed, the Sheriff finding that the conclusions deducible in law from the facts were those at which the Sheriff-substitute had arrived.

May 19.—The SHERIFF has had very great hesitation with this case, which involves a new and important question, as to which, in the absence of any guiding precedent, it is extremely difficult to come to a decided and satisfactory conclusion. On the one hand, it seems a hardship to hold, that if a vessel chartered to Glasgow draws upwards of 16ft. of water, she is not bound, in virtue of the floating clause in her charter-party, to come nearer that port than the Tail of the Bank, which is twenty-two miles lower down the river. On the other hand, when the express provisions of the contract are, that the ship shall only be bound to proceed to a safe port, "or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of tide, and deliver the cargo," it is difficult to hold that there is any obligation on the master to take his vessel beyond the point where she can so lie afloat and discharge. The defenders have not raised any subsidiary question by contending that the Frey might have been brought to some intermediate place between the Tail of the Bank and the harbour of Glasgow; nor have they denied that with her full cargo she drew so much water that she could not have lain in that harbour without taking the ground. The real difficulty is, whether the master was not bound to accept the defenders' offer to take out so much of the cargo at the Tail of the Bank as would have reduced her draught to a depth with which she could have always floated at Glasgow. This difficulty is not to be solved by an appeal to the custom of the port; for, in the first place, although an agreement to be bound by the custom of the port originally stood in the charter-party, it was withdrawn before signature by mutual consent; in the next place, no uniform custom of port has been proved, but, on the contrary, what is proved is, that although some captains consent to lighten at the Tail of the Bank and then go on to Glasgow, others refuse, and their consent requires to be purchased; and, in the third place, even if the usage had been uniform, the pursuer was not cognisant of it, and cannot be presumed to have had it in view at the time of making the contract, as he did not then even know that the ship was to go to Glasgow, whilst it is settled law, as was expressly laid down in Kirchener v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. 362, that "evidence of the usage of a particular place, to add to or in any manner to affect the construction of a written contract is admitted only on the principle that the parties who made the contract were both cognisant of that usage, and are presumed to have made the agreement in reference to it." The true solution, therefore, seems to depend on the answer to be given to the question—Was the voyage ended when the Frey had got as near to her port of discharge (Glasgow) as she could get, and lie afloat with her full cargo on board at all states of the tide? The defenders maintain that the voyage was not ended, but was only to be interrupted for a day or two till the lightening took place. The pursuer contends that he was not bound to consent to a partial discharge at two different places, and that, under the terms of the charter-party, he was under no obligation, whether lightened or not, to go to any harbour where the Frey could not lie afloat with her full cargo, and receive a return freight producing the same draught. There is no decision in the books precisely in point, but it has been held in several English cases, as noticed by the Sheriff-substitute in his carefully considered note, that where there is a temporary obstruction to geting into the port of discharge, though it should occasion a delay of several weeks, the voyage is not ended, and the vessel must wait till the obstruction ceases or is removed. Now, should not the converse of the rule hold equally good, viz., that if, as here, there is not a temporary but a permanent impossibility of getting to the port of discharge with the cargo on board, and lying afloat there, the voyage is ended, and the condition of the charter-party fulfilled as soon as the ship arrives at a place as near the port as she can safely get, and lie afloat? The case of Whitwell v. Harrison, 2 W. H. & G. 127, seems to give an affirmative answer to the above question. The discharging port there was Wallasay Pool, in the Mersey, "or as near thereto as she could safely get, and there discharge her cargo;" and the vessel not being able to enter the port on account of her draught, the master proceeded to discharge outside, and damage having been sustained by the ship by her falling over in the course of the discharge, the court held that no recourse could be had by the owners, under a policy of insurance of the vessel, to her discharging port. This decision went upon the principle that the legitimate end of the voyage was where the discharge took place outside. It is true that the Tail of the Bank, is not a very usual, and perhaps not a very safe place of discharge; but cargoes are discharged there occasionally, and it is the nearest place to the harbour of Glasgow for a ship with a cargo like that of the Frey, without going into another port altogether. At the same time, the sheriff cannot help feeling that it would be much more convenient for the charterer, and probably better for all interested, that the master of a ship destined for the harbour of Glasgow, which is now a large and commodious one, should be bound, if her draught was beyond 16 feet, to consent to lightening at the Tail of the Bank, and then go up the river to her port. In the uncertainty, however, as to the mutual obligation of parties which presently exists, and in the face of the latitude allowed by the terms of the charter-party, effect, it is thought, cannot be given to the defenders' pleas. The evil may be remedied by the introduction into all future contracts of an express provision that when the draught exceeds a certain depth, the course now contended for as the most expedient, shall be followed. Two minor points were made at the debate by the defenders—first, that the offer, by way of compromise, to which the pursuer ultimately acceded, though made by the defenders on 4th Jan. 1864, was not accepted till 21st Jan.; and that it was this delay on the part of the pursuer that created the demurrage. But there are two answers to this—first, that the offer latterly accepted by the defenders was not quite the same as that made on the 4th of the month; and secondly, that if the pursuer was justified in refusing to go to Glasgow at all, the time taken up in negotiating about it cannot be imputed against him. The second point was, that demurrage effeired to only ten days, and that the claim for the other five days' detention was a claim for damage which was not competent to the pursuer. The answer to this also is twofold—first, that the master of a foreign vessel, when in this country, is competent to sue for every claim open to the owners, the more especially when, as the charter-party shows, it was with the master that the defendants contracted; and secondly, that demurrage and damage is here one and the same thing, the more especially as the defenders were in reality entitled to only forty lay-days instead of fifty, as allowed them by mistake.

YOUGHAL ELECTION PETITION.

*Bribery—Offers of money—Watchers—Colourable employment—Lavish expenditure—Money given to a mob—Largesse and alms to poor persons—Excessive payments to agents—*3 Geo. 4, c. 18 (Irish)—*Treating—*35 Geo. 3—Whether unrepealed as to Ireland—Treating before dissolution or issue of writ—Definition of "candidate"—17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 38, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 3—Preliminary objection—Amendment—Particulars—Costs.

An offer of money or of a loan to an elector, even by an agent or warm supporter of a candidate, and even in a conversation in which the person making it canvassed the elector for his vote, does not constitute an act of bribery unless it is made in consequence of the pendency of the election, and solely with the intention of inducing the elector to vote.

Therefore, where A., who was a warm supporter of a candidate, and acted in the town as agent to a brewer, went to B., an elector and publican, and asked him for his vote, and the latter said he could not give it, as being under an obligation to his landlord's agent for arrears of rent, and A. offered to advance the money to pay it off; but it appeared that it was customary with A. to advance money to B. every year on the part of the brewer, and both A. and B. swore that the offer had no reference to the vote of the latter; it was Held, that this did not amount to an act of bribery.

Where it was stated by the witnesses of the respondent that apprehensions of violence from the opposite side were entertained, the court held this a justification for the distribution of sums of money to electors for the alleged purpose of hiring and paying "watchers."

There is nothing per se corrupt in giving orders to electors to supply from their shops goods to be distributed among non-electors and poor persons, even though such orders are given on a very considerable scale, and to electors only.

Semble, the declaration of an elector to whom such orders were given, that he was not influenced thereby, is sufficient to rebut any presumption arising from the circumstances.

Lavish expenditure by a candidate, though very much to be reprehended, is not of itself sufficient to avoid an election. It must be made to appear that some of the money was spent in contravention of the law.

Money given to poor persons in the streets or among the mob, and admitted to be so given in order to acquire popularity for a candidate, and thus influence the election, is not a corrupt practice :

Semble, same as to drink given to non-electors and with the same object.

The 3 Geo. 4, c. 18 (Irish), limiting the number of attorneys' agents, &c., and the fees payable to each, is impliedly repealed by the Acts limiting the number of polling days and increasing the number of polling places.

The word "corruptly" in sect. 4 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, governs the whole of the section.

The word "corruptly" does not imply anything wicked or immoral, but only that persons do something knowing it is contrary to law.

The giving of drink with an intention to influence voters thereby is corrupt treating i.e., the intention to influence is that which renders the thing done "corruptly."

Semble, the 35 Geo. 3, though repealed as regards England, is not repealed as regards Ireland, and therefore that Act, concurrently with the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, governs questions of treating in petitions tried in Ireland.

The 3rd section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, repealing the portion of sect. 38 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which defines a "candidate at an election," enacts that that expression "shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have been issued."

Quære, whether, under this definition a person who had declared himself a candidate before the issue of the writ and dissolution, and committed acts of corrupt treating during such time only, and not after, comes within the 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, i.e., whether a person who is not a candidate at the time he commits acts of corrupt treating, and afterwards becomes one, is liable for those acts.

Semble, that the proper tribunal and time for trying an objection to the status of a petitioner is the Court of Common Pleas, and a reasonable time before the day fixed for the trial of the petition.

The court, however, admitted evidence to show the petitioner had no status rather than imperil the legality and regularity of the trial by rejecting it.

There is no analogy in this respect between the court of an election committee and that of a judge trying a petition, because in the former case there was no tribunal for such preliminary questions, whereas now there is, viz., the Court of Common Pleas.

Quære, whether under sect. 29 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, and rule 60, a judge has power to amend the petition or particulars, so as to let in proof of illegal practices, which could not be proved under the allegations of the petition in its existing form.

The costs are entirely within the discretion of the court; and as, under certain circumstances, an unsuccessful petitioner may not be ordered to pay a successful respondent's costs, or, in other words, the respondent may be made to pay his own costs, so, conversely, an unsuccessful respondent may not, under certain circumstances, be ordered to pay the costs of the petitioner, or, in other words, the successful petitioner may be left to pay his own costs.

This was a petition by John Wellington Brazier, an elector, complaining of the undue return of Christopher Weguelin, Esq., on the ground of bribery, treating, and other corrupt and illegal practices, and praying that the election of the said Christopher Weguelin be declared null and void; but it did not claim the seat for Sir Joseph McKenna, the unsuccessful candidate.

Heron, Q. C., Exham, Q. C., J. Cunningham (English Bar), and W. Greene, appeared for the petitioner

Butt, Q. C., O'Hagan, Q. C., and Cleary for the respondent.

The petition contained fourteen paragraphs. The first stated that "the petitioner is an elector who voted at the last election." The other paragraphs set forth charges of bribery, treating, and other corrupt practices in various forms.

In the bill of particulars, delivered pursuant to the order of the court, were the following notices among others: "Take notice, that under the general charge of illegal and corrupt practices, or matters voiding the election, the petitioner will further rely on this: That before, during, or after the said election the said respondent, by himself, his friends, or agents, &c., directly or indirectly, gave money fees, and retaining fees to attorneys, agents, &c., for doing something of, and concerning matters relating to such election, over and above the sums set forth to be paid in the schedule to the Act in that case made and provided, to agents, &c., by reason of the giving of which sums of money fees, and retaining fees as last aforesaid, said respondent became disqualified as a candidate, or to be returned, and the said election was void." Then followed the particulars.

There was also a notice to the effect that amongst other corrupt practices the petitioner would rely on the fact that committee-rooms were hired from certain voters on behalf of the sitting member at a time when the sitting member had hired, or arranged to hire, the committee-rooms returned in the election expenses account, and that these cases would be relied on either as cases of bribery or of corrupt practices to unseat the sitting member.

There were other paragraphs stating that a number of persons were bribed in the following manner:—Books were given to them for the colourable purpose of entering therein the names of "watchers" to be hired by them, and that money was paid to the said voters for the colourable purpose of paying such watchers, but really to be kept by them, or used for their own benefit.

It was also stated in the particulars that orders on an extensive scale were given by the respondent and his agents to various electors to supply boots, shoes, bread, flour, and other things to various persons at the expense of the respondent; and that such orders were given for the purpose of corruptly influencing, or gaining the votes of the said electors.

Heron, Q. C. was about to open the case for the petitioners, when O'Hagan, Q. C. interposed, and said: I have a preliminary objection to take to the status of the petitioner. The objection is founded on the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 8, which provides (inter alia), that "where any person who has voted at any election is found by any committee to have been guilty of bribery or treating at such election, his vote shall be void, and may, upon a scrutiny, be struck off the list of voters, &c." We propose to prove that the petitioner, Mr. Brazier, was guilty of bribery; that he was bribed himself, and attempted to bribe others. And as this court holds the place of a committee of the House of Commons, if we establish these allegations the court must treat the petitioner's vote as a nullity, and hold that he has no status which entitles him to petition. [O'BRIEN, J.—Is not this a matter which ought to have been settled before another tribunal?] Before the passing of the late Act, when petitions were tried before committees, preliminary objections to the petitioner's status were taken before the petition was gone into. [O'BRIEN, J.—Then there was no other tribunal for the settlement of such questions. I think this was a matter more properly for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas.] There was, I understand, an application made to the Court of Common Pleas to take the petition off the file, on the grounds alleged, but it was refused, and the preliminary objection was reserved by it. That court has nothing to do with the matter, and this court, holding as it does the position of a committee of the House of Commons, has the same power to deal with it. [O'BRIEN, J.—The order dismissing the application ought to be produced, in order that I may see on what terms it was dismissed. I shall reserve the objection until it is produced.]

Butt, Q. C., at a subsequent stage.—I shall, with the permission of your Lordship, re-open the question of the right of the petitioner to maintain the petition at all, and shall commence by handing to the court the order made by the Court of Common Pleas referred to on a former occasion. [O'BRIEN, J.—It appears by the order that the application, when made to the Court of Common Pleas, was refused with costs, but without prejudice to the applicant's raising at the trial any question that might be advised as to the petitioner's locus standi.] I wish to refer the court to the mode of procedure adopted in like cases by the committee of the House of Commons when trying election petitions. The practice where any objection was made to the right of the petitioner to have the petition heard, was to inquire into and decide on the merits of it before the committee went into evidence in support of the petition itself. That being so, this court ought to hear the preliminary objection now. The objection is, that the petitioner's vote was a nullity because he was a paid agent, because he bribed and was bribed. The Court of Common Pleas dismissed the application on the ground that it was not a matter that should have been brought before it. The allegations made in support of it were denied, and the court would not try a disputed fact on affidavit. It was left for the judge, who tried the petition, to determine as to the truth of the allegations. [O'BRIEN, J.—I do not think that the Act contemplated that a preliminary objection of this sort should be gone into on the trial. Supposing I allow evidence in support of your allegations to be gone into, and they are established, what am I to report to the Speaker?] That there was no petition. [O'BRIEN, J.—The section defining my duties provides, that at the conclusion of the petition the judge trying it shall determine whether the member returned at the election complained of, or any other, and what person was duly elected, or whether the election was void, and shall certify his determination to the Speaker. I have the trial now before me, and what am I to do?] Your Lordship is in the same position as a committee of the House of Commons. [O'BRIEN, J.—I am acting here under an Act of Parliament, which binds me at the end of the trial to certify to the Speaker whether or no the election was void, and whether there had been corrupt practices. To do this I must hear the case. I am now in this position—the trial has been appointed; the petition sent down to me to try; the parties and their witnesses all ready; and I am now asked to try whether there is to be a trial at all.] Supposing a petition is presented by a person who was disqualified, would your Lordship be bound to hear it? [O'BRIEN, J.—There is some mode of hearing the objection; the Court of Common Pleas has the fullest jurisdiction over these proceedings; and assuming that the facts warranted inquiry, I do not see why it was not in the power of the Court of Common Pleas to try it.] The court would never try a matter of the kind on affidavit. Willes, J. has decided that an objection to the status of the petitioner was a matter for the judge on the trial. [O'BRIEN, J.—The objection is no part of what I am to try. It is not included in what I have to report.] You should report the sitting member duly elected, as there would be no evidence against him in the event of the allegations being established. I assert that the petition is a nullity; and I ask where is the question whether it is or not to be tried, if not here? Perhaps a case of this kind was not contemplated by the Act of Parliament, but until rules are framed to meet it, the practice of the Election Committees must guide the proceedings in election petitions.

O'BRIEN, J.—I am very unwilling to bind the parties by my opinion on a point of law like that now advanced. I shall decide to hear the evidence in support of the petition without prejudice to such evidence as may be adduced in support of the objection.

Heron, Q. C. during his opening statement, having referred to the return made by the respondent's election expenses agent, which only showed the sum of 2*l.*, said he would be able to show that the respondent's expenditure amounted to nearly 7000*l.*; and called the attention of the court to the decision of Martin, B. in the Bradford Petition (reported 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 718.) There the constituency was 21,000., and the expenditure was shown to amount to 7200*l.*, and on this Martin, B. said that it was impossible for any election to stand in the face of such an expenditure of money as this, and the petition accordingly succeeded.

The evidence sufficiently appears in the judgment:

March 2.—O'BRIEN, J. (having discussed several cases of alleged bribery) said:—These several charges of bribery, to which I have particularly referred, are the only cases among the seventy-eight mentioned in the bill of particulars as to which any evidence has been given; and I have referred to those cases at some length, not merely for the sake of showing the grounds upon which I have come to the conclusion that none of them has been established, but also for the purpose of expressing my strong disapprobation of the manner in which this bill of particulars has been framed. It appears that 127 voters polled for Mr. Weguelin at the election, and 106 for Sir J. McKenna. There are charges of bribery in seventy-eight cases, as to voters, of whom the far greater number voted for Mr. Weguelin. When the case was opened by Mr. Heron, as a case in which substitution was not prayed, it struck me (what the result has proved), that there was great doubt whether these cases were inserted upon any sufficient grounds. The object of a bill of particulars is to give the opposite party reasonable information as to the case that will be made against him; to give him an opportunity of inquiry, and to enable him, if he can, to contradict or explain the facts charged against him; but the system adopted here would defeat that object. The petitioner might almost as well in this case have included in the bill of particulars the 127 parties who voted for Mr. Weguelin, and I cannot avoid saying that, in my opinion, this bill of particulars was either framed "as a blind" (to use an expression attributed to Mr. Justice Willes on a late occasion), and for the purpose of baffling inquiry, by rendering the cases to be inquired into so numerous, that proper inquiry could not be made, or else (if not prepared with that intention) that it was framed with a reckless disregard and indifference to its accuracy and without the slightest consideration whether the charges in it were true or not, or whether those acting for petitioner had any reasonable ground or reliable information as to their truth. Besides, in the present case, the respondent himself is charged with personal bribery in all those cases except two or three. He was examined by petitioner as a witness, but he was not asked a single question by petitioner's counsel as to those charges. Other gentlemen were also charged with personal bribery. Several of them were examined during the trial; but, with a few exceptions, not a single question was asked of them by petitioner's counsel as to those charges; and Mr. Butt, as respondent's counsel, had of course to ask them to negative charges that were made upon paper, but which neither the counsel nor the witnesses for petitioner ventured to support. I think that some regulations should be made with regard to such bills of particulars, and I have made these observations to express my disapprobation of the practice resorted to on this occasion, and to show that it should be discountenanced in every possible way, and should be regarded as a matter, which (whatever the result of the petition may be), should materially affect the question of costs. If a party has a case, and comes forward and succeeds on it, that is no reason why he should lead the proceedings with gross charges against individuals without any ground or reliable information upon which to sustain them. In the present case Mr. Barnett, although not served with a subpœna as a witness, stated that he came here with every document he could get to vindicate his character, because he heard that he was charged in the bill of particulars with having bribed several persons. The next part of the case is as to the employment of watchers. In the course of the trial, I expressed my opinion that it was upon the evidence sufficiently shown that the general arrangement for the appointment of watchers was made bona fide, and was considered necessary by the parties who made it for the purposes which they stated, namely, for their protection. I understood that Mr. Heron, petitioner's leading counsel, did not dissent from that view, but acquiesced in it. The matter was referred to by me upon the examination of a witness who was asked as to a conversation with the Rev. Mr. Foley. Mr. Heron, on the part of the petitioner, objected to that question, and I stated that the only object of such evidence appeared to be to show the bona fide character of the arrangement made for the employment of watchers, which I said was in my opinion sufficiently shown upon the evidence. When I stated what my impression was, Mr. Heron acquiesced in it, and the question was not pressed; but on the following day after Mr. Heron's departure, Mr. Exham dissented from my view of Mr. Heron's acquiesence, and I then stated I did not wish to bind counsel by what had been stated in the course of discussion, and not taken down as admission. A considerable amount of evidence was, however, given on this matter, which in my opinion clearly showed that Mr. Heron was justified in not disputing the correctness of the conclusion at which I stated I had arrived. It appeared from that evidence that Mr. Weguelin in the beginning of his candidature was encountered by the decided opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy of this town, who had in very strong language attempted to discountenance any opposition to Sir Joseph McKenna, and had in like manner addressed their congregations on various occasions to that effect. Mr. Kennedy (an active supporter of Mr. Weguelin), swore that in a conversation with Mr. Hodnett, the conducting agent of Sir Joseph McKenna, early in August, Mr. Hodnett said in his office that the Rev. Canon Murphy, with the mob, would sweep the opposition to Sir Joseph McKenna out of the town. The Rev. Canon Murphy was examined; he denied (and I believe his denial) that he ever had said or done anything that would have warranted Mr. Hodnett to make that statement; and Mr. Hodnett also on his examination said that Canon Murphy had never said anything that would warrant such a statement. But I refer to this matter, not for the purpose of considering whether such a statement was in fact made by Canon Murphy, but to show the impression which Hodnett conveyed to Kennedy, and the apprehension that might naturally be supposed to have been created in the minds of Mr. Weguelin's supporters by what Mr. Hodnett said. Mr. Hodnett was examined to contradict Kennedy's evidence. On his direct examination he gave a qualified denial of having said so, but on his cross-examination he said that he would not positively say that he did not make such a statement to Mr. Kennedy, as he said many things during the election agitation; but he was sure he did not make that statement to Kennedy in his office, or except among groups of people to keep up their spirits. It appears, however, that Mr. Kennedy understood the statement in the terms in which it was made. Mr. O'Shea, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, also swore that after the declaration of the 4th June, in which so many pledged themselves to oppose Sir Joseph McKenna, he was constantly beset by the mob in the streets, shouted at, and hissed at, when passing at various times from that till the time of the election. Mr. Eastaway, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, swore that before the watchers were appointed, he had heard the threats of the mob that his house would pay for it as it had done in 1852, if he did not vote with the clergy. Donovan, another supporter of Mr. Weguelin, stated that before he got his watcher's book his house was attacked, his wife dragged by the mob into the street, and that he had been attacked and struck by Sir Joseph McKenna's mob in the street at night, and that on one occasion they said they would have his life. Subsequent to these occurrences, and on the 18th Nov., within a week or eight days of the election, an arrangement was made at Mr. Barry's office by several of the principal supporters of Mr. Weguelin, that watchers should be appointed for the protection of Mr. Weguelin's friends and supporters. It was then arranged that, in order to secure the election of proper watchers, and prevent the indiscriminate appointment of persons who might act, and take money on both sides, various voters who required protection, or who were considered proper persons to make the selection, should get books or papers for the purpose of entering in them the names of the men they employed. A large discretion must have been necessarily left to the parties who got the books as to the number of men they would employ. After that arrangement was made, events happened which showed that the precautions were not by any means superfluous. Mr. Eastaway swore that on the night before the polling his shop was attacked and entered by the mob, headed by Mr. O'Connor, the son-in-law of Sir Joseph McKenna. Eastaway stated what took place on that occasion. Mr. O'Connor was in court, and was not examined to contradict him. Mr. Fleming and Mr. O'Shea also stated that on another occasion (whether before or after the arrangement of watchers I do not now recollect) Mr. O'Shea was thrown down and knocked about by Sir Joseph McKenna's mob, opposite Sir Joseph McKenna's committee-room; and several witnesses also deposed to the fact that a country mob in the interest of Sir Joseph McKenna entered the town at the election; and that in their opinion the appointment of watchers was requisite for their protection. Mr. Exham very properly relied upon the evidence of Mr. Dennehey, the resident magistrate, who deposed to the peaceful state of the town during and previous to the election. I attach implicit credit to anything Mr. Dennehey stated from his own knowledge of the state of the town during that period; but outrages such as I have stated, being sudden and of short duration, might take place and cause serious injury before the police would come up; and, with respect to the attack upon Eastaway's house, Mr. Eastaway stated that the mob had nearly all gone away before the police made their appearance. Mr. Dennehey also stated his opinion that the mobs were so well matched against each other as to prevent them from fighting. Supposing, therefore, that this arrangement was made bonâ fide (as I have no doubt it was), and that it was a reasonable precaution, the question is whether it was in any instance carried out colourably, and as a cloak for bribery or undue influence. Several witnesses were examined as to the appointment and employment of these watchers for their protection, and as to the names and the numbers of those employed, and the amount paid them. Without going into their evidence in detail, I think it enough to say that in my opinion no case of any such colourable appointment was established. The rate of payment was not excessive, being 3s. a day or night. It appears that the number of men was about 350 or more, and the amount paid was about 300*l.* I may observe that at the late trial of the Limerick election petition before Baron Fitzgerald, it appeared that a very large number of men were employed for a somewhat similar purpose, and that though they were only employed during two days, about 250*l.* was paid for them. Mr. Exham, in his reply yesterday, endeavoured to establish a case of colourable payment of money, under the pretext of watching, on account of a discrepancy of a few shillings between the statements of Patrick Ahern and of Cronican. It is possible that Ahern may not have got the full amount he claimed, but he swore positively as to the number of men he employed, and that the amount due to them was equal to the money that he claimed. Having disposed of this question as to the watchers, I now come to the charge of distribution of money in the streets to the poor. None of this money was given to any voters, but it was alleged that this was bribery under the third paragraph of the 2nd section of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, which declares every person to be guilty of bribery who should "directly or indirectly, by himself or any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, &c., as therein mentioned, to or for any person, in order to induce such persons to procure or endeavour to procure the return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter," &c. There was certainly a very large sum of money given (I would say most improvidently given), to the poor people in the streets; it was really no charity, whatever it was intended for, because its effects were not those that would be produced by well-administered charity. Mr. Weguelin himself expressed his own disapprobation of it in strong terms. It appeared that about 130*l.* was given by Mr. Barry in this way, 160*l.* by Mr. Mooney, and some 50*l.*, I think, by Mr. Barnett. That money was distributed to an extent which, considering the way it was given, was quite inexcusable. The sums were distributed in sixpences and shillings, and I think sometimes in two-shilling and half-crown pieces. But what is the ground upon which it is alleged that the giving of this money was bribery, or that it was given to induce the persons who got it to procure Mr. Weguelin's return, or the vote of any elector? When I asked the petitioner's counsel this question, the only ground which his ingenuity suggested for connecting the return of Mr. Weguelin to Parliament with the giving of this money to poor non-electors, so as to bring the case within this bribery section, was, that it was given in the contemplation that the people who got the money would spend the amount in drink and thereby increase the profits of the publicans with whom they drank, and would in that indirect manner influence the votes of those publicans, and endeavour to procure the return of Mr Weguelin. Until Mr. Exham stated that, I was at a loss how to connect this giving of money with an act of bribery. His suggestion is very ingenious, but I think it is enough to read the words of the Act of Parliament to see that such a proceeding as this was not contemplated as being within its provisions. Petitioner's counsel also relied on the orders for food, drink, boots, shoes, and other articles of clothing to be supplied to the poor non-electors; and Mr Exham endeavoured also to establish that these orders were given with a view to induce the shopkeepers by whom those goods were supplied to vote for Mr Weguelin, on account of the profits they derived from such orders. Numbers of those shopkeepers were, however, examined, and stated that their profits on the goods were very inconsiderable. The parties who gave the orders were also examined, and they swore they gave them without the slightest reference to any advantage to be gained by the shopkeepers, or to their votes, though it appeared that all the orders were given to shopkeepers who had promised to support Mr Weguelin. With regard to the profit of the shopkeepers, one of them said that on the sale of 80*l.* or 90*l.* worth of goods his profit was not 30*s.*; others said they sold them at lower prices than they usually charged. It appeared that in one shop boots of rather an expensive description were supplied; but the shopkeeper's daughter, who was examined, accounted for it by saying that when the order was given her stock was nearly exhausted, and she could only give what she had; and, with respect to some patent leather boots which were so much commented upon, it appeared that they were bought for Mr Weguelin himself. With reference to the orders for food given to the poor non-electors, Mr Exham stated that he could not bring them within the 4th section against treating. But if he could not bring them within that section, how could they be brought within the section against bribery? If the purpose for which those orders for food were given was such as to bring the case within the 3rd paragraph of the bribery section, it would follow that it would be equally within the 4th section against treating. I shall next consider the charge of excessive payments made to respondent's agents. Mr Exham applied at the close of petitioner's evidence for liberty to amend the petition by charging that those over payments rendered the election void under the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 58, s. 6. I refused that application on the various grounds I then stated, and I stated also that if it was necessary to decide the point I should be inclined to hold that this Act of Geo. 4 has been impliedly repealed. With regard to counties, by the subsequent Acts to which I referred, the Reform Act (2 & 3 Will. 4), reduced the number of polling days from fifteen to five; and the subsequent Act of 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 68), further reduced the number of polling days to two in counties and one in cities, towns, and boroughs; and another subsequent Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 62) further reduced the polling days in counties to one day. Now the very division of polling places in counties made by those latter Acts would necessitate the employment of more than one conducting agent, which alone was allowed by the Act of Geo. 4. In a county it could not be contended as reasonable or just that a candidate should be prohibited from having more than one such agent. Take the county in which we are, in which there are so many polling places, and where polling lasts but one day only, could it be contended that in this county a candidate should employ only one conducting agent, or should pay his other agents or inspectors only the sums prescribed for one day by the Act of Geo. 4? If he did so, he would not get persons upon whose judgment or intelligence he could rely. Supposing, however, that this provision of the Act of Geo. 4 is still in force, the petitioner cannot rely on those over-payments as of itself vitiating the election, because he did not make that case by his petition. But Mr. Exham further contended that these over-payments were acts of bribery within the 3rd paragraph of the bribery section of the Act of 1854. Considering, however, the very penal consequences attached to bribery, and that if these over-payments to agents were to be considered as acts of bribery, they would be acts of personal bribery by the candidate who paid those agents, I cannot come to the conclusion that they should be considered as such, or that it was the intention of the Legislature to make those over-payments acts of bribery. Such an intention should, I think, have been expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. A supposed case was put by Mr. Exham of extravagant sums (say 1000*l.*) being paid to two or three influential solicitors in a town, ostensibly for their services as agents, but really for the purposes of securing their support and influence with the voters. Every case must, however, be judged of by its own circumstances; and if such extravagant sums were paid to influential parties in a town, sums exceeding, and out of all proportion, the amount of any fair remuneration for their legitimate services, then indeed it would be a question whether the money was bonâ fide paid for such services, or was not really paid for the purpose prohibited by this third paragraph. When that case arises it will be requisite to deal with it; but for the present I state my opinion that on the question raised in this case, and having regard to the facts which appeared upon the evidence as to the agents who were appointed, I do not think that these over-payments can be relied on as acts of bribery. It appears that the only agent who was a resident or voter of this town is Mr. Barry, who was virtually Mr. Weguelin's conducting agent, and who did not vote at the election. Mr. Mooney's first acquaintance with Youghal was on a visit some months before the election. Neither he nor Rice or Mackay had votes; and it is to be observed as to the payment to Mr Rice, that it included his attendance at the revision, which was a matter that required intelligence and labour to carry out. I now come to a question upon which I have felt some difficulty, namely, the charge of treating; and I shall first notice the argument of Mr. Exham, that the old Act of the 35 Geo. 3, c. 29, s. 19, is still in force as regards boroughs. The provisions of that section are (amongst other things) that no person to be thereafter elected to serve in Parliament for any county, city, town, or borough, shall, after the teste of the writ, or after a vacancy shall have happened, give or allow to any elector, directly or indirectly, any meat, drink, or entertainment; or shall at any time thereafter give or allow any meat, drink, &c., to any voter in order to be elected, or for being elected; and that the election of any person so giving or allowing any meat, drink, &c., should be void. Mr. Clarke, whose book has been cited, expresses his opinion that, under the 19th section, the qualifying words, "in order to be elected," &c., governed only the latter part. Without saying that I concur in that conclusion, the consequences of not holding would be very serious if that section was still in force. Supposing a candidate's brother, or other near relation, who had a vote, came and dined with him before the teste of the writ and the election, the candidate would be liable under that section, as the first part of it prohibits the giving of meat or drink to any voter, without reference to the purpose or design for which it was given; and the candidate would in such case be disqualified from being elected. It appears that this old Act of Geo. 3, so far as relates to counties of cities and counties of towns, was repealed by the 4 Geo. 4, c. 55; but the 79th section of that latter Act contained a provision in terms the same as the 19th section of the former Act, except that it applied only to counties of cities and counties of towns. That 79th section was itself expressly repealed by the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, which does not repeal or notice the Act of the 35 Geo. 3, which was then unrepealed, as to boroughs in Ireland, though it does repeal the English Act of Will. 3, which contains provisions similar to those of the 19th section of 35 Geo. 3; and Mr. Exham contends that accordingly this 19th section is still in force as to boroughs. It would, however, require some reason to establish that the Legislature intended that a different state of the law should exist in Ireland from that which exists in England, and also intended that there should in Ireland be a difference in the law of treating as regards boroughs from that which exists as to counties of cities and counties of towns. Mr. O'Hagan (respondent's counsel) also relied on the preamble of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, as showing the intention of the Legislature to have (as regards corrupt practices) the same law for all elections. That preamble states the insufficiency of the laws then in force for preventing corrupt practices in the election of members; and that it was expedient to consolidate and amend such laws. Then the 4th section deals with some of the acts which are legislated against by the 19th section of 35 Geo. 3, and provides that they shall constitute the offence of "treating," if they are done "corruptly." The 23rd section of the Act of 1854 may also be referred to. It is clear that, so far as the 19th section of the 35 Geo. 3 was to remain in force, there would be no doubt that the giving of food, meat, or drink upon the day of polling would be illegal. But this 23rd section of the Act of 1854 states that doubts had arisen as to "whether the giving of refreshments to voters on the day of nomination or the day of polling be or be not acccording to law." Probably whoever prepared this Act had not in his contemplation the Act of 35 Geo. 3. But I fully concur in the principle so clearly relied on by Mr. O'Hagan, namely, that an Act of Parliament, though not expressly repealed, is impliedly repealed by a subsequent Act, the provisions of which are inconsistent with the previous Act, and I think on that ground I should hold that the 19th section of the 35 Geo. 3 is no longer in force, even as to boroughs in Ireland. The part of the case as to the charge of treating, with respect to which I feel the difficulty I have stated, is that which rests upon the 4th section of the Act of 1854. Mr. Butt, in the first instance, contended that, having regard to the Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 3), which altered the definition that had been given by the Act of 1854 of the words "candidate at an election," Mr. Weguelin was not responsible for any act of treating committed before the dissolution, consequent upon which the writ for holding this election was issued. That Act of 1864, sect. 38, says that the words "candidate at an election" shall include "all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and also all persons nominated as candidates, or who shall have declared themselves candidates at or before such election." If that definition of the words "candidate at an election" was still in force, there would be no doubt whatever that the sitting member would be answerable for any acts of treating committed by him or his agents after the time when he declared himself a candidate, though long before the election. But Mr. Butt (and I believe he may have the credit of having first suggested this point) refers to the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, the 3rd section of which expressly repeals so much of sect. 38 of the Act of 1854, as defined the words "candidate at an election," and declares that in the construction of the said Act of 1854, as amended by said latter Act, "the words 'candidate at an election' and the words 'candidate at any election' shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates, on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have been issued." The following definition of the word "candidate" is given in the 3rd section of the interpretation clause of the Act of last session, viz., "Candidate shall mean any person elected to serve in Parliament at an election, and any person who has been nominated at or declared himself a candidate at an election." Mr. Butt contends that the 4th section in the Act of 1854, which defines the offence of treating, should be read with the definition of the words "candidate at an election," given by the subsequent Act of 1858; and that if a person was not (within the meaning of that definition) a candidate at the time he treated, he therefore was not responsible for it under said 4th section, and that no action could be brought against him for the penalty of 50*l.* imposed by that section except for acts done after he became such candidate; and he further contends that if such person was sued for the penalty, after he declared himself a candidate, for acts of treating committed by him before he became a candidate, it is clear that as he was not liable to the penalty at the time of committing those acts he could not subsequently become liable thereto on the ground of his subsequently becoming a candidate. Though this is a very ingenious argument, I am not prepared to pronounce any opinion upon it. I think the construction for which Mr. Butt contends would lead to consequences that would in a manner nullify one of the manifest objects of the Act, by holding that, down to the time of dissolution, acts of treating might be committed with impunity. If so, the mischief intended to be avoided by the Legislature might take place, and the candidate absolved from all responsibility, provided he stopped at the dissolution. If, on the other hand, treating by the candidate before the dissolution was, by reason of the subsequent statute, exempted from the operation of the Act of 1854, which is a penal Act, then Mr. Butt has a right to contend that these statutes should be strictly construed. I have stated that he may have the credit of raising this point, because I find that in some of the recent election trials in England acts of treating were proved and successfully relied on, though they took place before the dissolution. In the Windsor case (the first that was tried), a transaction took place in the month of August, which was relied on as an act of treating, namely, that of the sitting member presiding at and providing wine for a dinner that was given by some society. Willes, J. held that it was not an act of treating, because the society was a social and not a political one; but the fact of its having occurred before the dissolution was not relied on. Under these circumstances I will not here decide that Mr. Weguelin is not responsible for acts of treating committed previous to the dissolution. The question has been very ably argued by Mr. Butt, and I stated in the early part of the trial that I would, if necessary, reserve the question for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, under the 12th section of the Act of last session. What I have already stated implies that I have come to the conclusion upon the question of treating, that acts took place which might be considered as treating, subject to the construction of the words, "candidate at an election," in that 4th section; but there is upon this point another question of difficulty as to the meaning of the word "corruptly" in that section. It has been urged for the respondent that if an Act of Parliament attaches a penalty to an act, "if done corruptly," this would imply that the doing of the act was not per se corrupt, and that there should be some other element in the case to warrant the conclusion that the party, by doing the act, became liable to the penalty. This 4th section uses, in the beginning of it, the word "corruptly." It provides that "every candidate at an election shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating who shall 'corruptly' by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted," &c., &c. The question then is, what is the meaning of this word "corruptly"? and whether, having regard to the various authorities upon this point, the proof that has been given here of what took place at the Devonshire Arms showed that the drink there supplied was given "corruptly." At the recent trial of the Bradford Petition (No. 1), it was held that the opening of a number of public-houses for the purpose of indiscriminately supplying drink to voters and non-voters, warranted the conclusion of corruption. But before I consider the various authorities as to the effect and meaning of that word "corruptly," I will refer to what took place at the Devonshire Arms Hotel, which had been taken for Mr. Weguelin in July. Mr. Heron, in his opening statement, commented at considerable length upon the bill furnished by that hotel. During the early part of this trial it was the case of petitioner's counsel that almost all of the great quantity of drink of various descriptions charged in that bill was consumed at the entertainments in the upper rooms of the hotel in which Mr. Weguelin and his friends and agents were stopping from time to time. But I could not reconcile that supposition with the evidence given as to the number and description of persons who dined in or frequented those upper rooms. Miss Murphy, the daughter of the hotel keeper (who was himself unable, from illness, to attend as a witness) swore on her first examination that she took down the orders for such drink as they were given to her by the two waitresses who attended in those upper rooms (one of whom was produced here, and the other was not now in her service). It appeared from the evidence of the waitress who was examined, that she used to bring such orders to the bar, and take upstairs what was so ordered; and Miss Murphy stated that she used to put down on a slate, and enter from that in her book, either in the evening or the next morning, the amount of drink so ordered, and which (as I understood from her first evidence) was carried upstairs to some of the rooms occupied by Mr. Weguelin's friends or agents. I examined the hotel book more particularly, and was struck with the fact that this excessive supply of drink occurred on some particular days. I accordingly had Miss Murphy recalled, and on her further examination it appeared (what had not before transpired, though I do not think she had in the slightest degree intended any concealment or misleading on her first examination) that a great quantity (two thirds, at all events) was consumed, not in the rooms upstairs or upon orders given, but under the following circumstances: It appeared that on fourteen or fifteen evenings during the few months preceding the election there were meetings of Mr. Weguelin's supporters at Dill's committee-rooms, and that on those occasions the gentlemen and persons of the better class who attended those meetings used to come to the hotel when the meetings were over and go upstairs; that they were followed to this hotel by a crowd, several of whom attended the meetings, and this crowd forced their way on some occasions into the hotel, and insisted upon getting drink, and that she had to give them drink in order to get rid of them, and had sometimes to send for the police to clear the house, and that the drink supplied to them was put down by her to Mr. Weguelin, and constituted so large a proportion of the amount. She also stated that neither Mr. Barry nor Mr. Mooney, nor any others of the committee, ever told her to give such drink, and that she never informed them of the amount so given. That would, according to her evidence, account for about two-thirds of the drink; but the remaining one-third was very considerable in quantity, and it appears that the greater portion of it was consumed in the rooms upstairs. A great deal of evidence has been given as to the number and class of persons who frequented those upper rooms, their position in life, and their decided feelings in favour of Mr. Weguelin. It also, however, appeared that on three several occasions when Mr. Weguelin entered this town, namely, on the 29th July, the 5th September, and the 26th October, drink to a considerable amount was consumed in the coffee-room by the persons who took part in such processions and accompanied them to the hotel, several of those persons being voters. It certainly appears that some persons who drank from time to time in the coffee-room on those occasions, used to treat each other and pay for their drink themselves; but a considerable part of the drink consumed on those three occasions was not paid for, but was charged in the hotel book to Mr. Weguelin. The name of Robert Murphy, son of the hotel keeper, was mentioned yesterday by Mr. Exham, and his non-production was commented upon. As I had not known that he took any part in the management of the hotel, the necessity of calling for his production had not occurred to me; but when Mr. Exham observed upon his not having been examined, I thought it right, under the power given to me by the Act, to have him called and examined; and he stated that he recollected a number of committee meetings on which occasions several of the humbler classes followed from the committee rooms the gentlemen who went upstairs. From the manner in which Murphy gave his evidence, his memory does not appear to be very good, as he seemed to forget things that one might reasonably think he would have remembered; but at all events he did not give his evidence in a manner that would induce me to think he was adverse to Mr. Weguelin, or that he would exagerrate in the slightest degree anything that would tend to that gentleman's disadvantage. He stated that on several of those occasions when the crowd came over from the committee-rooms, it consisted of voters as well as of non-voters; that about sixty or eighty persons used to attend the committee-rooms, and that out of those sixty or eighty persons, several of them would come to the hotel when the meetings were over; that some of the voters would go upstairs and have drink there; and that several of the poorer class of voters used to come into the hotel and stand at the bar. Taking his evidence with that of Miss Murphy, that those presenting themselves at the bar and asking for drink would get it without her knowing whether they were voters or not, the manifest conclusion is, that on those various occasions several voters got drink at the bar. So far even as relates to the entertainment upstairs, this arrangement was a very improvident one for Mr. Weguelin. It has been held in England in several cases that acts much less positive have been considered as treating. The candidature of Mr. Weguelin was announced on the 29th July. The opposition which he encountered then, and the feeling that was sought to be got up against him, were relied on by Mr. Butt as suggesting the reason why he should leave persons here to act for him. To that alone there would be no objection, but if it is contended that the motive of giving these constant entertainments in the rooms upstairs was to promote his popularity and to counteract the influence of the opposition, it would go very far towards establishing a case of treating. It may be that the feeling against Mr. Weguelin, which was caused by the Roman Catholic clergy and others, rendered it advisable for him to leave some of his friends behind to act for him in his absence; and that this may more or less account for the giving of charity, which, as I have already stated, did not in my opinion amount to bribery, though given for the purpose of increasing his general popularity. But with respect to the entertainments in the rooms upstairs, it is to be observed that Mr. Weguelin did not himself reside in that hotel after the 14th Aug. He stopped with Mr. Mooney from the 5th to the 12th Sept. on his second visit to Youghal, and he took a house for himself at his third visit on the 26th Oct. Mr. Barrett did not stop long at the hotel, and Mr. Rice and Mr. Mackey were there but occasionally, so that it is difficult to regard those entertainments in the rooms upstairs as what would naturally occur from persons calling in the evening to see Mr. Weguelin or his friends, and being asked, as a matter of courtesy, to partake of drink. Considering, however, all the evidence given as to the character and positions in life of the persons who partook of those entertainments upstairs, that several of them were not voters, and that such of them as were voters were, with few exceptions, the avowed supporters of Mr. Weguelin, and the opponents of Sir Joseph McKenna, having pledged themselves to Mr. Weguelin from the period of his arrival, there are grounds for contending that, if the proceedings at the "Devonshire Arms" were confined to those entertainments upstairs, they would not amount to treating. But, even in that case, it would require much further consideration before I came to such a conclusion, having regard to the decisions in England, not in one particular case, but in several, and to the opinion of the judges, that arrangements of that sort, where people might come without invitation, and partake of drink at the expense of the candidate, might be regarded as acts of treating from the number of times the drink was supplied, and the apparent object with which it was given. But I am relieved from the necessity of considering the effect of these entertainments upstairs from what took place in the coffee-room and at the bar of the hotel. It appears that on the occasions of the three demonstrations on the 29th July, the 5th Sept., and the 26th Oct., and of the fourteen or fifteen meetings at Dill's committee-rooms, several of the people who attended the processions and meetings used to go into the coffee-room or to the bar to get drink. There is no evidence to show that there was any limit put upon them; on the contrary, the evidence shows that any of those who attended the processions or meetings might have gone to the coffee-room or bar and ordered drink; and though there is no ground for saying that Miss Murphy gave any quantity sufficient to produce intoxication, there is certainly general evidence that several voters were seen drinking in the coffee-room without paying for it; and we have the further evidence of Robert Murphy, which leaves no doubt upon my mind of the fact, that on the occasion of those committee meetings several voters of the humbler class came from the committee-rooms and got drink at the bar. He certainly declined to say whether any of the persons whom he actually saw drinking on those occasions were voters; but we have the evidence of Miss Murphy, that drink was supplied on those occasions to anybody who came to the bar and asked for it. Independently, then, of the law of the case, no one on this evidence can hesitate to come to the conclusion that, upon those several occasions, voters of the humbler class, with respect to whom the mischief of treating would be most likely to be produced, were supplied with drink; and then the question is, Was that drink given "corruptly" within the meaning of the 4th sectionof the Act of 1854? It was, as I have already remarked, urged in the course of the trials, that where an act is made penal, if done "corruptly," is is to be implied that the act per se is not necessarily corrupt. Mr. Exham, however, has referred to several authorities (some of which I had myself considered before), which show what construction the judges in England have put upon the word "corruptly," used in this 4th section as to treating. In the Windsor case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613, which was the first petition tried, there was a dinner of the society of Odd Fellows in the month of August, at which tha sitting member attended, and ordered for it a quantity of champagne, which was paid for by him and two of his supporters. Willes, J. held that this did not constitute treating, as the society was a non-political one, although it did include several electors. But he says (p. 614), "I am impressed with the objectionable character, to say the least of it, of any transaction by which an intending candidate may seek to ingratiate himself with electors, whether of his own side in politics or not, by profuse expenditure for luxuries. I must express the opinion, for I entertain it, that this is a questionable proceeding, and that it would be well if such proceedings were refrained from in future; the more so because no one but a man possessed of wealth could afford to expend 27*l.* in a single evening on drink for other people." That case was followed by the Bewdley case, which was tried before Blackburn, J., 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676; when alluding to to the word "corruptly," he says (page 678), "The interpretation of this word as explained, and in my opinion rightly explained, by Willes, J., is not 'wickedly' or 'immorally' or anything of the sort, but embraces such conduct as it was evidently the intention of the Legislature to discountenance; where it is shown that even the smallest quantity of meat or drink is supplied, that is of course admissible as evidence of treating, but more than that would be required to make out a corrupt intention." Again, he says: "The evidence shows that nearly twenty public-houses were habitually kept open, and that whoever chose to present himself was supplied with drinks. Where that is done it would be a perfect mockery to suppose that it was done without any corrupt intention." In the present case the Devonshire Arms hotel was the only place where drink was supplied under circumstances that would amount to treating, as it did not appear that the drink consumed by voters in the public-houses was paid for or ordered by Mr. Weguelin or his agents. But, considering the extent of drink given at the hotel, and the frequent occasions on which it was given, I think that the foregoing observations of Mr. Justice Blackburn bear materially on the present case. I may also refer to the Bradford case (No. 1), 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 719. It appeared that 115 public-houses were opened in that town, in which refreshments were supplied to all persons, whether voters or not, and that all voters who went there were made nominal members of the committee, but had nothing to do; and Martin, B. says (p. 721), "The learned counsel for the respondent has said that those refreshments were supplied to people who had done work, but the evidence is directly to the contrary; the evidence is to the effect that voters were admitted to those committee-rooms, the farce was gone through of putting down their names as committee-men, and refreshments were supplied to them whether voters or non-voters." Martin, B. also, in the second Bradford case, when giving an explanation of the grounds upon which he decided the previous petition, No. 1, against Mr. Ripley on the ground of treating, says (p. 726), "The case against Mr. Ripley was that he had opened public-houses in the sense in which that is commonly and generally understood, that they were public-houses selected by him or by his agents, that rooms were allotted in these houses where people went every night if they liked; that a messenger was put at the door, or some person for preventing others from coming there than persons in some way connected with the house, and the people who went nightly to these houses went there to get drink, only limited by this, that it was to be given in reason, and that it was not to be given in excess." Mr. Exham also referred me to the Lichfield case, which I have looked at, but I do not think it bears much upon this question; but he also referred to the Westminster case as showing what, in the transactions that there took place, were the grounds upon which Martin, B. held that they did not amount to treating. I have, however, already stated that I will reserve for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas the question as to the meaning of the words "candidate" "at an election;" and if, upon further consideration as to the meaning and effect of the word "corruptly," having regard to the evidence in this case, I should be of opinion that there is any question of law respecting it which might properly be reserved for that court, before I decide that the giving of the drink at the hotels amounted to treating, I would also reserve it, as I think it desirable that if there be any such question it should be settled by some decision of the court instead of relying on observations that may be explained by the facts of the particular cases in which they were made. What I have stated, of course, implies that, as regards the charges of treating, my judgment now on the result of the election is not final. As, however, the parties are here, I thought it would be a useless expense to postpone giving my judgment on the other parts of this case for the purpose of waiting for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas. The 12th section of the Act empowers me to reserve any question of law for the consideration of the court, and to suspend my certificate to the Speaker until the decision of the court upon the questions reserved shall be ascertained. I have expressed what appears to me to be the contention of both parties for and against the construction of the words "candidate at an election," relied on by Mr. Butt. Further than that, I am not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the subject; my opinion would be of little value, as the case is to go before another tribunal. There are, however, some other matters on which I have to observe. A great deal of time was consumed with evidence as to the amount of the expenditure of Mr. Weguelin, which certainly was excessive; there are several items in that expenditure which I cannot avoid saying should not have been charged against him by those whom he employed. He states himself that he has already paid 4200*l.*; Mr. Exham says the amount is something more, and there are further sums to be paid, taking into consideration the claims of Mr. Mooney, and the hotel bill, which would at all events come to some hundreds more; but even if the amount does not exceed 5000*l.* such an expenditure cannot be regarded otherwise than as excessive. I think, however, that much time was uselessly occupied in this matter, as great candour and willingness were displayed by Mr. Weguelin himself, Captain Weguelin, Mr. Barnett, and the other persons through whose hands money passed, in accounting for its expenditure; every document and voucher in their possession that was called for appears to have been produced, and produced readily. I have been told that this great amount of expenditure should influence my decision upon the question before me, and induce me to conclude that a portion of that expenditure was caused by bribery, but I do not assent to that argument. I have been referred to what a very able judge (Keogh, J.) said in Dublin as to the amount of expenditure, and also to what has been said with regard to the amount of expenditure in other cases; but where (as in this case) the expenditure has been accounted for, and where, however improvident that expenditure may have been, it has been proved by those through whose hands the money passed that none of it was spent in bribery, then the extravagant expenditure affords no foundation whatever for the charge that any portion of this money was spent in bribery, or was expended in any other manner than what was proved by the witnesses, whose evidence on the subject I see no reason to doubt. I have been also asked to report to the Speaker that corrupt practices extensively prevailed in Youghal during this election. That I decidedly will not do; I think I should be doing an act of gross injustice to the people of this town if I were to make any such report; I see no ground for holding that there was any corrupt practice at this election except as to the drinks given at the Devonshire Arms. I confess I was surprised at the application, particularly when it is to be considered, as I have already remarked, that seventy-eight cases of bribery were charged, and that not one of them was substantiated. The 11th section, paragraph 14, requires me also to report if any corrupt practices have been committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate. Of course, if I ultimately decide that, upon the evidence and the true construction of the words "candidate at an election," these proceedings at the Devonshire Arms amounted to treating, I shall report that such treating was with the knowledge and consent of Mr. Weguelin himself. The manifest inference from the entire evidence is that he knew of those entertainments from time to time, and indeed he did not deny his knowledge of them. I may observe that, as regards the consequences to Mr. Weguelin, it is immaterial whether, as such treating was committed by himself or his agents, I should report that it was with or without his knowledge and consent. That same section also requires me to report whether any candidate at an election has been guilty of corrupt practices. With regard to that there is some evidence before me that drink and other matters had been supplied by some of the supporters of Sir Joseph McKenna; but I am not aware at present that there is on the evidence any sufficient ground for me to report that such drink, &c., had been supplied either by Sir Joseph McKenna or with his knowledge or consent, or by his agents; I shall, however, further consider that matter. There now remains one question as to which I shall express my present opinion, namely, as regards the costs. The award of costs is discretionary with the judge. Mr. Exham pressed very fairly a principle upon which I have acted myself, namely, that the fact of the defeat of a petition would not necessarily be followed by the petitioner paying the costs. On the other hand, I think that, in the event of the success of a petition, it does not necessarily follow that the petitioner should get his costs. There have been repeated instances in the House of Commons proceedings before Parliamentary committees where, although the member was unseated for bribery or for treating, he was not condemned to pay the costs. I have already referred to circumstances which, I think, furnish grounds for the exercise of that discretion, by disallowing costs to the petitioner in this case, even in the event of the petition ultimately succeeding by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas. And, on the other hand, I think that, should the petition ultimately fail, by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, there are reasons for disallowing costs to the respondent. With regard to the ground for disallowing costs to the petitioner, it is clear, upon the evidence, that, so far as he himself is concerned, the question of costs is one of perfect indifference to him; that he is not responsible for the costs that are incurred; and that, in point of fact, as far as costs are concerned, the question may be considered as if this was the petition of Sir Joseph McKenna. I perfectly agree with Mr. Exham that, in deciding whether the election is void or not, by reason of corrupt practices, I should not have regard to the fact of Sir Joseph McKenna being the substantial petitioner, or to the indemnity for costs. Mr. Exham properly urged that the rights of the public are involved in inquiries of this nature, and that, no matter who brings the petition forward, still, if it be a bona fide petition, it is the duty of the judge to consider whether the law has been violated or not. But, with regard to the costs, I am at perfect liberty to take into account the fact that Sir Joseph McKenna is alone the party who would be interested in getting the costs; and when I call to mind the conduct that has been pursued, not merely by the mob, but by his own son-in-law in taking part with them, as I have already observed; and when I consider the petition itself, the bill of particulars, and the great length to which this trial has been protracted by inquiries in support of charges which have failed, I think there are good grounds for exercising my discretion as to the costs, by refusing petitioner his costs, even if the petition should succeed. My present impression is, that in any event of the petition, I shall let each party pay their own costs. That is my present impression, but I shall further consider the matter before I make any order on the subject, and if I see reason to change my opinion, I shall be at liberty to do so.

COMMON PLEAS (IRELAND).

Saturday, April 10.

(Before MONAHAN, C. J., KEOGH, MORRIS, and LAWSON, JJ.)

YOUGHAL ELECTION PETITION.

Treating before issue of writ—Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, s. 4—Candidate—Definition of— 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 38, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, s. 3.

The 3*rd section of* 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, repealing the portion of sect. 38 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which relates to the definition of "a candidate at an election," provides that that expression "shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall have declared themselves candidates on or after the day of the issuing of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ shall have been issued:"

Held, by the full court, that, under this section, acts of corrupt treating by the agents of the sitting member before the issue of the writ, and after he had publicly assumed the character of a candidate for the representation of the borough, constituted the offence of corrupt treating within the meaning of the 4*th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act* 1854, and avoided the election; and that it is not necessary that a person should be clothed with the character of a candidate according to the definition in the Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 87 s. 3) at the time of the treating in order to be liable for it, should he afterwards come within the definition of a candidate as by being elected, &c.

The maxim Reddenda singula singulis does not apply in such cases.

This was a special case stated by O'Brien J., for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas on the question whether the sitting member was liable for acts of corrupt treating committed by his agents before the issue of the writ.

The special case was as follows:

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT 1868.

In the matter of the election petition for the borough of Youghal, between John Wellington Brazier (petitioner), and Christopher Weguelin (respondent.)

Case for the determination of the Common Pleas.

I hereby certify that the above petition (to which I refer) came on for trial before me at Youghal on the 19th Feb. last; that the said trial continued for several days, and that on the conclusion of the said trial on the 2nd March last it appeared to me requisite that before finally determining as to the validity of the election and return complained of by said petition I should, under the 12th section of said Act, reserve certain questions of law for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, and that I should accordingly postpone granting the certificate directed by said Act until the determination of such questions by said court.

The dissolution of the last Parliament (in consequence of which the writ issued for holding the election complained of by the said petition) took place on the 19th Nov. last. It was proved at the trial before me that the respondent arrived in said borough of Youghal on the 29th July last, and that at and previous thereto it was expected that such dissolution would take place within some few months. It was also proved at said trial that said respondent on his said arrival in Youghal declared he was a candidate for the representation in Parliament of the said borough of Youghal, and would stand as such at the election to be held for said borough consequent on such expected dissolution. And it was also proved that said election (being that complained of by said petition) was held on the 19th and 21st Nov. last, when said respondent was retured by the returning officer as having been duly elected for the said borough. And it was also proved that said respondent at various times from his said arrival in Youghal until said dissolution, canvassed various electors of said borough for their votes at such election continuously from time to time and declared his intention of seeking at such election to be returned a member of Parliament for said borough.

It was also proved on said trial before me that after respondent's said arrival in Youghal, and on various occasions between the 31st July last and the said 11th Nov. last, the said respondent had by his agents and other persons on his behalf, corruptly caused drink to be given and provided to and for various voters and electors of said borough and other persons, in order to be elected a member of Parliament for said borough at said then expected election. It was, however, contended before me by respondent's counsel that, inasmuch as the giving and providing said drink was previous to the said 11th Nov. last (the day of the said dissolution), then that same did not constitute the offence of treating, and that respondent's said election was not rendered void. It was, on the other hand, contended by petitioner's counsel that, although the giving and providing of said drink as aforesaid was previous to said dissolution, yet that same constituted the offence of treating, and was a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act and of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, or of some of them, and that respondent's said election was rendered void by such treating.

I therefore request the opinion and determination of the Court of Common Pleas upon the following questions, viz.:

First, whether the corruptly causing of such drink to be given and provided as aforesaid previous to the said dissolution constituted the offence of treating, and whether the same was a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, and of said Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, or of any of them?

Secondly, whether the respondent's said election was rendered void by such treating?

JAMES O'BRIEN.

April 5, 1869.

Heron, Q. C., on the part of the petitioner, contended that corrupt treating before the issue of the writ avoided the election. This was not a case of simple treating, but of corrupt treating, with a view to be elected. Mr. Weguelin was held to having been by his agents and others guilty of corruptly causing drink to be given with a view to be elected, and that he was on divers occasions during a considerable interval of time so guilty. This was sufficient by the common law of Parliament to avoid an election apart from the statute.

Butt, Q. C., contra.—The 4th section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, which, defines the offence of treating makes the description of the person committing it just as much a part of it as the description of the offence. The description of the person charged is as essential as the definition of the offence. This being so, it was important to consider whether at the time the alleged offence was committed the respondent was a "candidate at an election." A candidate is defined to be a person elected to serve in Parliament at such election, or nominated at such election, or who shall have declared himself a candidate after the issue of the writ or dissolution. The declaration could not be extended back further than the time the writ was delivered to the sheriff. Therefore before that time the respondent did not come under either of these definitions. He may have declared himself a candidate before the issue of the writ, but that did not make him a candidate within the meaning of the 4th section amenable to its provisions. Supposing the Mutiny Act contained a clause that an officer playing billiards should forfeit his commission, and that he was subsequently brought up before a court martial on a charge of playing billiards before he had got his commission, what would be his answer to the charge? Simply that he was not an officer when he played the billiards. The statute in question says that every candidate who shall do certain things shall be guilty of treating. Where was the justice of charging the respondent under this with acts done by him before he was a candidate any more than in charging an officer with something which he was only prohibited from doing as an officer? As to the argument founded on the words "before the election" in the section, it must be borne in mind that the definition of a "candidate at an election" was changed since then, and that while the old definition stood a person may have been a candidate before the election, and liable for acts done as such before the issue of the writ; but the new definition by which a person cannot become a candidate before issue of the writ, impliedly repeals such portion of that section as speaks of treating before the election, i. e., before the issue of the writ.

MONAHAN, C. J., (without calling on Heron, Q.C., for a reply).—The question for us is a simple one. We would not dispose of the case now, if there was much difficulty; but the Act of Parliament is very clear unless the lawyers are able to make a difficulty out of it. The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act enacts in terms that every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself or by any other person or persons on his behalf corruptly (that is the governing word) at any time either before, during, or after an election directly or indirectly give, or procure, or be accessory to giving or procuring of meat, drink, or entertainment, to any electors in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such persons, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of 50*l.*, and so forth. In that Act of Parliament there is a section defining who is to be a "candidate," and that particular section is repealed by the 3rd section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87, which enacts that so much of the 38th section of the previous Act as defines a "candidate" shall be repealed, and that in substitution of it candidate shall include all persons elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and all persons nominated as candidates at such election, or who shall declare themselves candidates on or after the issuing of the writ, provided that nothing therein contained shall impose any liability on any person nominated without his consent, &c. The definition of "candidate," therefore, includes "all persons elected to serve in Parliament," and if you substitute that definition for the word candidate in the 4th section, you will have "Any person elected at such election who shall, by himself or any other person on his behalf, at any time, either directly or indirectly, give entertainment, he shall be guilty of treating." There the case is clear. We have not a shadow of doubt that the principle of rendering singula singulis does not apply in a case of this description. We think the true and fair construction of the Act is, that every man who is elected to serve in Parliament for any city, borough, or county, or any place returning a member of Parliament, who shall, before, during, or after an election, be guilty of giving or providing entertainment corruptly for the purpose of being elected, commits an offence within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. We must certify that to the learned judge, leaving him to draw his own conclusion. Of course we must add that the election was void.

Heron, Q. C.—As to costs; will your Lordships make any order?

MONAHAN, C. J.—No; we will merely answer the questions that were left to us.

Re THE CHINA STEAMSHIP AND LABUAN COAL COMPANY (LIMITED);

DRUMMOND'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Memorandum of association—Subscription thereof—Obligation to take shares created thereby—Subsequent application for and allotment of fully paid up shares—Whether the obligation is thereby satisfied—The Companies Act 1862, sect. 23—Official liquidator—Costs.

In Feb. 1865, an arrangement was made that a company to be formed under the name of C. Company, should take over the business and assets of two previously existing companies, the L. Company and the J. Company.

For the purpose of carrying out this arrangement as regarded the L. Company, that company resolved to wind-up voluntarily, and an affidavit dated the 2nd Feb. 1865, was made between the L. Company and the C. Company, which provided that the C. Company should purchase the business and all the property of the L. company at a certain price, which was to be paid, three-fourths by the delivery to the L. Company (who were called the vendors) of 20*l. shares in the C. Company, upon which* 10*l. or* 20*l. should be deemed to be paid-up, or partly in shares with* 10*l. paid, and partly in shares with* 20*l. paid, at the option of the vendors, and the other one-fourth in debentures of the C. Company. On the* 13*th Feb.* 1865, a prospectus of the L. Company was issued. This prospectus contained a statement that 7500 shares in the L. Company, partly fully paid up, and partly with 10*l. per share paid up, would be reserved for applicants who were shareholders in the L. Company and the J. Company. D. was a shareholder in the L. Company. On the* 22*nd Feb.* 1865, he subscribed the memorandum of association of the C. Company for twenty-five shares, and he was afterwards appointed one of the directors of that company. He signed a letter of application in the ordinary form for shares in the C. Company, paying a deposit of 1*l. per share. There were allotted to him* 478 shares in the C. Company as fully paid up, and one share as with 10*l. paid up, and his deposit was returned to him. The number of shares so allotted to him corresponded to* his interest in the assets of the L. Company. The C. Company was in course of time ordered to be wound-up. The liquidator sought to make D. a contributory in respect of the twenty-five shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum of association, in addition to the other shares which had been allotted to him, and the Master of the Rolls held that this must be done.

On appeal, held (reversing the Master of the Rolls), that the obligation to take shares in the C. Company which D. had incurred by subscribing the memorandum of association, was satisfied by the allotment to him of the other shares, because he had paid for those shares by giving up to the C. Company his interest in the assets of the L. Company.

Held, therefore, that D. could not be made a contributory in respect of the twenty-five shares.

Observations upon Evans's case (infra), and Migotti's case (infra).

Where an official liquidator does not furnish the court with the necessary documents he will be allowed no costs.

This was an appeal by the Hon. Francis Charles Drummond, from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, that he must be included in the list of contributories of the above company in respect of twenty-five shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum of association.

The China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited) was incorporated in Feb. 1865, under the Companies Act 1862, for the purpose of acquiring the business and the assets of two other companies which had previously carried on business under the names of the Labuan Coal Company (Limited) and the China and Japan River and Coast Steam Navigation Company (Limited). The Labuan Coal Company passed resolutions to wind-up voluntarily, and Mr. Drummond was chosen one of the liquidators. On the 2nd Feb. 1865, an agreement in the following terms was entered into between the Labuan Coal Company and the China Steamship Company.

Agreement made the 2nd Feb. 1865 between the Labuan Coal Company (Limited) (hereinafter called the vendors), of the one part, and the China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited) (hereinafter called the purchasers), of the other part. Whereas the vendors are possessed of certain properties in the island of Labuan and Borneo, consisting of leases or grants of coal mines, plant, and coals, and other materials, with various rights and privileges. And whereas the purchasers are a company being established for the purpose of carrying on trade in China and the East Indian seas. And whereas the said purchasers have agreed with the said vendors for the purchase of their capital, business, assets, and effects at or for the price of 108,750*l.* Now these presents witness that as and from the 31st Dec. 1864, the purchasers shall be entitled to all the property, plant, materials, leases, rights, privileges, and all other property of whatsoever kind, and whether real or personal, now belonging to the vendors, and the vendors shall, until all the arrangements for sale and transfer thereof are completed, carry on and continue the works and operations of their company for and on behalf of the purchasers. The said purchase-money of 108,750*l.* shall be paid by the said purchasers to the vendors as follows, viz., three-fourths thereof by the delivery to the said vendors of 20*l.* shares in the said China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited), upon which the sum of 10*l.* or the sum of 20*l.* shall be deemed to be paid up, or partly in shares with 10*l.* paid, and partly in shares with 20*l.* paid, at the option of the vendors, but so that the total sum so paid in shares shall amount to three-fourths of the said 108,750*l.*; and the balance of the said purchase-money of 108,750*l.* shall be paid by the delivery to the said vendors of debentures of the said China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited), payable seven years from the 1st Jan. 1865, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The purchasers shall in such manner and at such time as may be arranged between the parties hereto in addition to the said purchase-money, pay and liquidate all liabilities of the vendors (including expense of liquidation), not exceeding the sum of 43,000*l.* The vendors shall take all necessary steps for procuring the consent of their shareholders to this agreement, and also for having the affairs of the Labuan Company voluntarily wound-up in accordance with the provisions of their articles of association, and, upon such confirmation by the shareholders, shall execute to the purchasers all such further and other deeds and assurances as may be required.

This agreement was afterwards duly approved by the shareholders of the Labuan Coal Company. On the 13th Feb. 1865 there was issued and circulated a prospectus of the China Steamship Company. This prospectus contained various statements respecting the company, among which were the following:

The allotment of shares will be made on the following basis, viz.—7500 shares, partly fully paid-up, and partly with 10*l.* paid-up, will be reserved for allotment to the applicants who are shareholders in the existing companies (that is, in the Labuan Coal Company and the China and Japan Coast and River Steam Navigation Company) of these 6000 have already been applied for, and the deposits paid to the company's bankers. 7000 shares with 4*l.* paid will be allotted to shareholders in the Crédit Foncier and Mobilier of England (Limited) 6000 shares with 4*l.* paid will be allotted to the general public, as also such shares (if any) as may not be applied for on the paid-up form or by the above. Application will also be received for 5000 fully paid-up shares on which dividends for the whole amount paid-up will be declared.

1500 shares will be reserved for allotment in Bombay, application for which will be received by Messrs. D. Sassoon and Co., at Bombay.

On the 22nd Feb. 1865 Mr. Drummond subscribed the memorandum of association of the China Steamship Company for twenty-five shares, which were not stated to be either wholly or partly paid-up. He afterwards sent in a written application for shares, paying at the same time to the company's bankers a deposit of 1*l.* per share, as was required by the prospectus. There were afterwards allotted to him 479 shares, 478 as fully paid-up, and one as with 10*l.* paid thereon. This number of shares was the number to which Mr. Drummond was entitled in proportion to his interest in the capital and assets of the Labuan Coal Company. The deposit which he had paid on application was repaid to him. No application was made in Bombay for the 1500 shares mentioned in the prospectus as having been reserved for applicants there, and no allotment was made of those shares. The capital of the company was divided into 27,000 shares, and out of these only 24,614 were allotted.

The China Steamship Company carried on business for a time, but was ultimately ordered to be wound-up. The Master of the Rolls upon the application of the liquidator, placed Mr. Drummond upon the list of contributories in respect of twenty-five shares upon which nothing had been paid, being the twenty-five shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum of association.

From this decision Mr. Drummond appealed.

Mr. James Tait, who was the secretary of the China Steamship Company, made an affidavit, in which he deposed as follows:

Those applicants who were members of the Labuan Coal Company (Limited) or of the China and Japan Coast and River Steam Navigation Company (Limited), did not actually pay in cash the sums which became due upon the shares allotted to them, but the sums so due were credited to them as paid in the following manner: The China Steamship Company were bound to pay to the liquidator of each of the two said companies a certain sum, and the liquidator was bound to distribute that sum among the shareholders of the company of which he was liquidator, according to the number of shares held by them respectively in the company, and that sum so distributed was equal to, and would have been, applied in discharge of the amounts due from all the members of such company in payment of the deposit, and of the sum of 9*l.* or the sum of 19*l.*, as the case might be, on the shares in the China Steamship Company taken by such shareholders, so that in fact each applicant for shares in the China Steamship Company would have been entitled to receive on the one hand, through his liquidator, from the China Steamship Company precisely the same sum as he would have been bound to pay on the shares allotted to him. Under these circumstances, it was not thought necessary to make the actual payment in cash on each side, but the matter was settled on account, and the liability of each applicant to pay the amount so due as aforesaid upon the shares alloted to him was discharged by the amount which he had to pay being credited to him instead of being paid to the liquidator for him.

Jessel, Q. C. and Speed, on behalf of the appellant, contended that though he had, by subscribing the memorandum of association for twenty-five shares, incurred an obligation to take twenty-five shares in the company, yet he had fulfilled that obligation by becoming the registered holder of 479 shares, which he had paid for by means of his interest in the property of the Labuan Coal Company, which became the property of the China Steamship Company. They distinguished

Evans's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 427; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 253;

Migotti's case, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 238; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Wickens, on behalf of the liquidator, argued that the agreement between the Labuan Coal Company and the China Steamship Company was entirely distinct from the agreement to take twenty-five shares in the China Steamship Company, which arose by means of the appellant's subscribing the memorandum of association, and the latter agreement could not be satisfied by anything done in pursuance of the former. The case was really governed by the authorities cited on the other side; and that an allotment of paid-up shares would not satisfy the obligation arising from subscribing the memorandum of association was further shown by

De Beville's case, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 11;

Pell's case, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 222; infra, p. 320.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I will not trouble you, Mr. Jessel, to reply in this case. There are many facts before me in this case which were not before the Master of the Rolls; and I cannot help thinking if the Master of the Rolls had had the facts before him he would have come to a conclusion different from that at which he has arrived. With regard to the cases applicable to this case there are four. Evans's case is the first. That was a very simple case indeed, and its effect is accurately stated in the marginal note L. Rep. 2 Ch. 427. In that case "E. signed the memorandum of association of a company as the holder of ten shares, and acted for a short time as a director of the company. Other directors were then appointed, and E. never afterwards had anything to do with the company. No shares were ever allotted to him, and his name was never on the register. All the shares in the company were allotted to other persons, but the allotment of some was not final, and they were not taken up. Held that E.'s name ought to have been on the register, and that he was a contributory in respect of ten shares." That decision is simply this: a man by signing a memorandum of association does contract to become a shareholder, and if he takes no shares he will be held liable in respect of that contract if there are shares in existence which can be attributable to him. That is the whole of Evans's case, neither more nor less. Then there is Migotti's case, which is most accurately decided. Migotti's case, again in the marginal note, is this: "The subscribers of the memorandum of association of a company, under the Companies Act of 1862 are by the 23rd section of the Act bound to take as many shares as they have subscribed for, whether or not the shares are actually allotted to them, and this obligation is not satisfied by the allotment at a subsequent period of nominally fully paid-up shares." We shall see presently what that means. "Therefore, where M. subscribed the memorandum of a company for five shares, and eight months afterwards five fully paid up shares, which the company had agreed to allot to C., as part of the purchase-money for property sold to them by C., were by C.'s direction allotted to M., and the company was wound-up: Held, that M. was a contributory in respect of five shares, upon which nothing had been paid." I take that case to decide this, and to decide this and nothing else, that Migotti by signing a memorandum of association contracted, as between himself and the company, to take ten shares, and that, taking the five paid-up shares which did not belong to the company, but which did belong to Carter, was, in reality, taking the shares from Carter and not from the company, and therefore that he had never fulfilled that contract with the company which he had entered into by signing the memorandum of association.

Then we go to De Beville's case. I will only read one passage from the judgment, which appears to me to be perfectly accurate, and to be applicable, or, at least, certainly not inapplicable, to the present case. That passage is this: The Master of the Rolls says, "A person cannot sign the memorandum of association for shares generally, and afterwards say that some or all of them are paid-up shares, unless"—what?—"money or money's worth was actually paid by him, or on his behalf, for those particular shares, and also if he sign the memorandum of association in respect of shares there stated to be paid-up shares, while they are not really paid-up, he will, in my opinion, be liable to pay the amount due on the shares." That, again, is plain enough. That is to say, if a man contracts to take shares, he must pay for them, to use a homely phrase, in meal or in malt. He must either pay in money or in money's worth. If he pays in one or the other, that will be a satisfaction. Then, the fourth case is the last case which was quoted, the facts in which are very shortly stated, but that seems to me to follow entirely the proposition laid down by the Master of the Rolls in Pell's case. That case appears to me to be this: Mr. George Pell signed the memorandum, I think, for 1350 shares. Then it is stated "by clause 86 of the articles of association an agreement was ratified and declared to be binding on the company, by which Pell sold to the company the goodwill and stock in trade of certain businesses carried on by him, and it was agreed that as part of the consideration to be paid to him, the company were to issue to Pell or his nominees 1500 shares of the nominal value of 20*l.* each, which shares should be credited in the books of the company as fully paid-up in part payment of the purchase-money." What the Master of the Rolls held, was that Mr. Pell "must be put on the list for all the shares," and to that he added he "was entitled to an inquiry as to what was the value of the property handed over by him to the company, and to be allowed such value, but no more, towards payment of his shares," and as we know it has been decided there can be no set-off. Therefore that again has been a decision of the Master of the Rolls entirely on the footing of De Beville's case, and amounts simply to this which I take to be the true proposition of law: A man who signs the memorandum of association agrees to become a shareholder, and as long as there are shares that can be allotted to him he must fulfil that obligation.

Now let us see what the facts of the present case are, and see whether they are the same as in Migotti's case. The facts of the present case are these. [His Lordship stated the facts.]

In that state of things I cannot see any distinction whatever between Drummond's position and the position of a person who, after having signed this memorandum of association without saying anything more, had agreed to take 479 shares, and had paid up money in respect of those 479 shares. If a man comes to an agreement with a company to take twenty-five shares, and positively takes 479, saying nothing more, and pays up the money in respect of them, it would be impossible in that state of things to say that he had not satisfied the contract to take the twenty-five shares.

The whole of that view of the case is entirely fortified by the statement of facts which has been agreed to. Amongst other things in that statement of facts, I find, first of all, at the end, "The directors state that they consider that they would not be justified in issuing to persons in England any of the shares thus in accordance with the prospectus reserved for Bombay, and for the members of the two old companies respectively, as that would have been a breach of faith towards those who had subscribed upon the faith of the statements made in the prospectus, and would have depreciated the value of the shares reserved to be allotted in England." That is quite consistent with the prospectus, because there was there a distinct stipulation that that number of shares should be reserved for persons in Bombay. Then the statement in the prospectus is that 7500, some fully, that is, with 20*l.* paid-up, and some with 10*l.* paid-up, were reserved for allotment to the shareholders in the two old companies, and that 1500 shares were reserved for allotment in Bombay. This left 18,000 shares only for allotment in England. All these 18,000 shares and 20 more were allotted on or about the 25th Feb. 1865, and the company commenced business. At this time the shares were at a premium, but before the month of May 1865 they were at a discount. Afterwards, that is to say, on the 10th May 1865, and not before, it was ascertained that the 7500 shares reserved for allotment to the shareholders in the two old companies would not be required by them; 6594 of such shares, however, were taken by them." So that literally, when Mr. Drummond really took these shares, he could not consistently with the duties which he had undertaken to perform have got any other shares. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order made by the Master of the Rolls must be reversed, and Mr. Drummond must have the costs below, but there will be no costs of the appeal.

In the course of the argument of the appeal, it appeared that the official liquidator had not in court all the documents necessary for the use of the judge, and a good deal of delay was caused by the absence of those documents. With refereece to this, at the conclusion of the judgment,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—Now this case is over, I must take leave to say in the very next case which I have before me, where the official liquidator appears without the proper papers in court, I shall insert in the order that he have no costs whatever. If it is known on future occasions that that rule really will be acted upon, it may be that the papers will be here. If it so happened that business was pressing, there would have been a considerable waste of time.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PRAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, July 13.

Re HEYFORD COMPANY (LIMITED); PELL'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Signing memorandum—Allotment of shares to vendor—Paid-up shares.

P. subscribed the memorandum of association of a company for certain shares. In the articles of association an agreement was set forth by which P. was to transfer certain property to the company, and was to accept fully paid-up shares in part payment of the purchase-money. He transferred the property, and the shares were allotted to him, but no payment was made by him in respect of the shares.

On an application by the official liquidator of the company:

Held, that P. must be fixed on the list in respect of the shares, but that he would only have to pay the balance found due from him after deducting the value of the property transferred by him to the company.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the official liquidator of the Heyford Company (Limited), that the name of George Pell should be fixed on the list of contributories of the company in respect of 1350 shares of 20*l.* each, under the following circumstances:—

The company was registered on the 26th Aug. 1865, with a capital of 120,000*l.* in 6000 20*l.* shares, and Pell signed signed the memorandum for 1350 shares.

The articles of association, which were registered at the same time as the memorandum, set forth (in the 86th clause) an agreement between Pell and the company, dated the 1st Aug. 1865; by this agreement Pell agreed to sell to the company the goodwill and stock-in-trade of a certain business carried on by him, and it was agreed that, in part payment of the purchase-money, the company should issue to Pell or his nominees 1350 20*l.* shares, such shares to be credited in the books of the company as fully paid up, and Pell should accept the same. Of these shares 1350 stood in Pell's name, and the rest in the name of his nominees.

Pell had transferred the goodwill and stock-in-trade of his business to the company, but he had not been credited in the company's books with full, or any, payment in respect of the shares.

The company was ordered to be wound-up in Dec. 1866.

Roxburgh, Q. C., for the official liquidator, submitted that Pell's name should be fixed on the list of contributories for the 1350 shares for which he had signed the memorandum of association. The memorandum contained no statement that the shares were to be treated as fully paid-up, and as Pell had subscribed the memorandum for the shares simply and without any qualification, he must be placed on the list. He cited

Re South of France Company, Baron De Beville's case, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 11.

Westlake, for Pell, contended that by the statement in the articles of association the public had notice that he had taken a large number of shares which were to be credited to him as fully paid-up, and he could not therefore, now be held liable for them, especially as the property which he had transferred to the company was worth more than the shares.

HAMMONDS v. BARRETT.

Post-nuptial settlement—Provision against husband's bankruptcy—Rights of creditors.

By a post-nuptial settlement 990*l.* the property of the husband, and 4000*l.* the property of the wife's brother, was settled upon trust for the wife for life, with remainder for the husband for life or until bankruptcy or alienation, and then, or after his decease, upon the children of the marriage. The wife died in 1862, leaving children. In 1867 the husband was adjudicated bankrupt, and in 1868 he died:

Held, that the settlement was valid as against creditors, and that the husband's life estate determined on his bankruptcy.

The principal object of this suit was to obtain a declaration of the rights of certain persons under a settlement dated the 4th July 1862. The facts were as follows:—

In March 1844 Samuel Barrett married Isabel, the daughter of William Clark. There was no settlement made upon the marriage. Subsequently William Clark bequeathed a legacy of 2000*l.* to his daughter Isabel, and appointed his son Marmaduke Clark, his sole executor. William Clark died in Nov. 1861, and upon his death Marmaduke Clark paid the legacy of 2000*l.* to Barrett as the person entitled to it in right of his wife. Out of that sum Barrett invested 990*l.* in the purchase of stock in the Madras Railway Company.

After the death of the testator Marmaduke Clark, being desirous of making a further provision for his sister and her family, agreed with Barrett, that he would settle 4000*l.* upon them, if he, Barrett, would also settle the 990*l.* Madras stock, and all other acquired property with the same object.

Accordingly, the settlement in question was executed, whereby, after reciting the above arrangement, and that in pursuance of it the 990*l.* Madras Stock, and the 4000*l.*, had been transferred into the joint names of Barrett and the plaintiff as trustees of the settlement, it was declared—"that in consideration of the premises and of the said sum of 4000*l.* so given by the said Marmaduke Clark as aforesaid, to or for the benefit of the said Isabel Barrett, and also for settling a portion of the said legacy of 2000*l.*, and for divers other good causes and considerations," the plaintiff and Barrett, and the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, should stand possessed of the said 990*l.* Madras Stock, and the said 4000*l.*, and the stocks, funds, and securities in or upon which the same might be invested, upon trust to pay the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof, or permit the same to be received by Isabel Barrett for her life for her separate use, and after her decease "upon trust to pay the said interest, dividends, and annual produce, or permit the same to be received, the said Samuel Barrett and his assigns for the term of his natural life, or until, or in case he shall become bankrupt, or take the benefit of any Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, or commit or do any act, deed, matter, or thing whatsoever whereby the interest, dividends, and annual profits of the said stocks, funds, and securities shall become vested in any other person. And then, and in such case, the estate for life of the said Samuel Barrett therein shall cease and determine as if he were actually dead. Anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding." And after the decease of Samuel Barrett in trust for the children of the marriage.

Isabel Barrett died in Oct. 1862, leaving several children.

In May 1866 Barrett executed a bond for securing payment of 300*l.* and interest by annual instalments; and for the purpose of insuring the payment thereof it was agreed between the parties thereto, that the plaintiff should receive and retain the interest, dividends, and annual income of the stocks, funds, and securities under the settlement, and from time to time pay thereout the said annual instalments, and it was declared that the receipt of the plaintiff for all sums becoming due in respect of the interest and dividends in the said stocks, funds, and annual securities should be a good and sufficient discharge for the same to all persons paying the same, until the whole of the bond debt was satisfied.

In April 1867 Barrett became a bankrupt, and one of the defendants was appointed his assignee. In May 1868 Barrett died, and the plaintiff being in doubt whether the whole or part of his interest under the settlement ceased on his bankruptcy, declined to deal with the property without the intervention of the court.

Hence the institution of this suit.

Babington, for the plaintiff, submitted the question to the court.

Hughes, Q.C. and Tanner, for the assignee in bankruptcy, said that the sum given by the brother was not claimed by the assignee; but as to the 990*l.* Madras Stock, they contended that the settlement was invalid. That portion of the property belonged to Barrett, and could not, under a post-nuptial settlement, be so settled as to go over on his bankruptcy. They cited,

Higinbotham v. Holme, 19 Ves. 88;
Holmes v. Penney, 3 K. & J. 90;
Whitmore v. Mason, 2 J. & H. 204.

Dickinson, Q.C, and F. H. Colt, for the children, were not called upon.

Karslake, Q.C., W. W. Karslake, and Moulton for other defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is not the ordinary case of a post-nuptial settlement, by which a husband settles his own property, reserving to himself a beneficial interest, defeasible upon alienation or bankruptcy. The principal part of the subject-matter of the settlement is a sum which comes from the wife's brother, and not from the bankrupt or his wife, and this being so, it is perfectly clear that the brother had a right to say that the smaller sum settled by the husband should go over on his bankruptcy. There is nothing obnoxious to the rules of bankruptcy, and no fraud on creditors by this stipulation. The assignee, therefore, is not entitled to any of the stock, the life interest of the bankrupt having ceased upon the execution of the bond.

GIBBS v. HARDING.

Husband and wife—Agreement to execute separation deed—Specific performance.

By a memorandum of agreement between a husband of the one part and the wife's father, on behalf of the wife, of the other part, the husband agreed to execute a deed of separation to contain the usual clauses, and to secure payment of an annuity to the wife's father for the maintenance of the wife and her child. The agreement was acted upon by the separation of the husband and wife, and by the maintenance of the wife and child by the wife's father. Subsequently the husband refused to execute the deed of separation:

Held, that the agreement was valid, and must be specifically performed.

This was a suit for the specific performance of an agreement for separation between a husband and wife. The facts were shortly these.

On the 1st March 1857, the defendant Thomas Archer Harding was married to the plaintiff Alice Harding, a daughter of the plaintiff Joseph Gibbs. No settlement was executed on the marriage. After the marriage differences arose between the husband and wife, and they then agreed to live apart on the terms mentioned in the following agreement:

Memorandum of agreement made the 5th July 1865, between Thomas Archer Harding of the one part, and Joseph Gibbs of the other part. Whereas differences having arisen between the said Thomas Archer Harding and Alice his wife, the daughter of the said Joseph Gibbs, and it hath been agreed between the said Thomas Archer Harding and the said Joseph Gibbs, on behalf of his said daughter, that the said Thomas Archer Harding and the said wife should live apart, and the said Thomas Archer Harding doth hereby agree with the said Joseph Gibbs, when thereunto required to execute and sign a deed of separation, to be prepared by Messrs. Bradford and Foote, to contain all usual and proper clauses, and also to secure the sum of £40 a year to commence from this date, and to be paid by equal quarterly payments by the said Thomas Archer Harding for the maintenance of his wife and child, but if the said wife should now be in the family way, and have another child within eight months from this time, then the sum of 40*l.* shall be increased to 50*l.*, to be paid in like manner as the 40*l.* provided for, so long as such child shall live, and the costs of the deed of separation and of this agreement shall be paid in equal portions by the parties hereto.

This memorandum of agreement was signed by Thomas Archer Harding, Alice Harding, and Joseph Gibbs.

The child referred to in the agreement was the defendant Victoria Harding, an infant seven years of age, and the only surviving issue of the marriage. Mrs. Harding had no other child after the separation.

In pursuance of this agreement, the husband and wife lived apart. Joseph Gibbs brought up the child and assisted in maintaining his daughter until she went into service, where she had since remained. The annuity was regularly paid to Joseph Gibbs up to Oct. 1867. In that month Gibbs applied to the defendant to execute a deed of separation, which he had caused to be prepared, charging the annuity on certain real estate belonging to the defendant; but the defendant refused to execute it.

Thereupon, this bill was filed, praying that the defendant might be decreed specifically to perform the agreement of the 5th July 1865, and to execute the said deed of separation, or some proper deed of separation to be approved by the court, and to pay the said annuity, and to do all other acts pursuant to the said agreement, the plaintiffs offering specifically to perform the same on their part, and in particular to execute a proper deed of separation, pursuant thereto, to be approved by the court, and that an account might be taken of the amount due in respect of the said annuity.

Greene, Q. C. and Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs, submitted that it was not necessary, in order to enforce the agreement, that the wife should be a party to it. They were stopped by the court. They cited

Williams v. Baily, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 731; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802;
Wilson v. Wilson, 1 H. of L. Cas. 538; 5 H. of L. Cas. 40.

Dickinson, Q. C. and W. W. Karslake, for the defendant Harding, contended that the agreement was not binding upon him. It was wanting in consideration and mutuality. The husband and the wife's father were the contracting parties; the wife's mere signature availed nothing; but even if it did, she, as a married woman, could not contract. Moreover, the deed of separation which the defendant was asked to execute was not in accordance with the agreement. It charged the annuity upon his landed property, and it contained no covenant for indemnifying him against his wife's debts. There was no analogy between this case and that of Wilson v. Wilson. They cited Mornington v. Keane, 2 De G. & J. 292;

Walrond v. Walrond, John. 18.

Langley for the infant defendant.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This suit has been instituted for the purpose of enforcing an agreement for separation between husband and wife. The parties to the agreement are the husband and the wife's father on behalf of the wife. It is signed not only by the parties to it, but by the wife herself, who has therefore, as far as it is in the power of a married woman, bound herself by the contract. There can be no doubt that the agreement is perfectly valid. It has been acted on by the father of the wife, who at the present time is maintaining the defendant's child, and whenever an agreement which is not illegal has been acted upon, and obligations have been incurred upon the faith of it, the court, when asked, will see that it is specifically performed. Although there is nothing in the written agreement to justify charging the annuity upon the land, as has been done by the deed which has been prepared, still the husband would have done better to have executed it, and if well-advised, will do so now; but if he will not, a proper security must be prepared in chambers, in accordance with the agreement. The case is one which ought never to have come into court, and it is with great reluctance that I make a decree at all; but as the question has been left to my decision, I can do nothing else than make a decree in the terms of the prayer of the bill, with costs against the defendant Harding.

Solicitor and client—Charge for costs on property recovered—Injunction to restrain payment of money out of court—Attorneys and Solicitors Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127).

cheque drawn by the Accountant-General in favour of the client in respect of such claim, until a petition could be presented, under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, setting forth all the facts of the case.

This was an ex parte application on behalf of a solicitor to restrain the delivery of a cheque drawn by the Accountant-General for payment of a sum of money out of court until a petition could be presented under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, setting forth all the particulars of the applicant's case. The facts stated in support of the application were these:—

In 1862 an order was made, in a creditor's suit, for the administration of the estate of Matthew Dawes, the testator in the above causes. In the same year John Whittle, one of the testator's creditors, obtained through his solicitor, the present applicant, admittance of his claim, which, together with taxed costs of 25*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, amounted to 88*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.* In 1864 Whittle received out of court 29*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*, the first dividend on his claim.

Shortly afterwards the applicant delivered his bill of costs in respect of the proof of the claim and other matters, amounting to 64*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.*; and on the 6th March 1866 Whittle paid the applicant 5*l.* on account of his bill, and gave him a six months' promissory note for the balance. Whittle did not pay the money due upon the note, and on a writ being issued to enforce payment it was discovered that he had left his usual place of residence, and could not be found.

On the 29th Feb. 1869, an order was made for the final distribution of the testator's estate, and the cheque in question was then drawn by the Accountant-General for payment to Whittle of the residue of his claim. Hence this application.

E. S. Ford appeared in support of the application.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he would make an interim order restraining the payment of the cheque, but the applicant must undertake to indemnify Whittle against damages.

BRADBURY v. BEETON.

Injunction—Title of periodical—Trade mark—Property in name.

A comic periodical, called Punch, having been for twenty-five years published by B. and Co., at 3d. weekly, and another comic periodical, called Judy, being published by other parties, a publication of a like character, called Punch and Judy, was brought out and published weekly, at 1d., of the same size as Punch, but with a different illustration on the cover, and on paper of a different tint, B. and Co. moved to restrain such publication, on the ground that the public were liable to be deceived into purchasing the new periodical for the old, either from haste at railway stations, &c., or from supposing that Punch and Judy had been amalgamated; and the bill charged fraudulent intention, and the passing off a rival publication for that of the plaintiffs, whose property in the name Punch was illegally appropriated:

Motion refused.

This case came on upon a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants, agents, and workmen, from printing, publishing, selling, exposing for sale or otherwise disposing of, and from procuring to be printed, published, sold, exposed for sale, or otherwise disposed of, any copy or copies of any weekly journal or other periodical with or under the name or title of Punch and Judy, or any other name or title of which the word Punch should form part, or which should be a colourable imitation of the name or title of the plaintiffs' periodical Punch.

The bill stated that the plaintiffs, Messrs. Bradbury, Evans, and Co., were, as they had been for some years past, the proprietors of a well-known weekly illustrated comic periodical entitled and commonly called Punch, the exclusive property and copyright in each number being vested in the plaintiffs, who were the duly registered proprietors of such copyright. That a number of such periodical had been regularly issued for more than twenty-five years, during which period it had acquired a great reputation and popularity under the name or title of Punch, so that at the present time a very large number of copies were sold every week; from which sale the plaintiffs derived great profits, and, in fact, the name of Punch, or the right to use such name as the title of a periodical publication, had become, and was, a very valuable property, to which no person or persons other than the plaintiffs had any right or title whatsoever. That the defendant had recently begun to publish a weekly illustrated periodical under the name or title of Punch and Judy, of the same size, and similar in general style and appearance and nature of contents to Punch, but with articles and illustrations of an inferior character. The first, second, and third numbers of such periodical being dated and purporting to be published on the Saturdays, Oct. 9th, 16th, and 23rd, 1869; the plaintiffs' periodical bearing date and purporting to be published on the Saturday, although really issued on the Wednesday preceding. That of every number of the plaintiffs' periodical many were sold at railway stations, it being a common practice for passengers when they passed through a station where newspapers and periodicals were sold, to purchase a copy of Punch during the time that the train stopped for the purpose of allowing persons to enter or alight. This time was usually very short, seldom above a minute or two, so that the purchase was necessarily made without a close examination of the article purchased; and by reason of the similarity in size and general style and appearance of the defendant's periodical, but in particular by reason of the word "Punch" forming the principal part of the name or title thereof, many copies of such periodical would be sold to persons intending to purchase the plaintiffs' publication. That this would continue to be the case as long as the word "Punch" formed part of the title of the defendant's periodical, or such periodical bore a title which was merely a colourable imitation of the title of the plaintiffs' periodical. The bill then stated that there was another comic periodical published every week under the name of Judy, and similar in size and general appearance to Punch. That the publication and sale of a weekly comic periodical of the same size under the name or title of Punch and Judy was calculated to mislead the public into the belief that the two publications of Punch and Judy had become united, and that the defendants' periodical was issued by and under the management of the proprietors of the two older publications, and in particular of Punch, and divers persons would purchase a number or numbers of Punch and Judy under the erroneous impression created by the title that they were purchasing either the current number of Punch with the current number of Judy, or that some arrangement had been made for the amalgamation of the two as a united publication. The bill then charged that the conduct of the defendant in publishing his said periodical would be injurious to the plaintiffs' property in their periodical, and that the defendant had selected the title Punch and Judy for the express purpose of deception, and with a view to selling (and the fact was that the defendant had sold, and was every week passing off upon the public) a rival publication of a similar but inferior description, under such a title and in such a manner as was calculated to induce incautious purchasers and the public generally to believe that the defendants' periodical either was or included the plaintiffs' or otherwise was a continuation thereof, or in some way connected therewith to the damage and injury of the plaintiffs. The bill then charged that the intention and design of the defendant was to attract the trade and custom of the plaintiffs, who had long used, and until the defendants' publication were the only persons using the name Punch as the title of a comic periodical, and that their trade would be seriously damaged as long as the defendant used the word Punch as part of his title. The bill then charged that the title of the defendant's publication was merely a colourable imitation of the plaintiffs', and was in fact and law a fraud on the plaintiffs and the public, and a fraudulent appropriation of the plaintiff's property and productive of irreparable loss, not capable of being compensated for by damages at law. That on the 15th Oct. 1869, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendant threatening proceedings to restrain the publication of Punch and Judy if it was continued, to which it was replied that there was no infringement of copyright, and this bill was filed on the 29th, containing the above facts and charges, and alleging that the defendants' publication was not registered at Stationers Hall.

There was an affidavit of Mr. John Francis, publisher of the Athenæum, that he considered the public would be misled. The defendant's publication was sold for one penny, the plaintiffs' being threepence weekly.

Jessel, Q.C., C. Hall, and Lindley, appeared in support of the motion, and contended that the defendant was making an unfair use of the appearance and style of Punch. There was a general similarity. The framework, the name, &c., had a resemblance sufficient to attract the unwary. A large number of Punches were sold at railway stations, bought in a hurry, and therefore people might be easily deceived, and it might be thought that Punch and Judy were united. The title of a newspaper was sometimes called trademark, and erroneously, perhaps, "copyright," yet a periodical had nothing more of value, and when the whole was appropriated, it was within the authorities which held that you must not use materials to prejudice your neighbour. Mr. Kerr, in his Treatise on Injunctions (p. 478) thought there was a property in the title. Here, what was asked was to restrain any publication with a name or title of which the word Punch formed part. In Kelly v. Hutton, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 703; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201, it was held that you could not use the same name for a similar publication. Chance v. Shepherd, before this court, was the case of the Bedfordshire Express, where the prominent part of the title was used. There was a Punch and Judy belonging to Mr. Cruikshank twenty-eight years ago. Clements v. Maddick, 1 Giff. 19, was as to the Penny Bell's Life. The goodwill, as well as the copyright was indisputably connected with the name, and that was being invaded here.

Glasse, Q.C. and Langley, for the defendant, insisted that there was no case for an injunction, the mischief being merely prospective. No one could possibly be deceived into purchasing one periodical for the other; they were so different in appearance and colour, whereas Judy was somewhat similar, and if doubled crosswise the lower part was almost identical, and some proceedings had been taken against them. [C. Hall denied all knowledge of such proceedings.] There was no pretence of decrease of circulation or loss in any way; the case was not within the authorities: (McNeile v. Williams, 11 Jur. 344.) The plaintiffs could try this question at law, but to obtain an injunction, it must be shown that the public had been deceived, of which there was no evidence; the court would not assist persons not exercising due discretion. Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 215, was the case of the continuation of a magazine of the plaintiffs by the defendants. There were numerous instances of newspapers using part of the same title as others, as the Illustrated Times, the Law Times, &c.; and if a periodical was published at Birmingham it might be called the Birmingham Punch, and could not be restrained. Welch v. Knott, 4 K. & J. 747, was the case of Schweppe's soda water, where, although the old bottles were used, the injunction was dissolved. The motion must be refused with costs.

Charles Hall, in reply, submitted that in this case the word Punch being used so prominently distinguished it from the cases put. The evident intention was to deceive, and the court would protect the property in a title so used.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—This case is not wholly free from difficulty, but on the whole I am unable to come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to what they ask. The principles of law on this subject are hardly in dispute; they may be sufficiently stated thus: Every person who uses a trade mark, be it as a label on a bottle, as in Schweppe's case, or a periodical, magazine, comic or otherwise, by that appropriation and user of the name (not intended user) acquires a property in that name, and, having that right, any other person using the same name, which, if used, would lead, or be calculated to lead, the public to believe they are purchasing the one publication when in truth they are purchasing another, ought to be restrained from so doing. That is laid down by the present Lord Chancellor in Kelly v. Hutton (sup.) It is not disputed by the defendant's counsel that he could not have used the simple word Punch, for that would have been an infringement of the rule which I have referred to and a fraudulent use of the property of the plaintiffs. For a quarter of a century this well-known publication, Punch, has existed, of high reputation, and admirable in this respect, that never during that period has it contained anything of an offensive nature to make it unfit for the table of any family. No doubt also it has had an extensive circulation from the commencement, and probably to the present time, and the owners have a right to the name originally adopted from that well-known exhibition "Punch and Judy," which from our childhood has been, and probably for ages to come will be, well known throughout Europe. This is plain from the figures on the cover. About three years since another publication, called Judy, had come out. It was said that some proceedings had been taken against the publisher of that periodical, but there is no evidence of it, and it was denied, and it must be assumed there never were. It is clear there could be no right to interfere with a publication using another name. There being, therefore, two periodicals, Punch and Judy, the defendant has appropriated both names, with a picture of the street exhibition on the cover, and the sole question which I have to decide is, whether one party having used the name Punch and another Judy, either or both acquired such a title to the use of these words as to be able to prevent the defendant using the combination and adopting the whole. The principle is clear; you cannot adopt a trade-mark or use a name, calculated to mislead or deceive persons as to an article, already appropriated, into the belief that they are purchasing one thing when they are purchasing another. On the whole, I come to the conclusion that this publication is not calculated to mislead the ordinary run of mankind, who are alone to be considered. The court does not legislate for the careless class, who know not what they are purchasing. The word Punch is well known, and it is impossible that an ordinary person can be misled; and as the defendant has appropriated the title of two, the whole is left open. I cannot help thinking that the plaintiffs might well have remained satisfied with the well known-reputation of their periodical and have refrained from interfering with one with only a general similarity in form. As to the merits of the defendant it is impossible not to see that the well-known reputation of Punch has induced him to make that word a part of his title. He might easily have adopted some other name. His conduct is not satisfactory in that respect. It would have been better if the parties had agreed to arrange the matter, and I suggested that, but, it not being acceded to, I must decide the question. If the defendant's publication is successful the two will be perfectly distinct; if unsuccessful, it is immaterial. The motion must be simply refused, saying nothing about the costs. If the parties would agree to treat this as the hearing the bill might be dismissed without costs.

Charles Hall said he would agree to that.

Glasse, Q. C. said he could not accede to it.

The motion was, therefore, simply refused.

WARWICK HASTINGS RYLAND (app.) v. ALEXANDRE MAURICE DELISLE (resp.).

Lower Canada—Railways—Action against shareholder—President of a company with a salary—Compensation.

A creditor of a Canadian railway company brought an action against a shareholder to recover, under the provisions of the General Railways Act (Canada), "an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock held by" the defendant. The defendant pleaded compensation, alleging that the amount due from him to the company on the stock was extinguished by an amount voted to him for salary as president of the company, and credited to him in the company's books. By Art. 1188 of the Code of Lower Canada, compensation takes place between "debts which are equally liquidated and demandable."

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada), that there was no compensation, as alleged in the plea; for no calls having been made by the company, at the time when action was brought by the creditor, there was then no counter-right as against the claim of the defendant on the company.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, bearing date the 5th March 1868, which reversed on appeal a judgment of the Superior Court of the district of Montreal, bearing date the 31st March 1866.

In the month of May 1853, the respondent subscribed for and became a shareholder to the extent of forty shares of 25*l.* each in the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company, a body politic and corporate, duly incorporated as such by virtue of a public Act of the province of Lower Canada.

At a meeting of the directors held on the 9th Nov. 1853, the respondent was duly appointed president of the said company, and the sum of 1000*l.* was duly voted to him for his services as such president for the year ending on the 1st Monday of March, then next (1854) and credit for the said sum was given him in the books of the said company.

On the 30th April 1856, one Joseph Doutre recovered judgment in an action against the said Montreal and Bytown Railway Company for the sum of 612*l.* 10*s.* with interest from the 13th Sept. 1854, and costs. The debt in respect of which the said action was brought was contracted on or about the 23rd May 1854.

The company having failed to satisfy the judgment, Doutre made out a writ of execution against the goods, chattels, lands, and tenements, of the company, which execution was afterwards returned by the sheriff to whom it was addressed, unsatisfied either in the whole or in part.

Afterwards Doutre, by deed of transfer duly executed, ceded and transferred to the appellant, for valuable consideration, all his rights and interest in the said judgment and execution.

The several sums due and payable as principal money, interest and costs, under the judgment and execution, amounted at the date of the deed of transfer to 638*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.*

The appellant afterwards brought an action in the Superior Court of Montreal, against the respondent as being a shareholder in the said Montreal and Bytown Railway Company, for the said sum of 638*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.*

The action was grounded on sect. 80, c. 66 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, which is set out in the judgment.

The declaration alleged that the respondent was personally liable to the appellant as a creditor of the company, for the debt so due, to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock so held by him, to wit, 900*l.*

The respondent in bar to the action, put in a plea of compensation. He alleged in substance that the said sum credited to him in the books of the company for his salary, as president, operated in law as an extinguishment by compensation of any amount, which he might have owed the company, upon any shares of stock subscribed for by him and unpaid.

A defense au fond en fait was also filed.

The Superior Court of Montreal on the 31st March 1866, gave judgment condemning the respondent to pay 638*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.* currency, with interest on the sum of 612*l.* 10*s.* from the 13th Sept. 1854, together with the costs of suit.

The respondent appealed to the court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada; and on the 5th March 1868, that court revoked the said judgment of the Superior Court of Montreal.

This was the subject of the present appeal.

The question at issue in the case on which the judgment turned was as to whether the amount due by the respondent for balance unpaid on the stock subscribed for by him was compensated by the amount due by the company to him in March 1854, for the salary as president, up to that date. This question depended on the application of Arts. 1187, 1188, of the code of Lower Canada, containing provisions set out in the judgment.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JOSEPH NAPIER:—The appeal in this case is from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Lower Canada, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court of the district of Montreal, with costs. The judgment in the Montreal court, which was delivered on the 31st March 1866, found the respondent to be debtor to the Montreal and Bytown Railway Company in 900*l.* on the stock held by him, and approved the appellant's claim as a judgment-creditor of a company, having execution against the company unsatisfied, and condemned the respondent accordingly, as prayed for by the appellant. The action in which that judgment was given was an action brought by the appellant as a creditor of the company against the respondent, a shareholder, as a defendant, and in that action it was proved that there had been a return by the sheriff of nulla bona to an execution against the company. The action was founded on the section of the General Railways Act, which is under the head of "shareholders," and is the first paragraph of sect. 19. By that section and paragraph it is enacted that "each shareholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of the company to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock held by him for the debts and liabilities of the company, and until the whole amount of his stock shall have been paid up, but shall not be liable to an action therefor, before an execution against the company shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, and the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with costs, against such shareholders." The defendant referred to the code, and the case made by him was, that there was due to him from the company for salary a sum very far exceeding anything that he was or could be made liable to the company for in respect of calls; that the sums due to him from the company, in point of fact, extinguished his liability to the company, and that inasmuch as the company never could have maintained proceedings against him in respect of any calls that they might make, the creditor was in no better position than the company. We assume that no calls beyond calls for a sum of 100*l.* had been made on the part of the company; if any such calls had been made, it was the business of the defendant both to have alleged and proved that they had been made; there is neither allegation nor proof to this effect; the courts below proceeded on the assumption that no calls beyond 100*l.* had been made; and there can be no doubt but that they were right upon the pleadings and facts before them in making that assumption. What then are the provisions of the code which were relied on? They were these: first of all, it is said in the 1187th clause: "When two persons are mutually debtor and creditor of each other, both debts are extinguished by compensation which takes place between them in the cases and manner hereinafter declared;" and then in the 1188th clause, "Compensation takes place by the sole operation of law between debts which are equally liquidated and demandable, and have each for object a sum of money or a certain quantity of indeterminate things of the same kind and quality." As calls had not been made, there could have been no compensation as between this shareholder and the company at the time of the action being brought by the creditor, for when we turn to the Railways Act we see that before any action could have been maintained by the company as against the shareholder there must have been calls made by the directors, and thirty days must have elapsed from the date of the calls. Moreover, at the time when the appellant brought his action as creditor, the respondent, if he had any claim at all, had a right to proceed against the company, and recover payment from the company of the 2000*l.*, or whatever sum was due to him, and the company could not have set up as against that action any counter claim which they might have had in respect of his being a shareholder; it follows, therefore, that the amount payable on the stock held by the defendant was not actually paid, discharged, and extinguished, and that the clauses in the code which have been relied on do not apply to a state of circumstances in which, although there was a claim by the defendant against the company, there was no counter right on the part of the company, and no compensation as between him and them, and consequently no extinguishment of the debt. The creditor under the Act is in a different position to that of the company, and can recover so long as anything remains unpaid on the stock held by the shareholder. This being so, their Lordships will humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed. The result, therefore, will be to restore the judgment of the Superior Court in Montreal; and their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant should have the costs in both the courts below, and also the costs of this appeal.

Judgment reversed.

FAIR v. THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway accident—Measure of damages—Pecuniary loss and bodily suffering—Future improved income.

When a jury are called upon to assess damages for personal injuries occasioned by negligence, they should take into consideration two things—first, the pecuniary loss occasioned by the accident; secondly, the injury the party sustains in his person, or in his physical capacity of enjoying life; and, as regards the first, they should take into account, not only his present loss, but his incapacity to earn a future improved income.

This was an action brought by the Rev. Campbell Fair against the London and North-Western Railway Company for compensation for injuries sustained by him in consequence of an accident whilst travelling upon their line from Birmingham to Rhyl on the 16th Sept. 1868, near Holyhead. The accident was occasioned by a collision with a goods train. The cause was tried at the last Hertford Assizes, when the company, not disputing their liability, contested only the amount of compensation. It appeared that the plaintiff, who was twenty-seven years of age, and unmarried, was, at the time of the accident, secretary to the Irish Church Mission, with an income as such of 250*l.* a-year. From the evidence it appeared that at the time of the accident he was in the enjoyment of excellent health, but that in consequence of such accident he received an injury to his spine, which has resulted in permanent deafness and injuries to his other senses, besides paralysis of the lower extremities, from which, according to the medical evidence, it was hopeless to expect he would ever recover. The jury returned a verdict for 5000*l.* damages, besides 250*l.* for medical and other expenses.

Vernon Harcourt, Q. C. now moved, on the part of the defendants, for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground of the damages being excessive, or why such damages should not be reduced. The verdict of the jury for 5250*l.* is excessive, and would be more than sufficient to purchase an annuity of 250*l.*, which was the whole of the plaintiff's professional income. The jury had evidently given damages in respect of his probable increase of income, which they had no right to do. [Cockburn, C. J.—I cannot assent to that; I think under some circumstances they would be perfectly justified in considering the probable increase of income. Take the familiar case of a young barrister of great promise, whose progress in his profession is certain. He may make perhaps only 100*l.* a year; would it be right to give him compensation only upon that scale?] If any other considerations are to be regarded, it would let in evidence of a most inconvenient description; for whilst it might be suggested that he would advance in his profession, evidence on the other side might be adduced to show that he had no chance of rising in his profession. [Cockburn, C. J.—There may be some difficulties in the case, but your proposition is that you cannot take into consideration his probable advance; so that his being a young man would really stand in the way of his compensation; whereas were he a man of forty or fifty years of age, whose position has been made, he might obtain substantial compensation. Mellor, J.—Such difficulties must be left to the good sense of a jury. It is not said that the exact amount of compensation can be stated as a rule. It is one of the difficulties which are inherent in such cases.]. The income of the plaintiff at the time must after all be the test of the amount of compensation, and it cannot be left to speculate upon what he may earn at a future time. [Cockburn, C. J.—There is not merely the incapacity to earn an income, but the future bodily discomfort and the inability to enjoy life as a man in health would enjoy it. I dare say, if you were to offer this gentleman 50,000*l.*, or double that amount, he would not take it as the price of his present condition.] But if so there would be no limit, and a person who happened to be earning 10,000*l.* a year might be compensated by 200,000*l.*, and yet pay no more for being thus insured than a man who does not earn 50*l.* a year. Had this been a common street accident, of which there are hundreds in the year, no such amount of damages would have been given. [Cockburn, C. J.—In any such case I should certainly lay it down to the jury that they should give full compensation. It is very true that these street accidents seldom come into our courts. They generally occur to poor persons who are satisfied with comparatively small compensation, which is readily given them. In all cases we should see whether or not the damages are more than adequate. In many cases of compensation against private parties, juries will look to their means of paying damages, and so will moderate them; but in a railway accident they feel that they are not so restrained, and so give full damages.] There is really no difference in principle between the carriage of goods and individuals, and as regards the former the Legislature has itself imposed limits of compensation. [Cockburn, C. J.—That is for the Legislature. If it thinks fit to limit the liability as to compensation for personal injuries it can do so, but it has not done so at present.] The companies are really made insurers, without having any premiums. [Mellor, J. referred to Pym v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 537; and 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 734.]

Cockburn, C. J.—I think there should be no rule in this case. Mr. Harcourt, by his argument, would desire us to review the law upon this subject, and to change the practice which has hitherto prevailed, and to establish some new rule. It is very true that cases sometimes occur in which a jury, being over anxious to fully compensate a party, give damages so great as to induce the court to interfere. In the great majority of cases, however, I am quite satisfied at the common sense views upon which they act. Now the rule is, that where a railway company undertake to carry a passenger, and he receives an injury in consequence of their negligence, he is entitled to receive compensation from them, and in assessing that compensation the jury should take into account two things; first, the pecuniary loss he sustains by the accident; secondly, the injury he sustains in his person, or his physical capacity of enjoying life. When they come to the consideration of the pecuniary loss, they have to take into account not only his present loss, but his incapacity to earn a future improved income. Mr. Harcourt says that that is not a ground of compensation. But it would be really monstrous that because a young man has only arrived at a certain position—though from past experience you can see with tolerable certainty that he will within a reasonable time greatly increase his income—you are to exclude this most important element from consideration. So far from thinking that it should be excluded, I think the very reverse should be the rule Then as to the second ground. Undoubtedly, health is the greatest of all physical blessings; and to say that, when it is utterly shattered, no compensation is to be made for it, is really perfectly extravagant. Then here, ve have a gentleman of good prospects who, by this accident, is not only rendered incapable of following his profession, but is in all probability incapacitated for life. The jury, under the circumstances, have awarded him 5000*l.*; and I cannot but think that such a compensation is within fair limits.

Mellor, J.—I am of the same opinion. We have no means of ascertaining by a fixed rule what shall be the limit of damages in such a case. There is no principle which will apply equally to animals, goods, and passengers. Damages in such a case must be left to the common sense of the jury, assisted by the presiding judge. In the present case, I cannot say that the verdict is unreasonable. The jury were undoubtedly entitled to consider not only the physical suffering of the plaintiff, but the destruction of his prospects.

Abrey v. Crux.

Bill of exchange—Indorser's liability—Verbal evidence of an agreement not to sue until a certain event.

In an action by the drawer and indorsee of a bill of exchange against the indorser, it was alleged in denial of the defendant's liability that he indorsed the bill as surety for the acceptor; and that it was agreed between the three parties that the plaintiff should dispose of certain securities belonging to the acceptor in satisfaction of the debt before he sued defendant on the bill. The plaintiff had not disposed of the securities:

Held (Willes, J, dubitante) that verbal evidence of this agreement was not admissible.

This was an action by the drawer and payee of a bill of exchange against the indorser; it was tried before Keating, J. in Middlesex, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff upon the terms that if the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that certain oral evidence tendered by the defendant in support of his pleas, and rejected by the judge, was legally admissible, a new trial, pro formâ, was to be granted, and the action was to be retried, but for all purposes of costs the case was to be treated as if it had been adjourned.

The bill of exchange was in the following form:

£200. London, March 2, 1868.

Twelve months after date, pay to my order the sum of two hundred pounds for value received. J. ABREY.

To Mr. Arthur Crux, Queen of England,
New-road, Hammersmith.

The bill was crossed, "Accepted, Arthur Crux;" and indorsed, "Theodore Crux."

The declaration stated:

That John Abrey sues Theodore Crux, for that the defendant, on the 2nd March 1868, by his bill of exchange now overdue, directed to Arthur Crux, required the said Arthur Crux to pay to the plaintiff's order the sum of 200*l.* twelve months after date. And the said bill was duly presented for payment, and was dishonoured, of all which the defendant had due notice. And for a second count the plaintiff sues for that the defendant on the day of the year aforesaid, by his bill of exchange now overdue, directed to the said Arthur Crux, desired the said Arthur Crux to pay the bearer of the said bill the sum of 200*l.* twelve months after date, and then delivered the said bill to the plaintiff, who thereby became, and was, and yet is the lawful holder and bearer thereof, and the said bill was duly presented for payment and was dishonoured; of all which the defendant had due notice, but did not pay the same.

The 1st, 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 6th pleas denied the various allegations contained in the declaration, and the 3rd plea was as follows:

The defendant, as to the said first count, says that he drew the said bill and delivered the same to the plaintiff for the accommodation of one Arthur Crux, and as surety for him for the payment of the said bill, and, save as aforesaid, there never was any value or consideration for the drawing, delivery, or payment of the said bill by the defendant. And the defendant says that at the time he so drew and delivered the said bill to the plaintiff, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and the defendant and the said Arthur Crux, that the said Arthur Crux should deposit with the plaintiff certain securities, that is to say, a lease of a messuage and premises situate at Blenheim Villas, New-road, Hammersmith, and four dock warrants for the delivery of certain goods, to be held by the plaintiff, as security for the due payment of the said bill, and in case the said bill should not be duly paid, that the plaintiff should sell and dispose of the said securities, and apply the proceeds thereof in payment and liquidation of the said bill; and that until the plaintiff should have so sold and disposed of the said securities, the defendant should not be liable for, or be sued upon, the said bill. And the defendant says that the said Arthur Crux deposited the said securities as aforesaid with the plaintiff, and he received and held the same for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, and that the plaintiff did not before the commencement of the suit, sell, realise, or dispose of the said securities, or any part thereof, and the plaintiff still holds the same.

The seventh plea repeated the third plea in terms applicable to the second count. To both of these pleas the plaintiff demurred on the grounds that they attempted to vary the terms of a written agreement by what was not alleged to have been agreed to in writing, and also that the alleged agreement was collateral to the contract between the parties, and could not be pleaded. It was admitted at the trial that the defendant had no written evidence of this agreement, and the admissibility of oral evidence thereof was now the only contention between the parties.

H. James, Q.C. on behalf of the defendant, obtained a rule nisi in pursuance of leave reserved at the trial that the plaintiff's verdict be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground of improper rejection of evidence.

Chantrell (with him Huddleston, Q.C.) showed cause against this rule. The case of Young v. Austen, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 553; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396, is a clear authority that in an action against the acceptor such an agreement as this can be a good defence against the drawer and payee only if proved by written evidence. A distinction is attempted to be shown as to the necessity for a written agreement in an action against the indorser on the authority of Pike v. Street, M. & M. 226; that was an action by an indorsee against the drawer and indorser of a bill of exchange; the defence was that the plaintiff took the bill under a verbal agreement to sue the acceptor only, although the indorsement was general and unqualified; Lord Tenterden in summing up told the jury to find for the defendant if they were satisfied that the plaintiff took the bill on these terms; the verdict, however, was for the plaintiff, and there was therefore no opportunity to review that dictum; moreover, in the 6th edition of Bayley, J.'s book on Bills, the authority of that case is questioned. Byles, J., at p. 96 of the 9th edition on Bills says, "No mere oral agreement can have any effect at law in controlling the instrument, if contemporaneous with the making of it; for that would be to allow oral evidence to vary a written contract;" in support of this many cases are cited, the chief of which are—Hoare v. Graham, 3 Camp. 57, in which Lord Ellenborough refused to admit evidence of a verbal agreement to renew a promissory note made at the time it was framed between the defendants, the payees and indorsers, and the plaintiffs, the indorsees; Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92, in which the court confirmed the ruling of Lord Ellenborough in Hoare v. Graham; and Foster v. Jolly, 1 C. M. & R 703, in which a distinction was carefully drawn between evidence concerning the consideration for a bill and the contract contained on the face of the bill: Parke, B. said, p. 707: "Here the event upon which the defendant contends that the note was payable was contingent and might never happen, which is a clear contradiction of the contract contained in the note. Rawson v. Walker is in point; Pike v. Street falls within the other class of cases in which the consideration has been contradicted: There the agreement was that the plaintiff should sue the acceptor of the bill only, and should not sue the indorser (the defendant). That as between the plaintiff and defendant negatived any consideration, and so was admissible." [WILLES, J.—The real question here is whether the present case comes within the first or the second of the classes of cases named in Foster v. Jolly.] The only contract for which the defendant could have been surety was that which appears upon the face of the bill; and the agreement set up in the plea was made at the time the bill was drawn, and varies the written contract between the parties. "This would be," said Lord Ellenborough in Adams v. Wordley, 1 M. & W. 374, "incorporating with a written contract an incongruous parol condition, which is contrary to first principles." Also, Moseley v. Hanford, 10 B. & C. 729.

James, Q. C., supported the rule.—This evidence is admissible, first, in order to show the real consideration between the parties; and secondly, in order to show that the defendant's liability was suspended even if the contract were that on the face of the bill. There is here no written contract on the part of the drawer; an indorser or drawer makes no written contract whatever with the payee; his liability depends on what by the custom of merchants his signature implies. This was the effect of Castrique v. Buttigieg, 10 Moo. P. C. 94; Maule, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said, p. 108, "The liability of an indorser to his immediate indorsee arises out of a contract between them, and this contract in no case consists exclusively in the writing popularly called an indorsement, and which is indeed necessary to the existence of the contract in question, but that contract arises out of the written indorsement itself, the delivery of the bill to the indorsee, and the intention with which that delivery was made and accepted, as evinced by the words either spoken or written of the parties, and the circumstances (such as the usage at the place, the course of dealing between the parties, and their relative situations) under which the delivery takes place; thus a bill with an unqualified written indorsement may be delivered and received for the purpose of enabling the indorsee to receive the money for account of the indorser, or to enable the indorsee to raise money for his own use on the credit of the signature of the indorser, or with an express stipulation that the indorsee, though for value, is to claim against the drawer and acceptor only, and not against the indorser, who agrees to sell his claim against the prior parties, but stipulates not to warrant their solvency. In all these cases the indorser is not liable to the indorsee, and they are all in conformity with the general law of contracts, which enables parties to them to limit and modify their liabilities as they think fit, provided they do not infringe any prohibitory law." There is here no written contract further than that which the custom of merchants implies from the defendant's signature; and, in accordance with the principle laid down by the Privy Council, this evidence ought to be clearly admitted in order to explain the defendant's liability. The general rule, that oral evidence of a contemporaneous agreement to vary a written contract is not admissible, has many exceptions and no regular limit; at all events none of the cases cited bear upon the facts of the present one. Wallis v. Littell, 31 L. J. 100, C. P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 489, is the nearest case in point. There an action was brought upon the breach of an agreement to transfer the lease of a farm, and the defendant pleaded a contemporaneous oral arrangement that in the event of the landlord not consenting to the transfer, the agreement sued upon was to be null and void; and the defendant alleged that the landlord had refused his consent: it was held that evidence of the contemporaneous oral arrangement was rightly received; for that under the circumstances the inference of fact was that the oral arrangement was intended to suspend the written agreement, and not as a defeasance of it. Here what is sought to be proved will not contradict or vary any written contract, it will only suspend the commencement of liability; evidence of such matter was held to be admissible in

Davis v. Jones, 17 C. B. 625;
Pym v. Campbell, 6 E. & B. 370;
Thompson v. Clubly, 1 M. & W. 212;

and the cases cited in

Byles on Bills, 9th edit., pp. 147, 148; and also in the 4th American Edition, p. 222;
Lloyd v. Howard, 15 Q. B., 995.

In Young v Austen, upon which the judge based his ruling at the trial, the defendant was not as here the indorser, but the acceptor of the bill; moreover in that case the question of the admissibility of oral evidence to renew was only raised incidentally, the real point decided was that it was unnecessary in a plea to aver that the agreement between the parties had been in writing. [WILLES, J.—Young v. Austen may also be distinguished from the present case in that there the alleged agreement made no provision for payment at all.]

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that oral evidence of the agreement mentioned in this plea was properly rejected, and that this rule should therefore be discharged. The defendant's signature is to be taken as attached to the bill as it was drawn, and to import the liability which by the custom of merchants an indorsement implies. The effect of the plea is, that the defendant entered into an agreement, when he signed his name, which is contrary to the custom of merchants, and by which payment was to be made by other means than the contract appearing upon the bill required. This agreement essentially goes to contradict the written contract, and is therefore not admissible according to various authorities, which lay down the general rule that oral evidence is not admissible to vary or contradict a written contract, such as, for example, Hoare v. Graham, Free v. Hawkins, and also the recent decision of this court in Young v. Austen. Mr. James has relied on two cases, the first of which was Castrique v. Battigieg, where the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered by Maule, J. I agree with the principle there laid down, but the facts of that case were so different from those now before us that it can have no authority as to this point. There the question raised was whether an agent abroad for the purpose of buying and remitting bills on account of money received by the agent for his principal was liable to the principal upon bills being dishonoured which the agent had indorsed without any reservation as to his liability; it was held that in the absence of special circumstances, showing that any liability was intended by the general mercantile law, the agent was not responsible. Upon the facts in that case there was no consideration for the indorsement, and the signature was placed on the back of the bill for convenience without any intention of entailing responsibility. No doubt a signature may be put to the back of a bill, and yet the contract may not necessarily become operative, but when the signature, delivery, and other elements of an indorsement are completed, as they were here, at the time of the drawing, the indorser's contract is operative. The other case relied on for the defendant was Wallis v. Littell, upon the peculiar facts of which a certain verbal agreement was held not to be in defeasance of a written contract, but only to suspend its operation; but the ground of that decision was that according to the intention of the parties the written contract was not to be operative at all till after a certain event happened; this is by no means the effect of the agreement alleged in this plea. This case, therefore, seems to me to be in no way affected by the authorities cited for the defendant, but, on the contrary, to be bound by the cases relied on by the other side, which show that the plea in question is no defence to the action. The rule, therefore, will be discharged.

WILLES, J.—I should be better satisfied if the court could see its way to arrive at another conclusion, for I entertain great doubt as to the propriety of excluding the parol evidence; and if it had depended at the trial only upon my own opinion, I should certainly have admitted the evidence. I feel, however, so much deference for the opinion of the other members of this court, and also for the many authorities which seem to be against my view, that I intend to concur in discharging this rule. As I understand the facts of the case, the bill was drawn by the plaintiff for the debt of the acceptor, and was indorsed by the defendant as the acceptor's surety. It does not appear on the bill itself whether the plaintiff knew the object of the indorsement; but it is proposed by the defendant to adduce verbal evidence to show not only the plaintiff's knowledge of the defendant's suretyship, but also that at the time of the drawing, the plaintiff, the defendant, and the acceptor entered into a certain agreement which rendered the defendant's liability conditional; this agreement was that if the acceptor failed to pay the amount of the bill at maturity, the plaintiff should dispose of certain securities belonging to the acceptor, which were handed to the plaintiff for this purpose; and only in the event of nonpayment by the acceptor, and these securities proving inadequate to satisfy the amount, was the plaintiff to exercise his remedy against the drawer. This agreement does not seem to me to be like those in Hoare v. Graham, and in Young v. Austen, for here there is merely a mode of payment appointed, and not an abrogation of the liability to pay; nor is this like the case of Free v. Hawkins, where evidence of the waiver of a right to notice of nonpayment by the maker of a note was held inadmissible. In Foster v. Jolly, it was attempted to show that payment of a note was to be contingent upon a verdict in an action between other parties, and the alleged agreement did not relate to the sufficiency of any fund for payment. All these cases appear to me to be distinguishable from the present, for the words of the agreement here are not contradictory to the contract upon the bill. This is a case in which I should wish to uphold the agreement, perhaps not exactly as put in the plea, but rather as a pre-arranged payment and satisfaction if the securities should turn out to be insufficient in value; and then, and not till then, the bill to be capable of being enforced. I see nothing in such an agreement inconsistent with law, and it would be like a payment by way of fraudulent preference to the creditor of a bankrupt, which at the choice of the assignees is always liable to be done away with; the creditor's debt then revives, the payment fails, and the creditor is entitled to prove. Even if there were no such precedent in the case of ordinary debts, I do not see why we should not make a new one to meet the case of bills of exchange, which differ from ordinary debts in many ways; for instance, as to release and waiver, a bill of exchange is not subject to the technical rules of ordinary debts; also a bill of exchange differs from an ordinary contract in the suspension of a right of action. I do not see exactly why we should not, in a novel case of this kind, follow justice rather than authority, especially when we can find no authority exactly in point. I conclude by putting a case which might here cause great injustice; suppose the plaintiff had wilfully destroyed these securities by throwing them into the fire or by other means, before the bill of exchange became due, he would have been liable no doubt to the owner of the securities, but he might enforce the bill of exchange against the defendant, and what remedy would the defendant have? Unless we decide for the defendant, we must exclude all consideration of the terms of the contract. For these reasons I entertain great doubt, but I do not feel so strongly on the point as to dissent formally from the decision of the other members of the court.

KEATING, J.—I agree with my brother Willes in the belief that it is desirable that we could in this case decide in favour of the admissibility of this evidence. The rule which has been laid down has no doubt had for its object the benefit of suitors, but it may in some cases, as I think possibly in this, be the cause of hardship and injustice. But upon the authorities which have been discussed, I think the rule is inflexible that the terms of a written contract cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence. Now what is the plea as to the effect of the agreement alleged? "Until the plaintiff should have so sold and disposed of the said securities the defendant should not be liable for, or be sued upon, the said bill." This seems to me in no way to touch the consideration for payment, but it creates a postponement of the liability. I could not discover any authority in the cases cited by Mr. James, for admitting verbal evidence of an agreement so as to avoid the written contract upon the bill. In Foster v. Jolly it was sought to give evidence to qualify the defendant's liability on a promissory note; the alleged agreement was not precisely like this, but was not very dissimilar, and it was held that parol evidence is admissible to contradict the consideration or value of a bill or note, but not the terms of the instrument itself. The only case like an exception is Pike v. Street, but as explained by Parke, B. in Foster v. Jolly, it does not relate to the agreement in this case. Under these circumstances, I conclude, although I admit somewhat reluctantly, that this evidence is not admissible.

BRETT, J.—I agree that this evidence is not admissible, and I think so on the ground that it does not relate to the question of consideration; it does not impeach the consideration, nor allege either that there was no consideration or that there was a failure of consideration. It attempts instead to vary the terms of the written contract on the bill; the agreement as to the securities does not alter or affect the consideration for which the bill was indorsed. At the moment of signature the defendant contracted to be liable as indorser upon the bill. An acceptor clearly cannot prove by verbal evidence that his liability commenced only after a certain event, and I know of no authority for saying that the position of a drawer or indorser is different from that of an acceptor. I agree that the rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

MORRIS v. BETHELL.

Bill of exchange—Forged acceptance—Liability of person whose name was forged, he having paid one other similar bill.

The holder of a bill of exchange sued the person whose name appeared as the acceptor. The defendant's signature had been forged, but he had previously taken up and paid to the plaintiff one other bill similarly drawn and accepted, and had not given notice to the plaintiff that he would not pay again under the same circumstances.

At the trial the jury found that the defendant's name as acceptor was neither written, authorised, nor adopted by him, and that his previous conduct did not lead the plaintiff to believe that this acceptance was his signature:

Held, that the defendant having paid only one similar bill, and that not in the course of business, was not estopped from disputing his liability, and that upon the findings of the jury, the verdict was rightly entered in favour of the defendant.

This was an action upon a bill of exchange for 400*l.*, drawn the 20th July 1868, by Richard Bethell, upon the defendant, his brother, and apparently accepted by the defendant. The acceptance was a forgery.

In the month of May 1867 the plaintiff discounted another bill for 300*l.*, which was paid by the defendant when it became due, in the following August; it was drawn and accepted exactly in the same manner as the bill now sued upon.

Two other bills, similarly drawn and accepted, whilst held by another person than the plaintiff, had also in the year 1867 been taken up and paid by the defendant.

The three previous bills were taken up by the defendant upon a promise from Richard Bethell, the drawer, that he would not use his brother's name again.

The case was tried before Bovill, C. J., at Westminster, and a verdict was entered for the defendant; the jury having found that the acceptance to the bill was not written by the defendant, nor with his authority, nor was it adopted by him. They also found that the defendant had not undertaken to be responsible for the form of his signature, which was attached to the bill he had previously paid, and that he did not lead the plaintiff to believe that this acceptance was written by him. Leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict if the court should be of opinion that, as a matter of law upon these findings, the Lord Chief Justice ought to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

Huddleston, Q. C. (with him Holl) moved in pursuance of the leave reserved. By taking up the bills in 1867 the defendant represented that every acceptance of this kind was authorised by him, and he was therefore estopped from denying his liability upon such an acceptance unless he could show that he had given notice of the discontinuance of his authority. In Barber v. Gingell, 3 Esp. 60, it was held that if the defence to a bill of exchange be that it had been forged, it would be a good answer for the plaintiff to show that the defendant had paid other bills of the same party under similar circumstances; in that case it was proved that the defendant and one Taylor had been connected in business, and that the former had in fact paid several bills drawn as the one sued upon by Taylor, and to which Taylor (as it was supposed) had written the acceptance in the defendant's name. Lord Kenyon ruled that that was an answer to the case of forgery set up by the defendant; for though the defendant might not have accepted the bill, he had adopted the acceptance, and made himself thereby liable to the payment of it. In Heane v. Rogers, 9 B. & C. 577, it was laid down by Bayley, J. when delivering the judgment of the court, that "there is no doubt but that the express admissions of a party to the suit, or admissions implied from his conduct, are evidence, and strong evidence, against him; but we think that he is at liberty to prove that such admissions were mistaken or were untrue, and is not estopped or concluded by them, unless another person has been induced by them to alter his condition; in such a case the party is estopped from disputing their truth with respect to that person (and those claiming under him), and that transaction, but as to third persons he is not bound." This rule is also laid down or confirmed in

Greaves v. Key, 3 B. & Ad. 313;
Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 475;
Ryan v. Sams, 12 Q. B. 460;
Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90;
Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654;
Cornish v. Abington, 4 H. & N. 549.

[WILLES, J.—The question here is whether a man, not in business, should be liable to a person holding a bill to which his signature has been forged, merely because he paid that person one other similar bill.] Although it appeared that defendant exacted a pledge from his brother when he paid the former bill that the forgery of his name should not be repeated, the defendant never gave notice to the plaintiff that he would not be again responsible. Whatever the defendant's intention was, if he so conducted himself that a reasonable person would be justified in acting upon the previous representation which was to be inferred from his conduct, he cannot dispute his liability incurred in consequence of that representation. Partnership cases form a class analogous to these:

Collingwood v. Berkeley, 15 C. B., N. S., 145; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 763; Maddick v. Marshall, 16 C. B., N. S., 387; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272; and in Exchequer Chamber, 17 C. B., N. S., 829; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 611;
Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253;
Coles v. Bank of England, 10 A. & E. 437.

BOVILL, C. J.—At the trial of this case the learned counsel for the plaintiff insisted, as he does now, that the defendant was estopped from contesting his signature or denying his acceptance of the bill. On the other hand, it was urged for the defendant by the Solicitor-General that as a matter of law I was bound to nonsuit the plaintiff. If I did not do so, he insisted upon his right to go to the jury. I was inclined to withdraw the case from the jury, but I thought there was some evidence, though extremely slight, against the defendant, in that he was proved to have paid at maturity to the plaintiff one bill similarly accepted before; I therefore left the jury to decide certain questions, and their findings were, that the acceptance to the bill sued upon was not the defendant's signature, that it was not written by his authority, and that it was never adopted by him in order to make himself liable for it. The jury further found that the form of acceptance to the previous bill which defendant paid to the plaintiff in Aug. 1867 was not adopted by him as one for which he undertook to be responsible. They further found that the defendant did not know that the plaintiff had held the previous bill of 1867, and that defendant's previous conduct did not lead the plaintiff to believe that this acceptance was his signature. It seems, therefore, to me that the jury found in favour of the defendant and against the plaintiff on every point. Now Mr. Huddleston says, in order to avoid the effect of their findings, as a matter of law I was bound as judge to have entered the verdict in favour of the plaintiff; but I think he is precluded from so contending by the findings themselves. The only grounds on which a person could be made responsible on a bill not signed by himself are that he had either authorised some other person to make his signature or had adopted a particular signature, or had so conducted himself as not to be able to dispute a signature. It was contended that the defendant had done the last, by conduct, noble on his part, in having paid a bill drawn by his brother, and purporting to be accepted by the defendant, but not accepted by him or by his authority. Having paid that bill, it was said he held out to the world that he would pay all other bills accepted in a similar manner. The plaintiff seemed never to have troubled himself to ascertain whose the signature was. He had held a bill before, and it was paid. If there was a regular course of mercantile business between them, and bills were accepted and acted upon between them in that way, then there would be evidence for the jury that the acceptance was so confirmed. This was the ground of the decision in Barber v. Gingell, but in the present case there were no mercantile transactions, and nothing was proved but the simple fact that the defendant had paid a bill in one year which was a forgery. Was it to be said that he was to pay every bill of a similar character which turned out to be forged? I should be very sorry to affirm any such proposition. It was some sort of a scintilla of evidence which could not be withdrawn from the jury. It seems to me that the utmost to which the doctrine contended for could be carried would be that the facts should be left to the jury. If by a series of transactions a person had led another to believe that a certain signature was his, that was evidence that he ought to be bound by it. But the circumstances of this case are that the defendant never did lead the plaintiff to believe that the signature to the bill was a form of signature which he adopted. If he did not lead the plaintiff to believe that, there was no estoppel, and the case did not come within any of the cases referred to by the learned counsel, and it was a case for the jury, and not for the judge. I think, therefore, that the rule must be refused.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion The length to which I am prepared to go in Mr. Huddleston's favour is to give him the benefit of that which he had at the trial; viz., that the evidence was sufficient to prevent his being nonsuited, and to afford him a right to take the opinion of a jury. Generally a person who pays one or more bills accepted in his name, makes evidence against himself as to his liability for bills similarly accepted, and if the circumstances show a continuance of the authority to the person who has previously written his name, he should be estopped from denying his acceptance. We are asked now to say that although the authority to sign the defendant's name, and all ratification of the apparent acceptance were contradicted, although no course of business was suggested, and no continuance of the adoption of the forged signature was proved, yet the fact of the defendant's having paid up one bill of a similar nature is sufficient to create a liability for all subsequent bills, accepted in the same way, as if they were genuine, unless notice were expressly given to the person who was injured by the forgery. The doctrine of estoppel does not reach such a case. To hold otherwise would be contrary to law, and contrary to the common sense of mankind.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt a man's paying one or more forged acceptances affords some evidence against himself of authority to sign his name, and the payment of one such bill was sufficient evidence for the jury; I think, therefore, my Lord was right to leave the matter to the jury. They found adversely to the plaintiff's view, and now Mr. Huddleston on his behalf contends that the plaintiff has, by the payment of one similar bill, precluded himself from maintaining that he did not authorise this signature. There is no authority in affirmance of that proposition, and the rule must therefore be refused.

BRETT, J.—This acceptance was not the defendant's signature, nor did he authorise the person who wrote it to sign his name, nor did he make any representation that it was his signature; but it is contended that the defendant having paid a former bill, accepted in his name without authority by the same person, is now estopped from disputing his liability. In my opinion there is much doubt whether this was a case for a jury at all; but however that may be, the jury were certainly justified in finding as they did. If a person once in his life authorises another to sign his name to a bill, it does not follow that he should be liable for every other bill signed in the same manner.

Rule refused.

Re JANE MENHENNITT.

Examination and acknowledgment of a deed by a married woman apart from her husband—Commissioners interested or concerned in the transaction—Fines and Recoveries Act 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 79, 80 —Regulæ Generales, Hilary Term, 1834.

The examination of a married woman apart from her husband required by the 80*th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act* 1833 to be made before her acknowledgment of a deed, should be, as well as the acknowledgment itself, in the presence of two commissioners; and notwithstanding the General Rules of Hilary Term 1834, which provide only that one of the commissioners shall not be interested in the transaction, no attorney in any way interested or concerned should interfere at all in the examination or acknowledgment.

Willoughby moved the court to order that the certificate of acknowledgment of Jane Menhennitt, a married woman, together with the affidavit of one of the commissioners before whom the acknowledgment was taken, should be filed.

By sect. 79 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74 (Fines and Recoveries Act 1833), "every deed to be executed by a married woman" . . . "shall upon her executing the same, or afterwards, be produced and acknowledged by her as her act and deed, before a judge of one of the Superior Courts at Westminster, or a master in Chancery, or before two of the perpetual commissioners, or two special commissioners, to be respectively appointed as hereinafter provided."

And by sect. 80, "such judge, master in Chancery, or commissioners as aforesaid, before he or they shall receive the acknowledgment by any married woman of any deed by which any disposition, release, surrender, or extinguishment shall be made by her under this Act, shall examine her, apart from her husband, touching her knowledge of such deed, and shall ascertain whether she freely or voluntarily consents to such deed, and unless she freely and voluntarily consent to such deed, shall not permit her to acknowledge the same; and in such case such deed shall, so far as relates to the execution thereof by such married woman, be void."

The acknowledgment was duly taken by two commissioners, one only of whom was not interested in the transaction. The previous examination of the married woman was made before the disinterested commissioner; this commissioner, however, died before the required affidavit could be made by him, and the other commissioner was able to depose only as follows:—

"This deponent was informed by the said J. R. Rawlinson (the deceased commissioner), and believes, that previous to the said Jane Menhennitt making the said acknowledgment, the said J. R. Rawlinson inquired of the said Jane Menhennitt whether she intended to give up her interest," &c.

The affidavit was then continued in the terms of the lithographed parchment form used in such a case, which terms are those of the rules of court, Hilary Term 1834.

By these rules it is "ordered that where any acknowledgment shall be made by any married woman of any deed under and by virtue of the said Act (viz., the Fines and Recoveries Act) one at least of the said commissioners shall be a person who is not in any manner interested in the transaction giving occasion for such acknowledgment, or concerned therein as attorney, solicitor, or agent, or as clerk to any attorney, solicitor, or agent so interested or concerned. And it is further ordered, that before the commissioners shall receive such acknowledgment, they, or in case one of them shall be interested or concerned as aforesaid, then such one of them as shall not be so interested or concerned, do inquire of every married woman separately and apart from her husband, and from the attorney or solicitor concerned in the transaction, whether she intends to give up her interest in the estate to be passed by such deed, without having any provision made for her in lieu of, or in return for, or in consequence of her so giving up such interest; and where such married woman in answer to such inquiry shall declare that she intends to give up such her interest without any provision, and the said commissioner shall have no reason to doubt the truth of such declaration, and shall verily believe the same to be true, then they shall proceed to receive the said acknowledgment."

The rules further require that in the affidavit verifying the certificate it shall depose amongst other things "that one at least of the commissioners taking such acknowledgment, to the best of his deponent's knowledge and belief, is not in any manner interested in the transaction giving occasion for the taking of such acknowledgment, or concerned therein." . . . "And that previously to such acknowledgment being taken the deponent had inquired of such married woman (or if more than one of each of such married women) whether she intended to give up her interest in the estate to be passed? and also the answer given thereto," &c. (These rules are set out in Chitty's Statutes, vol. ii., "Fines and Recoveries," 3rd edit., p. 119.) Re Scholfield, 3 Bing. N. C. 293, was an application upon a matter of this kind, and it was held that the affidavit verifying the certificate of a married woman's acknowledgment of a deed may be made by one of the commissioners who took the acknowledgment provided he be a practising attorney, and one of the commissioners has no interest in the affair.

BOVILL, C. J.—The Act requires that the acknowledgment shall be made before two commissioners, and whatever may have become usual under the rule of court, we cannot allow a custom to overrule the words of the statute. If no attorney to either party ever acted as a commissioner in such a matter, no difficulty of this kind could possibly arise. Although it may be competent for an attorney concerned to act in one part of the transaction, if he does not consider himself free to be present at the examination he should not interfere at all. It should be generally understood that this court considers the examination, as well as the acknowledgment, of a married woman, should be made by or before two disinterested commissioners; and the practice, of the mischief of which the present case is an instance, should no longer be adopted. The court declines to grant this application.

WILLES, J.—The affidavit omits the only essential matter, which is, that the married woman upon examination consented to the transaction. The Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75, was passed in consequence of a doubt whether the court had power, when there appeared to have been impropriety, to quash the proceedings in order to prevent injury to innocent persons concerned. By the rules of 1834, certainly one commissioner only is required to be disinterested, but there may be a question whether the effect of that rule is not qualified by the subsequent statute (a). The case cited does not help the present application, because the required affidavit has not been produced.

KEATING and BRETT, JJ., concurred.

Application refused.

Attorney for applicant, Strangways.

(a) In 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75, which is "An Act to remove doubts concerning the due acknowledgment of deeds by married women in certain cases," it is recited that "it is apprehended that deeds executed by married women under the provisions of the said Act (viz., Fines and Recoveries Act 1833) may be liable to be invalidated by the circumstance that the judge or master in Chancery, or one or both of the commissioners taking the acknowledgment may be, or may have been, interested or concerned, either as a party or otherwise, in the transaction giving occasion for such acknowledgment, and it is not expedient that deeds executed in good faith under such circumstances should be invalidated." It is enacted that the acknowledgment of a deed should not be impeachable by reason only of the party before whom the same was taken being interested. The 2nd section provides for the stay of proceedings instituted before July 1854. The 3rd section gives the Court of Common Pleas power to make rules for preventing commissioners who are interested from taking acknowledgments; but no rules of court on the subject are in existence of a later date than 1834.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 24, 25, and 26, and July 2.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND CITIZENS OF CARLISLE v. GRAHAM AND ANOTHER.

The plaintiffs formerly had, by grant from the Crown, a several fishery in a portion of a tidal river. The waters of that portion of the river gradually deserted their original course, and flowed in a new channel over the land of a private proprietor:

Held, that the several fishery of the plaintiffs was not transferred from the old to the new channel.

This was an action of trespass to the plaintiffs' several fishery in the river Eden, in the county of Cumberland.

The defendants pleaded: 1. Not guilty. 2. That the said several fishery was not the plaintiffs', as alleged. 3. That the soil on and over which the said alleged fishery was at the said times when, &c, was and still is the soil and freehold of the Right Hon. William, Earl of Lonsdale, and that the defendants committed the acts complained of by his leave and licence, and as his servants, and by his command. 4. That the soil, &c., was the Earl of Lonsdale's, as in the 3rd plea alleged, and that he demised it to the defendants.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the defendants' pleas, and replied—Secondly, to the third plea, that the river Eden in the declaration mentioned was a river in the county of Cumberland, in which the tides and waters of the sea flow and reflow, and that the Corporation of Carlisle, from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, had had and enjoyed, and still ought to have and enjoy, a several fishery in the said river. Thirdly, to the third plea, alleging that, from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, until and at the time of the grant thereafter mentioned, the Kings of England, in right of the Crown of England, were seised of and entitled to a several fishery in the said river, and that King Edward II. granted the said several fishery to the corporation. Fourthly, to the fourth plea, repeating the allegation in the second replication to the third plea, and further alleging that the plaintiffs were, before and at the time of the alleged lease and demise to the defendants by the said Earl in the fourth plea mentioned, by virtue of the premises in the replication, possessed of and entitled to the said several fishery. Fifthly, to the fourth plea, repeating the allegations in the third replication to the third plea, and alleging that the plaintiffs were, before and at the time of the alleged demise to the defendants by the said Earl, by virtue of the premises in the replication, possessed of and entitled to the several fishery.

The defendants rejoined, taking issue on the replications.

The action was tried before Lush, J. at the Spring Assizes at Carlisle, in 1868, when the facts appeared to be as follows:—The plaintiffs were the corporation of Carlisle, and claimed to be entitled to a fishery in a certain portion of the river Eden, called the Goat. The defendants claimed under a lease from the Earl of Lonsdale, who was owner of the soil of the Goat.

It appeared that originally the river Eden, which in that part was a tidal river, flowed along a channel now called the Loop, in which the corporation of

Carlisle had a several fishery. The Goat was at that time a ditch with very little water in it, and at parts entirely dry. In 1693 the waters of the river began to pass down the Goat, and in process of time they ceased to go down the Loop altogether, except occasionally during freshes, and the Goat became the course of the river. The corporation now claimed to have a several fishery in the Goat as they formerly had in the Loop.

The evidence, which was very voluminous, and the facts upon which the decision of the court proceeded, are fully set out in the judgments. The learned judge at the trial directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiffs to move to enter it for themselves for 40*s.* damages.

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained.

Manisty, Q. C., T. Jones, Q.C., and R. G. Williams showed cause.—Such a right as the plaintiffs claim cannot be created since Magna Charta unless it be granted by the Crown as having been previously owner of the soil of the river and the fishery. The land over which the new course of the river goes is not the soil and freehold of the Crown, but of the Earl of Lonsdale. The plaintiffs are seeking to make themselves the possessors of a new several fishery on the soil of a private individual. They also contended that the plaintiffs had lost the right of fishery, if they ever had any, over the new course of the river, by non-user for more than sixty years. They cited Marshall v. Ulleswater Steam Navigation Company, 3 B. & S. 732; 8 L. T. Rep. N.S. 416.

Mellish, Q. C., and Kemplay, supported the rule. The plaintiffs are entitled to the same rights of fishery in the new course of the river as they had in the old. The river, in its new course, is a tidal or navigable river. All public rights are transferred from the old course to the new. The new course is a highway, just as the old was. Why is it any greater hardship upon the private proprietor that a private right of fishery should also be transferred? The river being tidal, the fishery is certainly not his. Then, if not the plaintiffs', the right of fishery belongs to the public. They also contended that the plaintiffs' right had not been barred by 3 & 4 Will. 4 c. 27, s. 3, on the ground that that Act applied only to corporeal hereditaments, and that there was no evidence that they had ever abandoned their right or dedicated it to the public. July 2nd.—The following judgments were delivered.—KELLY, C. B.—In this action the plaintiffs claim a several fishery in a portion of the river Eden called the Goat, about half a mile in length, and extending from a point marked upon the plan which was laid before us as Thornbush Draught (Back o' Garth) to Bank End Pool. The river Eden is a tidal river, and the plaintiffs are entitled to two several fisheries, one called the Free Boat, and the other the King Garth, derived under grants and charters of Henry III. and Edward II., confirming more ancient grants anterior to Magna Charta. The Free Boat fishery extends from the highest point to which the tide flows to the point at which the King Garth fishery begins; and the King Garth fishery from that point to the head or upper part of the Goat, and thence formerly proceeded eastward in a semicircular course along what was once a portion of the river Eden, and which has been called in argument the Loop, and fell into the old river near Bank End Pool at the lower end of the Goat. It was at one time contended that the King Garth fishery continued throughout the semicircular loop to Bank End Pool; but it was afterwards admitted and is the fair result of the evidence, that it terminated at or near a point called Cargo Holme, and that the fishery from that point to Bank End Pool belonged to the Earl of Lonsdale or his predecessors in title, the corporation being entitled only to a third boat or draft. In this part of the river before or about 1693, the waters of the Eden began to recede from the Loop, and to pass up and down the Goat, which was at that time a ditch with very little water in it, and at parts entirely dry. The soil of the Goat, the lands on both sides of it, and the fishery throughout the whole course of the river from Bank End Pool to the sea, have belonged to the Lowther family, now represented by the Earl of Lonsdale under whom the defendants claim, from the earliest times to the present day. In 1693, when the fish began in any numbers to make their way up the Goat and so to desert the Loop and the King Garth fishery of the plaintiffs, a deed was made by which Sir John Lowther granted to the corporation liberty to fix posts and stakes, and to use boats and spread nets, and other utensils for fishing, for the more easy and better management of the King Garth fishery. The defendants allege that this was with a view to the erection of a weir or dam, and by that and other means to stop the passage of the fish up the Goat, and to turn them into the Loop and the fishery of the corporation. The plaintiffs insist that it is the effect of this deed to recognise their right to fish in the Goat. It is unnecessary to pronounce any opinion on this point. The evidence shows that in fact the waters of the Eden at length, by slow degrees, altogether receded from the Loop and made themselves a passage through the Goat, leaving the whole of the Loop dry land, and converting the Goat into a permanent integral portion of the tidal river. Between 1693 and 1760, several leases were granted by the corporation of their fisheries of King Garth and Free Boat, and in one of them, of 1711, they covenanted for the quiet enjoyment of the fishery called King Garth and Goat, and other the premises. In 1723, 1744, and 1755, the Lowthers granted leases of all their fisheries in the Eden to the corporation. The last of these leases expired in 1758. In 1760 a bill in Chancery was filed by the corporation against Sir James Lowther to establish their right inter alia to fish in the Goat. Evidence was taken upon depositions, the result of which was certainly far from supporting the claim of the corporation; but it is really immaterial whether this was so or not, for, inasmuch as the right of a fishery in the corporation could only be derived from a grant or grants anterior to Magna Charta, and the Goat was mostly dry ground until the 17th century, it is clear that the claim of the corporation depends upon whether, in point of law, the fishery to which they were entitled in the Loop when it formed a part of the tidal river was transferred to the Goat, and became their several fishery therein when the waters had receded from the Loop and flowed into and through the Goat, making it a portion of the river. The fishery suit seems to have terminated in a compromise, for no decree is to be found; and three years later, in 1763, and from that time till 1781, a number of leases appear to have been granted by the corporation to their tenants, not only of the Free Boat and King Garth fisheries, but of all the fisheries of the Lowther family within the river Eden. The last of these leases expired in 1784. The corporation must therefore have taken leases from the Lowthers of their fisheries in the Eden between 1760 and 1781, though none such appear upon the case. From 1784 to 1794 the Free Boat fishery appears to have been leased by the corporation to one Askham, or retained in their own hands, and from 1794 to 1842 was leased to the late Earl Lonsdale at 32*l.* a year. The King Garth fishery and the Goat are no more mentioned after 1784, except that we find that on the 12th Oct. 1805 Lord Lowther appears to have purchased of the corporation their boats and nets at King Garth, and that they on that day paid to him 105*l.* for twenty-one years' rent of the Goat fishery at 5*l.* per annum. From 1842 to 1866, the year before this action was brought, one Ralph held the Free Boat fishery under the corporation, and the Goat fishery under Lord Lonsdale. Such are the leading facts of the case, and upon these the question arises whether, upon the change in the course of the river from the Loop to the Goat as above described, the corporation became entitled to the several fishery in the Goat to which they had been before entitled in the Loop or ancient course of the river. The defendants deny their right to any fishery at all in the Goat, and insist that, upon the receding of the waters from the Loop, the several fishery came to an end at the point at which the Loop began. And we are called upon to decide the question which now arises for the first time—is the several fishery of a subject in a tidal river, the waters of which permanently recede from a portion of its course, and flow into and through another course where the soil and the land on both sides of the new channel thus formed belong to another subject, transferred from the old to the new channel, and so a several fishery created in and throughout such new channel, or in some, or if in any in what part of it? No authority has been cited at the bar, nor is any to be found in the books, to the effect that under such circumstances a several fishery is extended into or created in the new channel thus formed in the tidal river. It is said in Rolle's Abridgment, and appears to have been remarked by Thorp, J. in a case in the Year Books, 28 Edw. 3, c. 93, that wherever the tide flows and reflows it may be called an arm of the sea; and if the water be a highway, and changes its course from one soil to another, still it becomes a highway there where the water flows, as it was in its ancient course, so that the lord of the soil cannot disturb the waters in this new course. But this proposition if true as regards the use by the public of the tidal water as a highway, or the exercise of any other public right, fails to show that a private right to a several fishery arises within the new course of the tidal waters. In the case of Murphy v. Regan, 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 143, O'Hagan, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says, "But whilst the right of fishing in fresh waters in which the soil belongs to the riparian owners is thus exclusive, the right of fishing in the sea its arms and estuaries, and in its tidal waters wherever it ebbs and flows, is held by the common law to be publici juris, and so to belong to all the subjects of the Crown, the soil of the sea, and its arms and estuaries and tidal waters, being vested in the Sovereign as a trustee for the public. The exclusive right of fishing in the one case, and the public right of fishing in the other, depend upon the existence of a proprietorship in the soil of the private river by the private owner and by the Sovereign in a public river respectively." And this is the true principle of the law touching a several fishery in a tidal river. If therefore the right of the Crown to grant a several fishery in a tidal river is derived from the ownership of the soil which is in the Crown by common law, a several fishery cannot be acquired, even in a tidal river, if the soil belong not to the Crown, but to a subject. And all the authorities, ancient and modern, are uniform to the effect that if by the irruption of the waters of a tidal river a new channel is formed in the land of a subject, although the rights of the Crown and the public may come into existence and be exercised in what has thus become a portion of a tidal river, or of an arm of the sea the right to the soil remains in the owner, so that if at any time thereafter the water shall recede, and the river again change its course, leaving the new channel dry, the soil becomes again the exclusive property of the owner, free from all rights whatsoever in the Crown or in the public: (see Hale De Jure Maris, pars prima, Hargreave's Tracts, pp. 5, 6, 11, 13, 16, 37.) If, then, the title of the corporation to the fishery is derived from a grant by the Crown, and the title of the Crown to grant from the ownership of the soil, how can the corporation claim a right to the fishery in the Goat, where the soil does not and never did belong to the Crown? Other difficulties present themselves in the way of this claim. Throughout what portion of the Goat can the King Garth several fishery be extended? Not to the whole of it, for the fishery of the corporation did not extend throughout the whole of the Loop; nor to the same length of space as it occupied in the Loop, for the Goat and the Loop are not of equal length, the Goat being much shorter than the Loop. Besides, the grant to the corporation must have been of some definite portion of the river, inasmuch as the King Garth fishery began where the Free Boat fishery ended, and ended where the Lowther fishery began. How then can a several fishery in the Eden, from the lower end of the Free Boat fishery to a point near Cargo Holme in the Loop, be converted into a fishery from its upper terminus to some undefined point on the Goat? If then the claim of the corporation cannot be maintained upon the ground that the fishery was transferred from the Loop to the Goat, it is clear that it cannot be maintained at all. The Goat has now become a portion of a tidal river or arm of the sea; and a several fishery there cannot exist in a subject but by a grant from the Crown anterior to Magna Charta; and until some period of time between 1693 and 1760 the Goat was dry land, where no fishery could have existed. It was argued for the plaintiffs that the grant by Sir John Lowther in 1693 conferred or recognised a right to fish in the Goat, and that the corporation have exercised the right at various periods between 1693 and 1805; but, the Goat having become a portion of a tidal river, no grant by a subject, and no length of user by a corporation since 1693, even if the grant of 1693 could be thus construed and any evidence existed of such user, could confer a right to a several fishery therein. The claim of the corporation, therefore, altogether fails. In the view thus taken of the principal points in the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether the right to this several fishery, if it ever existed, has been lost or extinguished by non-user or otherwise. I may, however, observe that, supposing the Acts of Parliament which in effect may be called statutes of limitation touching claims to property corporeal and incorporeal to be inapplicable to the case before us, it is yet difficult to sustain a claim to a several fishery in a tidal river after a non-user for nearly a century, and where, supposing no several fishery to exist, the public may claim a right to fish by reason of the waters having become a portion of an arm of the sea. It appears from the evidence that from 1784 to 1805 the corporation paid a rent of 5*l.* a year to the Lowthers for the Goat fishery. It is said that this was a payment made under the grant of 1693, and it may be so; but yet the payment, whether made under or with reference to that grant or not, being admitted by the corporation to have been made for the Goat fishery, is wholly inconsistent with a right in them to a several fishery in the Goat; while, on the other hand, one Ralph has enjoyed a fishery there for upwards of thirty years last past under the Earls of Lonsdale. If it be possible, therefore, by non-user to dedicate a fishery in a tidal river to the public, the facts of this case afford some evidence of such a dedication between the year 1780 and the present time. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the claim of the corporation is not sustained; that the verdict for the defendants must stand; and that the rule must be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion; but I desire to add a few observations, as the point argued before us was one of novelty. In this case the question is, not whether the defendants have any and what right, but whether the plaintiffs have a several fishery. The burden of proof is on them. They must prove title to a several fishery which existed before Magna Charta. They say that they do so by showing a several fishery in a part of the Loop, and that the Goat is a new tidal channel in place of the Loop, and so they say they have a several fishery in a part of the Goat. It is for them to show affirmatively why this does follow as a consequence on the change in the course of the river, not for the defendants to show why it does not. It is difficult to prove and to argue a negative, and I might content myself with saying that I see no reason why the alleged consequence should follow. But the argument for the plaintiffs I understand to be this: that the plaintiffs had a fishery in the Eden from a certain point down the river, and that from that point down the river now leads along the Goat; therefore the plaintiffs' fishery is there; the fishery was formerly along the then public highway of the Eden, therefore it is now along the new public highway of the Eden. I repeat, I think it would be enough to say as to this argument that, though the premises are true, the consequence does not follow. The plaintiffs had a several fishery, which no doubt must have been granted or acquired by metes or bounds; the locus in quo is not within those metes and bounds. The plaintiffs had a several fishery over the soil and freehold of the Crown; this is not the soil and freehold of the Crown. It may be subject to the public right of navigation as a highway; but how has it become subject to the right of the plaintiffs? When did it so become? As the change of the river's course was gradual, there must have been a time when the river ran in both channels, and fish were found in both. Had the plaintiff at that time a several fishery in both channels? Suppose the owners of the soil of the Goat on the formation of a channel, and before evidence of dedication to the public, had thought fit, as they might have done, to stop the inlet of the waters, could they not have done so notwithstanding there were fish in the Goat? I should think they could. But if so, they could destroy the plaintiffs' fishery; so that it would be a several fishery in the plaintiffs, with a right to another to destroy it. Again, suppose the plaintiffs cleansed out the old Eden, would they not have a several fishery there? And can they have a right to both waters under a grant within the metes and bounds of which both waters certainly would not be? Further, I think the right to grant a several fishery arises from the ownership of the soil. But the Crown is not, nor is shown ever to have been, the owner of the soil of the Goat. The question in this case arises for the first time, and I think the plaintiffs do not give us sufficient reasons for answering it in their favour. Reference was made to Rolles Abridgment, title Chemin, and to a case in the Year Books 23 Edw. 3, c. 93, where Thorp, J. says that wherever the tide flows and reflows it may be called an arm of the sea, and if the water be a highway and changes course from one soil to another, still it becomes a highway there where the water flows as it was in its ancient course, so that the lord of the soil cannot disturb the waters in their new course. This may be true as regards the public right of navigation, or any other public right, but does not establish the right to a several fishery in the new course of the river. But there is a further consideration which I think fatal to the plaintiffs. If they have a several fishery in the Goat, its extent must be capable of ascertainment, not for the purpose of this action, as the defendants have fished the whole length of the Goat, but in point of law it must be a fishery from some one definite point to some other definite point. There must be some rule by which it can be ascertained; but in fact there is no such rule here. It is not the whole length of the Goat, nor do I think a rule-of-three sum would ascertain the matter—viz., as the length of the Loop was to the length of the Goat, so is the length of the old fishery to that of the new. Nor can I see that this solution, or one reaching by a line drawn from the terminus of the fishery in the Loop to the Goat, would be just or reasonable to the owners of the fishery below that of the plaintiffs. It seems to me therefore that, even if the plaintiffs, had they been the owners of the fishery the whole length of the Loop, could (as I think they could not) have made title to the Goat, that not being such owners the whole length of the Loop, they cannot. The measure of their right is lost. I have said nothing about the fact that the plaintiffs themselves caused this desertion of the old and formation of the new channel; but it certainly does seem a strong thing to say that by their own act they have acquired the right over another's soil. I think this consideration fatal to them, even supposing that they would have been right if the new channel was the work of nature. I think, therefore, the defendants entitled to judgment. As to the second point, it is unnecessary to decide it with the opinion I have, but I may say that as at present advised I could not decide it in favour of the defendants, for it seems to me the Statute of Limitations applies, and I can see no sufficient evidence of an abandonment to the public of this right, if it ever existed. My brother Channell concurs that our judgment should be for the defendants.

HIGGS v. THE NORTHERN ASSAM TEA COMPANY (LIMITED).

SAME v. SAME.

Debentures—Assignment of—Calls on shares—Right of set-off—Equity.

The defendants' company issued to the plaintiff certain debenture bonds, by which they bound themselves to pay to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, or assigns a certain amount upon a future day, together with interest thereon in the mean time. By the articles of association of the company the defendants were to have a lien upon the shares or debentures of members indebted to the company, and to be entitled to sell and transfer them, and apply the proceeds in discharge of such debt. Subsequently the plaintiff transferred certain of these debenture bonds to A. B. The defendants registered the transfer, and issued a certificate to A. B., stating that he had been registered as proprietor of the debenture bonds. Their secretary also, in a letter to A. B., acknowledged him to be the proprietor of the bonds, and requested time for payment. They likewise accepted one of the bonds in payment of calls due from A. B. to them on shares held by him in the company. The plaintiffs previously to the falling due of the debenture bonds became indebted to the defendants in a certain sum for calls upon shares held by plaintiff in defendants' company. This sum the defendants sought to set-off in an action brought in the name of the plaintiff, but really for the benefit of A. B., the assignee of the debentures:

Held, on a special case stated in the action raising the question whether the defendants were entitled in equity to set-off the calls, that they were not so entitled.

These were actions upon certain debenture bonds in which special cases had been stated, the question in each case being whether the defendants were entitled to rely on a set-off for calls due upon shares held by the plaintiff, the obligee of the bonds, in the defendants' company, or whether the actions, though nominally brought by the plaintiff, being really for the benefit of Messrs. Cavendish and Smith, the assignees of the debenture bonds, sued on in equity, would, under the circumstances of the case, restrain the defendants from availing themselves of this set-off at law.

On the 17th Oct. 1864, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and E. W. Wingrove on behalf of a company about to be formed, and to be called the Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited.) By this agreement the plaintiff agreed to sell his estates in Assam to Wingrove for 7000*l.* in cash, to be paid on or before the 15th Nov., and the sum of 47,000*l.* in debenture bonds of the company above mentioned in sums of 100*l.* each, and bearing interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the 1st. Jan. 1865, such debentures to be delivered to the said plaintiff on the completion of the transfer of the estates as he might direct, and to be redeemable and paid—8000*l.* on 1st Jan. 1868, 10,000*l.* on 1st Jan. 1869, 14,000*l.* on 1st Jan. 1870, 15,000*l.* on 1st Jan. 1871, but the plaintiff was to have a lien for the unpaid purchase-money and interest on the said land as long as any part thereof should remain unpaid.

The company was registered on the 22nd Oct. 1864, and the articles of association contained the following provision:—

"The company shall have a pecuniary lien upon the share or shares, debenture or debentures, and dividends or profits of any member who may be either absolutely or contingently indebted, or liable to the company in any amount and on any account whatsoever, and that whether such member is liable or indebted solely or jointly with any other person or persons, and whether the debt be actually payable or not, and the board of directors may after any such debt has become actually payable, absolutely sell, dispose of, and transfer all or any one or more of the shares or debentures of any member so indebted or liable to them as aforesaid, and may apply the proceeds of such sale in or towards the payment or satisfaction of the said debt or liability, and the consent of any such member shall not be necessary for giving validity to such sale, disposition, or transfer, and the purchaser of any such share or shares, debenture or debentures, shall not be bound to ascertain whether such power of sale shall have arisen, and a resolution of such board that such sale shall be made, and the entry of the name of the purchaser in the company's share register as the holder of such share or debenture, shall confer a good title both at law and in equity on the purchaser against such member."

On the 4th April, 1865, the purchase of the land was completed, and the debentures issued to the plaintiff with the exception of those to be payable 1st Jan. 1871, which were retained, in accordance with the agreement, as a security for the performance of certain stipulations therein.

Each of the debentures payable Jan. 1st 1868, were in the following form:

The Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited).

To all to whom these presents shall come, the Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited) send greeting. Whereas under and by virtue of an agreement dated the 17th Oct. 1864, made between E. H. Higgs, of, &c., of the one part, and E. W. Wingrove, for and on behalf of the said company of the other part, the said company became and is now liable to pay to the said E. H. Higgs the sum of 47,000*l.*, being the balance of the purchase-money agreed to be paid for certain tea estates situated in Upper Assam, in the said agreement described, and thereby agreed to be sold and transferred by the said E. H. Higgs to the said company, upon certain terms and conditions therein mentioned, and, amongst others, that the payment of the said sum of 47,000*l.* should be made in debenture bonds of the company in sums of 100*l.* each bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the 1st Jan. 1865, and to be redeemable and paid as follows, 8000*l.* part thereof, &c., and that until such payment be made the said E. H. Higgs should have and he accordingly now has a lien on the said tea estates. And whereas, in pursuance and part performance of the said agreement, and in order to secure payment of the said sum of 47,000*l.*, the said company has this day issued four series of debenture bonds of 100*l.* each, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum for the respective sums, and payable at the respective times hereinbefore mentioned, the first series whereof for 8000*l.* in bonds of 100*l.* each bearing interest at 5 per cent, per annum, payable on the 1st Jan. 1868, is secured to be paid by these presents as hereinafter mentioned. Now, therefore, know ye, and these presents witness, that the said Northern of Assam Tea Company (Limited) hereby bind themselves to pay to the said E. H. Higgs, his executors, administrators, or assigns, on the 1st Jan. 1868, the principal sum of 100*l.* sterling, and also to pay interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, half-yearly on the days mentioned in, and on presentation of the respective coupons hereto annexed, until payment of the said principal.

Given under the common seal of the said Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited), this 2nd June 1865,

P. BATTESCOMBE, } Directors.
S. W. MITCHELL, }
C. A. FIELDER, Secretary.

The other debentures were similar in form. On 28th July 1865 the plaintiff, in consideration of 1850*l.*, then paid to him by Henry Cavendish Cavendish, by deed transferred to the said Henry Cavendish Cavendish thirty of the said debentures, numbered 61 to 80, payable on the 1st Jan. 1868. The said Mr. Cavendish then was and from thence till action brought has been, a shareholder in defendants' company. The said transfer was expressed to be made to secure the sum of 2000*l.* and interest. On the 9th Aug. 1865 Cavendish gave notice of the transfer to the defendants, and sent them the deed of transfer for registration, and the transfer was registered by the defendants in a book kept by them for registering mortgages, and called the register of mortgages as transferred by plaintiff to Cavendish, and they delivered to Cavendish a certificate in the following form:

Certificate of transfer of debentures. The Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited) incorporated by Act of Parliament. This is to certify that Henry Cavendish Taylor, Esq., of &c., has this day been entered on the register of mortgages as the registered proprietor of twenty debenture bonds of 100*l.* each of the first series, first issue, numbered 61 to 80 inclusive, in the above company. Dated in London, this 9th day of Aug. 1865. C. H. FIELDER, Secretary,

N.B. Debenture bonds must be annexed hereto.

On Oct. 3rd 1866 the plaintiff, in consideration of 1020*l.*, then paid to him by Geo. Percival Smith, transferred to him twelve other of the first series of bonds, numbered 49 to 60 by a deed in similar terms to the former transfer. Smith was, and till action continued, a shareholder in defendants' company. On 16th Oct. 1866 Smith gave notice of the transfer to defendants, and was entered on the register, and received a certificate similar to that given to Cavendish. Defendants have paid interest on the debentures to Cavendish and Smith till 1st Jan. 1868. In Nov. and Dec. 1867 letters were written by the defendants' secretary to Cavendish and Smith acknowledging each of them to be the owners of the debentures respectively transferred to them soliciting further time for payment.

In Jan. 1868 the defendants proposed to accept, and accepted, from Cavendish and Smith, two of the said debentures so transferred to them in payment of an equal amount to that of the principal moneys in the said debentures due from each of them to the defendants for calls on the shares held by each of them in defendants' company.

Neither Cavendish nor Smith, when the debentures were transferred, had any notice that the defendants had or would claim any right of set-off or lien as against or on the said debentures, or any of them.

On the 23rd Feb. 1866, by a deed of mortgage between defendants of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, after reciting the original agreement for sale of the plaintiff's estates, and that plaintiff had requested defendants, in performance of the agreement for giving him a lien for unpaid purchase-money, to execute the mortgage thereinafter expressed for the benefit of himself and his assigns, the holders for the time being of the debentures, it was witnessed that the defendants granted the lands therein mentioned to plaintiff, with a proviso for redemption if defendant should pay the respective holders for the time being of the several debenture bonds so issued by defendants, the several sums of principal money secured thereby respectively, with the interest thereon respectively, at the rate thereon respectively specified at the several and respective times, and in the respective manner, by the said bond respectively provided.

The plaintiff, by deed dated 4th Oct. 1866, covenanted with defendants that he (the plaintiff), his executors, or administrators, would punctually pay the calls for the time being to be made on 2000 shares therein mentioned.

The following calls were afterwards duly made on the said shares, of which due notice was given: 16th July 1866, 1200*l.*; 16th July 1866, 800*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 600*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 400*l.*

Default was made in payment of these calls, and they still remained unpaid. The plaintiff at the time of the making of the calls hereinafter mentioned was registered owner of the shares on which they were made. Calls on (A) shares, 31st Aug. 1867, 692*l.* 10*s.*; 3rd Nov. 1867, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 28th Feb. 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 16th July, 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 1st May 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 1st Aug., 817*l.* 10*s.* Calls on B shares, 16th July 1866, 1250*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 625*l.*

The said calls were duly made, and due notice given of them, and at the time of the commencement of the suit they were, and still were, due and unpaid to the defendant.

The court were to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

Brown, Q. C. (with him R. F. Stone) for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—BRAMWELL, B. now delivered the judgment of the court (himself and Channell, B.)—We are to consider these cases, not on the pleadings, but as special cases. The question in them is the same as would arise if Messrs. Cavendish and Smith had brought suits in their own names in equity against the defendants and the defendants had set up the defence they now set up of a legal set-off—would there be what is called an equity to prevent their doing so? that is, taking the set-off to be available at law, would equity restrain the defendant from relying on it? It is obviously a purely equitable question, and our answer must be given with great distrust, the more so owing to the state of the authorities. The set-off is a set-off in law: have the defendants so contracted or conducted themselves that they cannot avail themselves of it? The equity, if any, of Messrs. Cavendish and Smith to restrain the set-off is an equity between them and the defendants. Then, we presume that if it should appear that these debentures were to be paid to assignees of them, without the right of set-off, still, if Higgs himself sued, a set-off would be available against him. But though it is an equity between the assignees of the debentures and the defendants, it is an equity which may arise out of the original contract with Higgs, for if the contract with him was to pay his assignees without right of set-off, then the assignees would have an equity to prevent a set-off being enforced against him. Further, if whatever may have been the original contract with Higgs, the defendants have so conducted themselves to the assignees that it would be inequitable for the defendants to set up such a set-off, then also such an equity exists in the assignees. We have to consider then whether by the original contract with Higgs or by their subsequent dealing with Messrs. Cavendish and Smith, or by both combined, the defendants are precluded from defending themselves by this set-off due from Higgs. In considering this question it is impossible to doubt that both Higgs and the defendant contemplated that these debentures would be sold and assigned. Their amounts, 47,000*l.*, or 32,000*l.* deducting the 15,000*l.*, the defendants were to return, they being issued in separate debentures of 100*l.* instead of one bond or covenant given; the subsequent registration of them, and the issuing certificates to Messrs. Cavendish and Smith, stating them to be proprietors of the debentures; in short, the entire dealing and conduct in relation to these debentures, show the parties contemplated that they would be sold and assigned. The provisions in article 18 seem decisive. The company may sell the debentures of an indebted member, but that cannot mean subject to a set-off against him, otherwise the debenture of A. might be sold to B., and then payment refused to B. because A. was still indebted to the company. So under article 12, the company were to retain a reasonable number of Higgs's debentures, and have a lien on them to secure Higgs's guarantee of profits. It cannot be supposed that if they sold these debentures under this lien, the assignees would have been subject to Higgs's debt for calls. Further, the mortgage is expressly in trust for the "holders for the time being" of the debentures unpaid. Both parties, therefore, must have contemplated that these debentures would be assigned but as they could not practically be sold and consigned if subject to an uncertain set-off against Higgs, both he and the defendants must have intended that in the hands of transferees they should not be subject to that set-off. These considerations, and the cases of Jeffreys v. The Agra Bank, L. Rep. 2, Ch. 674; 36 L. J. 222, Ch.; R. Blakely Ordnance Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 154; 37 L. J. 418, Ch.; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 132; and R. General Estates Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 758; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457, 894, would seem sufficient authority for our deciding this case in favour of the plaintiff, but it is said a difficulty is created by the case of Re Natal Investment Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 355; 37 L. J. 362, Ch.; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 171. By that case, of course, we are bound

It was not a case of set-off, but of failure of consideration for the debenture assigned. It was decided on its own facts, and assuming it to be well decided it did not overrule Re The Blakely Insurance Company: (see per Wood, L. J. in Re The General Estates Company.) In the present case there is what did not exist in any of the four cases referred to, the dealing of the defendants with the assignees of the debentures. As we have observed they register them as proprietors, they give them certificates that they are registered proprietors of the debenture bonds. In Nov. and Dec. 1867, after the debt from Higgs was due, they write letters to Messrs. Cavendish and Smith acknowledging each of them to be owners of the debentures respectively transferred to them, soliciting further time for payment, and in Jan. 1868, after the debentures are due, they accept from them debentures in payment of a general amount of calls due from them. Mr. Mellish said all this was no more than they were bound to do, even with the amount of set-off, and cited Mangles v. Dixon, 3 H. of L. 702. It is impossible not to agree with the admirable reasoning of Lord St. Leonards in that case, and it is true a debtor cannot refuse to receive from the assignee of a debt notice of the assignment, and it is true that he is not bound to tell him that the debt is subject to equities not apparent on its face so to speak. But there is more in this case. Messrs. Cavendish and Smith are called by the defendants proprietors of these debentures. In truth the defendants now say that there is no beneficial property in them, or that they are not absolute proprietors of them, but qualified proprietors subject to a right in the defendants. Then they treat the debentures as to those they take in payment of calls, as being due to their full amount, and negotiate for thereby paying a debt which they now say they practically do not owe. Watson v. The Mid-Wales Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 593; 36 L. J. 285, C. P.; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 94, was relied on for the plaintiff, and certainly the reasoning of the judges seems in point for him. But the bond sued on was made before the contract out of which the set-off arose; but whether it was assigned, and notice of the assignment given to the defendants before the making of that contract, or only before the set-off became due, does not appear. According to the argument of the plaintiff's counsel the latter was the case. If so, the case is in point. Dickson v. The Swansea Vale Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 44; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 346; 30 L. J. 17, Q. B., seems also in point. On these authorities, and taking all the above matters into account, we hold that the defendants and Higgs contemplated and intended that Higgs should assign those debentures; that they cannot practically be so dealt with if subject to such equities as now set up; that consequently Higgs and the defendants contemplated and intended that Higgs should assign free from those equities; and that the defendants have dealt with Messrs. Cavendish and Smith on that footing. Holding this, and guiding ourselves as we best can by the cases cited, we think the plaintiff entitled to our judgment.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Aug. 3.

Brown v. Brown.

Testamentary suit—Examination of attesting witness de bene esse—20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 32—Practice.

The court has power to order the examination of a witness de bene esse pending suit; but in making the order it will be guided not by the consideration of the witness's age, but by the fact that his testimony is of so essential a nature as that the loss of his evidence by his death would be detrimental to the interests of the suitor.

The will of E. B. Brown was propounded by the plaintiffs, as executors; and the defendants, in opposition, pleaded that the will was not duly executed according to the statute, that the testator was not of sound mind at the time of execution, that he did not know and approve the contents, and that certain alterations appearing on the face of the will were not there at the time of its execution.

Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiffs, now moved the court to grant an order for the examination, de bene esse, of James Secker, the surviving attesting witness to the will. He read two affidavits, one stating that the witness was 65 years of age, and frequently suffered from ill-health; and the other from the plaintiffs' attorney stating that the plaintiff could not safely go to trial without the witness's evidence. He submitted that the court had the power to make the order under the 32nd section of the Probate Act, which conferred on it all the powers of the common law courts, and he referred to 1 Daniel's Chancery Practice, 851, 4th edit.

Bayford, contra.—To justify the order the witness must be in such a state of health as to make it impossible that he could attend at the trial: (See 1 Lush's Practice, 511.) One of the legatees was present at the time of the execution, and could give evidence of the circumstances if the attesting witness was not forthcoming. His cross-examination would disclose the defendant's case.

Lord Penzance.—The first question is whether the court has power to grant the application. I think it has. The 32nd sect. of the 20 and 21 Vict. c. 77, not merely confers upon the court this power, but it also in so many words confers upon the court all the powers given to the courts of common law at Westminster, by the 13 Geo. 3, c. 63, and 1 Will 4, c. 22. I am therefore clear that the court has the power. It is said that under the circumstances of the case the courts of common law would not grant a commission for the examination of the witness. But that is one of the misfortunes of their practice; because the Court of Chancery might in the meantime step in and grant the relief refused by the Court of Common Law; and nothing, I think, is of greater evil than that a suitor should be obliged to go from the court in which the suit is proceeding to some other court to get that relief which the court in which the suit has been instituted has the power of granting. I am satisfied that the Court of Probate has the power and ought to exercise it where the testimony of the witness is so material that its loss by his death would be a serious injury to the suit. It is said that the witness is under seventy years of age; but it is idle to draw a distinction whether he is sixty or seventy. The substance of the matter is this—is his testimony so pertinent to the point at issue as to make it of that valuable character that if it were lost the interests of the suitor would be seriously compromised? I think that is the only way in which the court can defendants, and was entered on the register, and received a certificate similar to that given to Cavendish. Defendants have paid interest on the debentures to Cavendish and Smith till 1st Jan. 1868. In Nov. and Dec. 1867 letters were written by the defendants' secretary to Cavendish and Smith acknowledging each of them to be the owners of the debentures respectively transferred to them soliciting further time for payment.

In Jan. 1868 the defendants proposed to accept, and accepted, from Cavendish and Smith, two of the said debentures so transferred to them in payment of an equal amount to that of the principal moneys in the said debentures due from each of them to the defendants for calls on the shares held by each of them in defendants' company.

Neither Cavendish nor Smith, when the debentures were transferred, had any notice that the defendants had or would claim any right of set-off or lien as against or on the said debentures, or any of them.

On the 23rd Feb. 1866, by a deed of mortgage between defendants of the one part, and the plaintiff of the other part, after reciting the original agreement for sale of the plaintiff's estates, and that plaintiff had requested defendants, in performance of the agreement for giving him a lien for unpaid purchase-money, to execute the mortgage thereinafter expressed for the benefit of himself and his assigns, the holders for the time being of the debentures, it was witnessed that the defendants granted the lands therein mentioned to plaintiff, with a proviso for redemption if defendant should pay the respective holders for the time being of the several debenture bonds so issued by defendants, the several sums of principal money secured thereby respectively, with the interest thereon respectively, at the rate thereon respectively specified at the several and respective times, and in the respective manner, by the said bond respectively provided.

The plaintiff, by deed dated 4th Oct. 1866, covenanted with defendants that he (the plaintiff), his executors, or administrators, would punctually pay the calls for the time being to be made on 2000 shares therein mentioned.

The following calls were afterwards duly made on the said shares, of which due notice was given: 16th July 1866, 1200*l.*; 16th July 1866, 800*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 600*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 400*l.*

Default was made in payment of these calls, and they still remained unpaid. The plaintiff at the time of the making of the calls hereinafter mentioned was registered owner of the shares on which they were made. Calls on (A) shares, 31st Aug. 1867, 692*l.* 10*s.*; 3rd Nov. 1867, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 28th Feb. 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 16th July, 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 1st May 1868, 817*l.* 10*s.*; 1st Aug., 817*l.* 10*s.* Calls on B shares, 16th July 1866, 1250*l.*; 31st Oct. 1867, 625*l.*

The said calls were duly made, and due notice given of them, and at the time of the commencement of the suit they were, and still were due and unpaid to the defendant.

It is obviously a purely equitable question, and our answer must be given with great distrust, the more so owing to the state of the authorities. The set-off is a set-off in law: have the defendants so contracted or conducted themselves that they cannot avail themselves of it? The equity, if any, of Messrs. Cavendish and Smith to restrain the set-off is an equity between them and the defendants. Then, we presume that if it should appear that these debentures were to be paid to assignees of them, without the right of set-off, still, if Higgs himself sued, a set-off would be available against him. But though it is an equity between the assignees of the debentures and the defendants it is an equity which may arise out of the original contract with Higgs, for if the contract with him was to pay his assignees without right of set-off, then the assignees would have an equity to prevent a set-off being enforced against him. Further, if whatever may have been the original contract with Higgs, the defendants have so conducted themselves to the assignees that it would be inequitable for the defendants to set up such a set-off, then also such equity exists in the assignees. We have to consider then whether by the original contract with Higgs, or by their subsequent dealing with Messrs. Cavendish and Smith, or by both combined, the defendants are precluded from defending themselves this set-off due from Higgs. In considering question it is impossible to doubt that both and the defendant contemplated that the [illegible] tures would be sold and assigned. apply the rule. This witness being an attesting witness, falls within the category I have named, and I think he should be examined. On the other side, the only real objection is, that they would disclose their case by his cross-examination. But that is the case in Chancery, where a bill of discovery is filed, and is the case at common law, where interrogatories are served. The notion that an advantage is to be gained by leaving a case in the dark is, I am happy to say, exploded in modern times. The advantage is, I think, the other way. I am, therefore, not at all pressed with the difficulty suggested on the part of the defendant, and shall make the order for the examination of the witness.

Testamentary paper contingent on option of executrix.

A testator made a codicil to his will which he directed should be added to his will or not at the option of his wife, his sole executrix. The wife desired to exercise her option of not recognising the validity of the codicil, and the court excluded it from probate.

The testator died June 3, 1861, leaving a will and codicil, dated April 24, 1844, and Feb. 21, 1860. On May 15, 1867 he executed a testamentary paper concluding in the following form: "I give my wife the option of adding this to my will or not as she may think necessary."

The widow was the sole executrix, and she was not desirous to add this codicil—which affected the interests of a son of the deceased—to the will.

Dr. Spinks accordingly now moved that probate be granted to the will and first codicil, excluding the third testamentary paper altogether. It was in the nature of a contingent codicil, and might be so treated.

Lord PENZANCE.—There is no doubt of this proposition, that the mere fact of a man having executed a paper in the form of a will, does not necessarily make that paper testamentary. There must be the animus testandi—a man must intend the paper to operate as a testamentary instrument to make it such. What the testator has here endeavoured to do is this: He has endeavoured to leave to his wife the right of saying whether this paper shall be testamentary or not. He has not said that its testamentary effect should depend on his disposition at the time he signed the paper, but on an event that should happen after his death, namely, the determination of his wife to treat it as testamentary, and it is the business of this court to carry out a man's intention so far as it can in law, and the only question in the case is whether there is anything illegal in the testator's object. It seems to me that there is not. It is quite true that a testator cannot confide to another person the right of making his will after his death, nor can he leave in the hands of another the power of revoking a paper which is testamentary at the time of his death, because the statute says the revocation must be done in his full sense, but I do not know of anything in the statute which would prevent a testator from saying that the question whether a paper shall be testamentary or not shall depend upon an event to happen after his death, and that event may be the assent of an individual. I have looked into the books for a case bearing on the point, and the only one I can find is Parsons v. Lance, 1 Ves. sen. 190; which, however, I think, is conclusive that such a thing can be done. I think in this case that the testator's object was lawful, and as the widow has exercised her option by refusing to recognise the validity of the second codicil, I shall therefore decree probate of the will and first codicil only.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (IRELAND).

(Reported by JOHN LEVY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.)

Tuesday, Aug. 31.

(Before MILLER, J.)

Re HORNER (a Bankrupt).

Debts contracted in England—Limited trading in Ireland—Petition to annul adjudication on the ground that there was no bonâ fide trading in Ireland.

Where an English trader contracts debts in England to a large amount, and then comes to Ireland, where he trades to a very limited extent as a commission agent, and has only one debt that could be properly called an Irish debt, and English creditors petition to annul the adjudication on the ground that there was no trading in Ireland, the Irish Bankruptcy Court will annul such adjudication with a view that the trader be remitted back to the jurisdiction where the debts were contracted.

This case came before the court upon a petition to annul the bankruptcy on the ground of there being no trading in Ireland, and that the bankruptcy was had recourse to for the benefit of the bankrupt himself, and not for creditors.

Dr. Leeds appeared for an English creditor in support of the petition. He cited the case of William Ansell Day, 7 Ir. Jur. 163 and 207.

John Harris, in support of the adjudication, contended that the case of Day did not apply to the present case.

MILLER, J., after referring to the facts of the case, said, after a full discussion, and a reference to Day's case, as reported in the 7th Irish Jurist, and afterwards decided by the Court of Appeal in Chancery: I will confine myself to two questions, first, whether a trading sufficient to maintain the present adjudication in bankruptcy had existed; secondly, if such a trading had been established, whether the petition as presented was a bonâ fide proceeding, and the adjudication founded on it such as this court, under all the circumstances of the case, could sustain. Upon all the facts of the case, I must come to the conclusion that the bankrupt did not carry on such trading in Ireland, as could fairly support the adjudication. And, as to the second question, viz., was the petition presented for the legitimate purposes of a bankruptcy, or for the bankrupt's own advantage? I must come to the conclusion that it was presented for the latter purpose. The petition for annulling this adjudication was presented on the 7th Aug. 1869, and it contains the specific charge that the proceedings were instituted fraudulently, or in collusion with the bankrupt, and for his benefit, and not for the benefit of creditors, and there was no denial of the charge. I have, therefore, no more difficulty on the second question than on the first, and without prolonging the case further, I will say that the bankruptcy must be annulled, and let the trader go back to where the debts were contracted.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Ex parte PRANCE; Re KEMP.

Bankruptcy—Solicitor to creditors' assignee—Money in his hands belonging to the bankrupt's estate—Order that he should pay it over—Whether such an order can be made ex parte.

P. was solicitor to the creditors' assignee of K.'s estate. The assignee was afterwards removed from his office, but some money, forming part of the bankrupt's estate, which had been received by P., remained in his hands, and he claimed to retain it for costs and expenses incurred by him.

He admitted, in an examination to which he voluntarily submitted, without having been summoned to attend, that he had received the moneys in question, and that he claimed to retain them. In a private conversation between P. and the commissioner, the latter said that, if P. would not pay over the money, he should have to make an order upon him to do so.

The money not having been paid, the commissioner, without any notice to P., made an order that he should pay over the money within seven days from the date of the order.

On appeal,

Held, that this order ought not to have been made ex parte.

The order was accordingly discharged.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Commissioner in Bankruptcy at Exeter, the appellant being Mr. Vaughan Prance, a London solicitor, who had acted as solicitor to the creditors' assignee in the bankruptcy of one James Kemp. The bankrupt was a miller and corndealer of Exwick Mills, near Exeter, and was adjudicated bankrupt in the Exeter Court on the 4th Feb. 1869. Michael Schandorf was appointed creditors' assignee, and while he continued to fill that office, Mr. Prance acted as his solicitor in the bankruptcy. Schandorf was on the 24th May 1869, removed from the office of creditors' assignee, and the winding-up and administration of the estate was therefore intrusted to Mr. Theophilus Carrick, the official assignee of the court, alone. After this Prance was employed by a firm of Forbes and Co., of Glasgow, as their solicitor, they having a large claim upon the estate of Kemp, and on the 17th June 1869, he was attending the Exeter Court of Bankruptcy upon the business of his clients. He had not been summoned then for examination with regard to his dealings with the estate, or for any other purpose, but while he was there he was asked to be examined with regard to his receipts. He then stated that he had received and retained in his hands the sum of 140*l.*, which had arisen from the sale of some leasehold property of the bankrupt, and also various sums from debtors to the estate, but of which he could not state the exact amount. On the 5th July 1869 he was again at the Exeter Court on the business of Forbes and Co., without any summons to attend, and he again, on being requested to do so, submitted to be examined by the commissioner, and upon examination he stated that he had received the sum of 128*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* from debtors to Kemp's estate, which sum, as well as the 140*l.*, he had kept in his possession. On the 10th July 1869 Prance, being again in attendance at the court on behalf of Forbes and Co., was requested to go into the commissioner's private room, and the commissioner then asked him whether he would undertake to pay over the 268*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* which he had admitted that he had in his hands rom Kemp's estate. Prance alleged that he had spent out of pocket, and was entitled to be allowed for costs, a sum exceeding what he had received on account of the estate, and consequently he declined to give the undertaking. The commissioner then said that he should be obliged to make an order on Mr. Prance, and he told the commissioner that he must take what course he pleased. Mr. Prance heard nothing further about the matter, and no notice was given to him of any intention to apply for an order that he should pay over the money. On the 28th July an order was made by the commissioner, which, after reciting (inter alia) the examinations of Mr. Prance, proceeded—"Whereas the court thereupon required the said Vaughan Prance to pay over to the said Theophilus Carrick, the official assignee appointed as aforesaid, the said sum of 268*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, but the said Vaughan Prance required first to be allowed to deduct therefrom certain payments alleged to have been made, and costs incurred on account of the said bankrupt's estate. And whereas it is this day reported to me by the said official assignee that the said Vaughan Prance has not paid into his hands the said sum of 268*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*" And the order went on to direct that Prance should within seven days from the date thereof pay into the hands of the official assignee the said sum of 268*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* This order was not served upon Mr. Prance until the 3rd Aug, 1869. and from it he appealed. He alleged that he had paid out of pocket on behalf of the estate of Kemp sums amounting in the whole to 100*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, and that costs, amounting in the whole to 327*l.* 5*s.*, were also due to him for business done by him for the official assignee.

De Gex, Q. C. and Bagley, on behalf of the appellant, contended that the order was one which ought not to have been made ex parte; it ought not to have been made except upon notice. They referred to Rule 17 of the Orders of 19th Oct. 1852.

Little, Q. C. and Doria, on behalf of the official assignee, urged that justice imperatively required the making of the order. The appellant was an officer of the court, and there was a summons pending over him. He must be taken to know that it was the duty of the assignee to pay all moneys received by him on behalf of the estate into the bank at once: (The Bankruptcy Act 1861, sects. 127, 128, 174, 175) The appellant had, therefore, no right to keep this money, and according to the rules of the court he had no power to retain money for his costs:

Orders of 19th Oct. 1852, rules 65, 114.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that the order appealed from was one which, in his opinion, could not be supported. Upon the evidence it must be taken to have been made ex parte, and Mr. Prance had a right to say that no such order ought to be made upon him without his being heard in his defence. A solicitor of the court had the same right in this respect as any other subject of Her Majesty. The order must be discharged, but without prejudice to any other similar application being made to the commissioner upon notice to Mr. Prance. The deposit would be returned.

Bankruptcy—Conditional order of discharge—Discretion of court—Right of bankrupt to unconditional discharge where he has not been guilty of any of the offences mentioned in the B. A. 1861, sect. 159.

A bankrupt who has not been guilty of the offences mentioned in the B. A. 1861, sect. 159, is entitled to an unconditional discharge, there being no general discretion reposed by that Act in the court to refuse or suspend, or make conditional, an order of discharge, save for some of the reasons mentioned in sect. 159.

Where a bankrupt was a co-respondent to a suit in the Divorce Court, which he did not defend, and damages and costs were ordered to be paid by him, it was Held, that those damages and costs could not be said to have been a debt contracted by him.

Observations upon Re Boswall, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407, and Re Mew and Thorne, 31 L. J. 87, Bank.

This was an appeal by John Clayton, a bankrupt, from an order made on the 28th July 1869, by the judge of the Cheshire County Court, granting to the bankrupt a conditional order of discharge. The bankrupt sought to have his order of discharge made unconditional.

The bankrupt was the son of a small farmer, by whom he was employed as a farm labourer, at wages amounting to about 12*s.* a week. His father had also made over to him, subject to his own life interest, a share in some freehold property. This share or interest the bankrupt estimated as being worth 240*l.*, and in March 1868 he mortgaged it for that sum On the 12th March 1867 a petition was filed in the Divorce Court by one Chas. Dale, a gardener, for the dissolution of his marriage with his wife, upon the alleged ground that she had committed adultery with Clayton. To this petition Clayton was made a co-respondent, and damages were sought to be recovered from him. The petition was heard on the 21st Feb. 1868, and Clayton did not appear, but allowed judgment to go against him by default. A decree nisi was made for the dissolution of the marriage, and it was further ordered that Clayton should pay to Dale 50*l.* damages and costs. The decree in due course became absolute. The costs were taxed at 104*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*, and on the 4th May 1869 an order was made that Clayton should pay the sum of 154*l.* 10*s* 6*d.*

On the 10th May 1869 Clayton petitioned the County Court for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself, and he was adjudicated a bankrupt accordingly. The accounts filed by the bankrupt showed that, besides the above-mentioned secured debt of 240*l.*, he owed only a sum of 30*l.*, which was described as for money lent upon an I. O. U. It appeared also that during the year preceding the bankruptcy the bankrupt had expended 200*l.* On the bankrupt making application for his order of discharge, the granting of it was opposed by Dale, and it was alleged in opposition that the bankrupt had vexatiously defended the suit in the Divorce Court, and thus brought himself within sect. 159. clause 3, of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which provides that the court may either refuse an order of discharge, or may suspend the same from taking effect for such time as the court may think fit, or may grant an order of discharge subject to any condition or conditions touching any salary, pay, emoluments, profits, wages, earnings, or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt. where (among other cases) the bankrupt has put any of his creditors to unnecessary expense by frivolous or vexatious defence to any action or suit to recover any debt or money due from him.

The judge, however, held that, as the bankrupt had not defended the suit, he could not be said to have been within the above-mentioned provision, and his Honour was also of opinion that he had in no other way brought himself within the provisions of sect. 159. But his Honour thought that the court had a general discretion as to granting an order of discharge, and that it might, if of opinion that the bankrupt's conduct had been improper, refuse to grant an order of discharge, or make only a conditional order of discharge. His Honour relied upon the opinion of Turner, L. J., as expressed in Re Boswall, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407, notwithstanding the fact that in the same case Knight Bruce, L. J. expressed a contrary opinion. His Honour accordingly granted the bankrupt an order of discharge subject to the condition that he should pay 1*l.* per month out of his wages, earnings, or income, or out of any property to which he might become entitled. From this order the bankrupt appealed.

W. P. Macdonald (of the Common Law Bar), on behalf of the appellant, contended that unless the judge found as a fact that there existed any of the grounds mentioned in sect. 159 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, for refusing, suspending, or qualifying the order of discharge, the bankrupt was entitled to an unconditional order of discharge. The opinion of Turner, L. J. in Re Boswall (ubi sup.) was disapproved afterwards by Lord Westbury in Re Mew and Thorne, 31 L. J. 87, Bank., and the latter case must be taken to have settled the interpretation of the Act.

De Gex, Q. C. contra, urged that as the damages and costs in question were proveable in, and would be barred by the bankruptcy, it was reasonable that the way in which they had been incurred should be taken into consideration in granting an order of discharge. Another reason for making an order of discharge conditional, as mentioned in sect. 159, was that the bankrupt could not have had, at the time when any of his debts were contracted, any reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay the same. The word "contracted" did not necessarily include only a debt arising out of a contract, but would include any debt. The damages and costs now in question were a debt, and it might be said that the bankrupt when he incurred this liability had, looking at his means, no reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to discharge it, and the judge's order might be supported in that way. Moreover, under sects. 201 and 256 of the Act of 1849, which were analogous to sect. 159 of the Act of 1861, it was always considered that the court had a discretion to refuse to grant a certificate in cases not specified in the Act. He referred to

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said, that if the opinion of Lord Westbury expressed in Re Mew and Thorne had been present to the mind of the learned judge, it was clear that he would have come to a different conclusion. But the only case before him was that of Re Boswall, in which the opinion of Turner, L. J., differed from that of Knight Bruce, L. J. This court could not overrule a decision of the Lord Chancellor even if of a different opinion, but in fact his Lordship entirely agreed with the opinion of Lord Westbury, and, for the reasons given by him, was of opinion that sect. 159 made it imperative to grant an unconditional order of discharge, when none of the reasons mentioned in that section for not doing so existed. The only question, therefore, was whether any of those reasons existed in the present case. This court had to administer the law, not to make it, whatever might be its opinion as to the justice of the bankrupt's being able to escape from the payment of these damages. They could not be properly described as a debt contracted, and there being (besides the debt of 30*l.*) no other debt proved in the bankruptcy, it could not be said that the bankrupt had contracted debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay them. There was nothing to show that he had committed any other of the offences mentioned in sect. 159. He must have an unconditional order of discharge.

Re THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE; Ex parte PADWICK.

Judgment-creditor—Equitable estate for life in leaseholds—Petition for sale under 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, s. 4—"Actually delivered in execution."

A judgment-creditor issued a writ of fi. fa. in execution of his judgment, and lodged it with the sheriff, who, in obedience to the writ, took possession of a leasehold house in which his debtor had an equitable estate for life, and seized certain goods and chattels in the house.

On a petition under the 4th section of 27 and 28 Vict. c. 112, for an order for the sale of the debtor's equitable estate for life in the house:

Held, that no order could be made on the petition, as the judgment-creditor had not acquired a charge on the land under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, and the debtor's equitable estate for life was incapable of being "actually delivered in execution" as required by the Act.

This was a petition by Mr. Henry Padwick, a judgment-creditor of the Duke of Newcastle, for an order for the sale of the life interest of the Duke of Newcastle in the family mansion in Carlton House-terrace. The petition was presented under the 4th section of the Law of Judgments Amendment Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), by which every creditor to whom any land of his debtor shall have been "actually delivered in execution, and whose writ or other process of execution shall have been actually registered," is entitled to obtain from the Court of Chancery, upon petition in a summary way, an order for the sale of his debtor's interest in such land.

By the late duke's will the mansion house was vested in trustees upon trust that they should offer the use and occupation thereof to his son during his life, upon condition that he, during his life, should pay the rent and observe and perform all the covenants and conditions to be observed and performed by the tenant and lessee of the house.

Mr. Padwick was a judgment-creditor of the Duke for 95,000*l.* He had issued a writ of fieri facias in execution of his judgment, and lodged it with the sheriff, who in obedience thereto took possession of the mansion house, and seized certain goods and chattels in the house. There remained due in respect of the judgment nearly 90,000*l.*

The writ was duly registered on the 1st July 1869, in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Charles Hall and D. Jones, in support of the petition, submitted that Mr. Padwick had done all that was possible to entitle him to the assistance of the court, and that he was entitled to an order for the sale of the Duke's interest in the house. Some meaning must be given to the words, "actually delivered in execution," applicable to incorporeal hereditaments which were included in the 2nd section of the Act. They cited Jessel, Q. C. and Vaughan Hawkins, for the trustees of the will, contended that a mere equitable interest in a term of years not being capable of being taken in execution, and the 4th section of the Act requiring the land to be "actually delivered in execution" before the court ordered a sale, the court could not order a sale in the present case. Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Bedwell appeared for the Duke of Newcastle.

Charles Hall replied.

Aug. 6.—Lord ROMILLY.—In this case, Mr. Padwick, an execution-creditor of the Duke of Newcastle, applied by petition under the statute 27 & 28 Vict., for an order to sell the interest of the duke in the house in Carlton House-terrace. The first question is what is the interest of the duke in this house? The trust contained in the will of the late duke is this: the testator bequeaths his mansion house in Carlton House-terrace to the trustees on trust that they shall complete the mansion house and so on, and then upon further trust that they "shall offer the use and occupation of the same mansion house, stable, coach house, and premises, to my son, the Earl of Lincoln, during his life, upon condition that he, during his life, pays the rent and observes and performs all the covenants and conditions to be paid, observed, and performed by the tenant or lessee of the same premises; but if my said son shall refuse such offer," then it goes over in a different direction. I expressed at the time when this came before me that the present duke having accepted these conditions, I was of opinion that he had an equitable estate for life in the mansion house for the residue of the term, and that being so, the question, which is the real question, arises; does the statute give this court the power of selling that interest? This requires some review of the law on this subject as affected by modern statutes. I think it is convenient, if the Bar will excuse it, to read the clauses of the 1st and 2nd of the Queen (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110). According to the law as it stood before the statute of the 27th and 28th of the Queen (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), the sheriff, under the 11th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, was enabled "to make and deliver execution of all such lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, advowsons, rents, and hereditaments, including lands and hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure, as the person against whom execution is so sued, or any person in trust for him, shall have been seised or possessed of at the time of entering up the said judgment, or at any time afterwards, or over which such person shall at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might without the assent of any other person exercise for his own benefit, in like manner as the sheriff or other officer may now make and deliver execution of one moiety of the lands and tenements of any person against whom a writ of elegit is sued out; which lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, rents, and hereditaments by force or virtue of such execution, shall accordingly be held and enjoyed by the party to whom such execution shall be so made and delivered, subject to such account in the court out of which such execution shall have been sued out, as a tenant by elegit is now subject to in a court of equity." Then under the 13th sect. of the same Act, a judgment is to "operate as a charge upon all lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments (including lands and hereditaments of copyhold or customary tenure) of or to which such person shall at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, be seized, possessed, or entitled for any estate or interest whatever, at law or in equity whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or over which such person shall at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might, without the assent of any other person exercise for his own benefit, and shall be binding as against the person against whom judgment shall be so entered up, and against all persons claiming under him after such judgment, and shall also be binding as against the issue of his body and all other persons whom he might, without the assent of any other person, cut off and debar from any remainder, reversion, or other interest, in or out of any of the said lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments." Now the words of the 11th section, except so far as relates to copyholds and lands over which the debtor has a disposing power, follow those of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), and must be considered to be governed by the construction put upon the Statute of Frauds. The words of the 13th section, on the other hand, are wider and more general, and include many estates and interests which are not comprised in the 11th section. In this state of things the statute of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, was passed, and by the 4th section a new summary remedy is conferred upon certain creditors; it is enacted that "every creditor to whom any land of his debtor shall have been actually delivered in execution and whose writ or other process of execution shall have been actually registered, shall be entitled forthwith, or at any time afterwards while the registry of such writ or process shall continue in force, to obtain from the Court of Chancery upon petition in a summary way an order for the sale of his debtor's interest in such lands," &c. Now the words are precise. The lands must be actually delivered. The Legislature must be taken to have known that many interests in real property may be affected by judgments under the Act of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, which cannot be delivered in execution under the 11th section, but notwithstanding this, the Legislature has distinctly limited the power given by the 4th section of this Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 112), to creditors to whom land shall have been actually delivered in execution, and whose writ of execution shall have been duly registered. I do not think that it is in the power of the court to exempt a creditor seeking to exercise the power conferred by the statute from observing the formalities which are expressly enjoined by such statute, and certainly I cannot consider that these formalities have been observed in the present case. A strict construction of the words "actually delivered in execution" in other parts of the Act raises certain doubts whether the 13th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 has not been repealed, or, if not, how far it is reconcileable with the provisions of the statute of the 27 & 28 Vict. And it is also to be observed that the 5th section of the latter Act speaks of charges under other judgments, suits, or recognisances, which, however, could not, under this construction of the Act of the 27 & 28 Vict., ever become charges. That section, however, may possibly be intended to apply to judgments which had become charges on real estate before the passing of the Act, and it might also be possible that the Legislature intended thenceforth to put a construction upon the words "actually delivered in execution" more in accordance with the continuing power of the 13th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. which has not been done, but as the words now stand, looking at it in every way I can, I do not think that any construction would be legitimate which would make these words requiring the land to be actually delivered in execution, and the writ of execution to be registered, to mean nothing more than what has been done in this case, namely, the mere suing out of a fieri facias. It is proper, however, that I should state that I do not see in the view I take of the case how the petitioner could have taken any steps that would have enabled him to claim the assistance of this court under the stat. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112. If he had sued out a writ of elegit he would simply have had a return of nil; and the present application is met by the insuperable difficulty that the property must be actually delivered, which, in this case, has not been done, and cannot be done. What the intention of the Legislature was in introducing these words, and making the actual delivery a condition precedent to the order for sale taking effect it is impossible for me to surmise, unless indeed it was confined to the avoidance of the expenses occasioned by the necessity of making all the judgment-creditors parties to a bill of foreclosure, but admitting this to have been, and though I do not believe that the object of the Legislature was to restrict the means of obtaining payment of their debts by judgment-creditors, it is obvious that, if my view is correct the effect of the statute is rather to restrict than advance the remedies of the judgment creditor. I do not think that the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, has any application to this case. I do not express any opinion whether, under any equitable doctrine such as that laid down by Lord Redesdale (O'Fallon v. Dillon, 2 Sch. & Lef. 19) equity would assist the judgment-creditor to enable him to acquire the possession of the house itself. My judgment is founded on this: in the first place the petitioner has no charge upon the land under the 13th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and, therefore, cannot, on the statute, come here and ask the court to sell; and, in the second place, as the judgment-creditor cannot take an equitable leasehold in execution under a fi. fa., he cannot under that Act get actual possession of the land; and not having done so, he cannot, by petition, call upon this court to sell the interest of the Duke. Both the cases in the matter of the Cowbridge Railway Company before the present Lord Chancellor and the Lord Justice Giffard, confirm this view of the case, and I shall make no order on this petition.

Re THE JOINT-STOCK DISCOUNT COMPANY;

Ex parte THE WARRANT FINANCE COMPANY.

Company—Winding-up—Double proof—Interest after full payment of debt.

The holders of bills of exchange accepted by one company and indorsed by another company (both of which companies were afterwards ordered to be wound-up), proved against both companies for the amount due on the bills for prinxcipal and interest up to the date of the winding-up order, and received dividends on the estates of both companies, amounting together to 20s. in the pound on the amount of their proof:

Held, that they were not entitled to continue to receive dividends in respect of interest which had accrued due after the date of the winding-up order; but that they must be excluded from further dividends till all the other creditors had been paid the amount of their proofs in full.

Re The Humber Iron Works Company, ex parte The Warrant Finance Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859, followed.

This was a motion on the part of the official liquidator of the Joint Stock Discount Company, that the Warrant Finance Company might be excluded from participating in any further dividend on the estate of the Joint-Stock Discount Company until all the other creditors of the company had received 20*s.* in the pound on the amount of their proofs.

The Warrant Finance Company were the holders of certain bills of exchange, drawn upon and accepted by the Contract Corporation (which was also being wound-up), and indorsed by the Joint-Stock Discount Company. They had proved for the amount of principal and interest due on the bills at the commencement of the winding-up against the Contract Corporation and the Joint-Stock Discount Company, and had received dividends from both companies, those from the Contract Corporation amounting to 4*s.* 6*d.* in the pound on the amount of their proof and those from the Joint-Stock Discount Company amounting to 15*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, so that the amount of the principal debt, together with interest up to the date of the winding-up order had been paid in full.

The question was whether the Warrant Finance Company were entitled to continue participating in the dividends till they had received the interest which had accrued due subsequently to the date of the winding-up order, or were to be excluded from further participation till all other creditors had been paid 20*s.* on the amount of their debts.

Jessel, Q. C., and Locock Webb, in support of the application, submitted that the question was settled by the decision of the Lords Justices in Re The Humber Iron Works Company, ex parte The Warrant Finance Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. They claimed to be entitled to receive dividends till they had been paid the full amount of both principal and interest, because this was the case of a creditor having security for his debt, and who could therefore take interest only out of his security, and proceed against his debtor for the principal. Bower v. Marris, Cr. & Phil. 351.

Lord ROMILLY, without calling for a reply, said:—This case seems to me to be governed by the decision of the Lords Justices in Re The Humber Ironworks Company (sup.). I need not enter into the niceties relating to double recourse and double proof. The Lords Justices have laid down the rule that interest stops at the date of the winding-up order, until all the principal and interest then due has been paid on all debts proved. Therefore the Warrant Finance Company cannot continue to receive dividends in respect of interest which accrued due after the date of the winding-up order. If the estate ultimately pays all the debts in full, then the Warrant Finance Company will be entitled to be paid the subsequent interest, but the question does not arise in the case of a solvent estate. This case is governed by the decision of the Lords Justices. It may be said that is judge made law, and no doubt it is; it is necessarily judge made law. The rule there laid down is that the tree must lie as it falls. You prove for the amount due for principal and interest at the date of the winding-up; you have received the amount of your proof in full, and you cannot receive any more dividends until all the other creditors have been paid the amount of their proofs in full. The order will be that the Warrant Finance Company be excluded from further participating in dividends until all the other creditors of the Joint-Stock Discount Company have been paid the amount of their proofs in full. The costs of both parties will come out of the estate.

Re HORSLEY AND KNIGHTON'S PATENT.

Patent—Assignment—Register of proprietors—Entry in register—Expunging entry—Patent Law Amendment Act 1852, ss. 35, 38.

A patent for certain improvements had been granted to H. and K., their executors, administrators, and assigns. K. sold his share of the patent, and in the deed of assignment purported to release the purchaser, his heirs, executors, &c., from all actions and suits by himself and H. The deed of assignment was entered verbatim in the register of proprietors at the patent office.

On a motion by H. under the 38th section of the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852:

Held, that he was entitled to have the whole deed expunged from the register.

Order accordingly.

This was a motion on the part of T. Horsley, under the 38th section of the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), that an entry made under colour of the provisions of that Act in the register of proprietors kept at the patent office might be expunged, vacated or varied.

A patent for improvement in core bars, dated 8th Nov. 1866, had been granted to T. Horsley and G. Knighton, their executors, administrators, and assigns. By an indenture dated the 24th Dec. 1868, and made between G. Knighton of the one part, and

Digitized by Google

T. H. Oakes of the other part, Knighton assigned to T. H. Oakes his estate and interest in the patent, and entered into the usual covenants for title; in the concluding portion of the deed Knighton purported to release Oakes, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns from all incumbrances, actions, suits, causes of action or suit, claims or demands whatsoever, which they the said G. Knighton and T. Horsley, or either of them, or their or either of their executors or administrators had, or but for this deed might have had, against Oakes, his heirs, executors, or administrators, for or by reason or on account of the letters patent, or the invention, the subject thereof, or any matter or thing in anywise relating thereto. This deed was entered in the register of proprietors, in accordance with the 35th section of the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852; the entry consisted of a copy of the deed in extenso.

The 35th section of the Patent Law Amendment Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83) provides that there shall be kept at the office appointed for filing specifications in Chancery under the Act, a book entitled "The Register of Proprietors," wherein shall be entered, in such manner as the commissioners shall direct, the assignment of any letters patent, or of any share or interest therein, &c. And the section goes on to provide that "a copy of any entry in such book, certified under such seal as may have been appointed or as may be directed by the Lord Chancellor to be used in the said office, shall be given to any person requiring the same, on payment of the fees hereinafter provided; and such copies so certified shall be received in evidence in all courts and in all proceedings, and shall be primâ facie proof of the assignment of such letters patent, or share or interest therein, or of the licence or proprietorship as therein expressed," &c.

If any person shall deem himself aggrieved by any entry made under colour of this Act in the said register of proprietors, it shall be lawful for such person to apply, by motion, to the Master of the Rolls, or to any of the courts of common law at Westminster in term time, or by summons to a judge of any of the said courts in vacation, for an order that such entry may be expunged, vacated, or varied; and upon any such application the Master of the Rolls, or such court or judge respectively, may make such order for expunging, vacating, or varying such entry, and as to the costs of such application, as to the said Master of the Rolls or to such court or judge may seem fit; and the officer having the care and custody of such register, on the production to him of any such order for expunging, vacating, or varying any such entry, shall expunge, vacate, or vary the same, according to the requisitions of such order.

Jessel, Q. C. and Rodwell, and T. Aston (of the common law bar), in support of the motion, submitted that at least so much of the deed as related to the release should be expunged, as it might be very prejudicial to the rights of Horsley against Oakes, the 35th section of the Act rendering copies of the entry primâ facie proof of the assignment, &c. They cited

Mathers v. Green, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420; L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 29.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Cracknall, for Knighton and Oakes, contended that one of two joint owners of a patent was entitled to give such a release as that contained in the deed; that the deed was correctly entered, and that it was only in case of fraud that the court ordered entries to be expunged. They cited

Re Green's Patent, 24 Beav. 145.

Lord ROMILLY. — It is quite clear that Mr. Horsley is entitled to come here and have this entry altered. Where A. and B. are patentees, both may use the patent, but B. cannot dispose of A.'s share. In the present case Oakes has infringed the patent of Horsley and Knighton; Knighton then assigns it to Oakes, and in the deed of assignment gives a release of Horsley's claims. I cannot alter the entry by striking out the latter part of the deed. I must strike out the whole deed, and Oakes and Knighton must pay the costs of the motion.

Power of appointment—Execution in fraud of power—Deed of confirmation—Suit to set aside—Lapse of time.

Mr. and Mrs. P., who had under their marriage settlement a power of appointment over a certain fund in favour of such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children of the marriage as they should jointly by deed, &c., appoint, made certain appointments nominally in favour of objects of the power, but in reality for their own benefit. By a deed, to which all the children of the marriage were parties, and which they all executed, these appointments were subsequently ratified and confirmed.

On a bill by C. P., a child of the marriage who had not attained his majority at the date of the deed of confirmation, but had executed the deed some months after he came of age, to set aside the appointments and the deed of confirmation:

Held, that the appointments were not ipso facto void, but only voidable, and that C. P. having deliberately executed the deed of confirmation could not now after the lapse of nearly seven years rip open the transaction.

Bill accordingly dismissed.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 24th April 1818, and executed in contemplation of a marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnised between Christopher Richard Preston and Elizabeth Mary Hillary, four sums of money, amounting in the whole to about 14,000*l.*, were assigned to Messrs. Disney and Fortescue, upon trust for the benefit of the husband and wife during their joint lives and the life of the survivor, in manner therein mentioned, and immediately after the death of the survivor in trust for all and every the children of the marriage (other than and except an eldest or only son for the time being entitled to certain lands and hereditaments therein mentioned, and late the property of Richard Preston, deceased), or for such one or more of them exclusively of the others or other, to be vested in and payable at such times and in such shares and proportions, and subject to such conditions and limitations as the husband and wife at any time or times during their joint lives, by any deed or instrument in writing, with or without power of revocation, to be sealed and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, or as the survivor should by like deed or instrument, or by last will and testament direct or appoint; and in default of any such appointment for all the children of the marriage (except such eldest or only son as aforesaid), and their respective executors, administrators, and assigns, in equal shares. And in the indenture of settlement was contained a clause directing any child who took a part of the unappointed fund to bring into hotchpot any portion taken by way of appointment.

The issue of the marriage were twelve children.

Richard the eldest child died shortly after his birth, and Richard Christopher the second son on birth became the eldest son, according to the provisions of and the exception contained in the settlement, and the ten younger children became the objects of the power of appointment of the 14,000*l.*

On the marriage of Frances Elizabeth, the eldest of the ten younger children with a Mr. Bonham in Aug. 1845, Mr. and Mrs. Preston, by a deed poll bearing date the 1st Aug. 1845, appointed one-tenth part of the trust fund to the said Frances Elizabeth her executors, administrators, and assigns, and on the following day a settlement of this money was executed in favour of Mr. and Mrs. Bonham and their children.

By a second deed poll bearing date the 8th Jan. 1846, Mr. and Mrs. Preston appointed four-tenth parts of the trust fund to Augustus Richard Preston (the second of the ten younger children), his executors, administrators, and assigns.

On the 28th of the same month of January, Augustus Richard Preston assigned the four-tenths, so appointed to him, to George Tyrrell, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to secure the repayment of 700*l.* and interest.

On the 20th Aug. 1849, Mr. and Mrs. Preston appointed another one-tenth part of the trust fund to Mary Anne, another daughter of the marriage.

On the 12th Dec. 1849, they appointed another tenth-part of the trust fund to their daughter Elmira on her marriage with a Mr. Hand.

On the 25th March 1852, they appointed another tenth-part of the trust fund to John Richard Preston, another son of the marriage; and on the 8th Dec. 1852, they appointed the remaining two-tenth parts of the trust fund to Mary Anne, the daughter to whom they had already in Aug. 1849, appointed one-tenth.

On the following day (9th Dec. 1852) Mary Anne Preston assigned these two-tenths to Henry Wm. Goulding, his executors, administrators, and assigns to secure the repayment of 850*l.* and interest.

The object of the present suit was to set aside the appointment of the four-tenths to Augustus, and the two-tenths to Mary Ann, on the ground that they were made, in fraud of the power, for the benefit of the father, and not for the benefit of the appointed.

Mary Ann Preston married a Mr. Dewick in 1853, and in the following September Mrs. Preston, the mother, died.

By an indenture dated the 31st Dec. 1853, two of the four-tenths of the trust-fund, which had been appointed to Augustus in Jan. 1846, and the two-tenths, which had been appointed to Mary Ann, were assigned to Timothy Tyrrel, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the mortgages of Jan. 1846 and Dec. 1852, upon trust to sell and to apply the proceeds, subject to the said mortgages, for the four younger children of the marriage (to whom no appointment had been made), in equal shares as tenants in common.

By an indenture dated the 1st Jan. 1854, and made between the ten younger children of Mr. and Mrs. Preston and the husbands of the married daughters of the first ten parts, and Mr. Preston, the father, of the eleventh part, after reciting the above-mentioned six deeds of appointment and the death of Mrs. Preston, it was declared that all the persons of the first ten parts were satisfied with the appointments made and therein recited, and by this indenture they and every one of them did confirm, ratify, and establish the appointments therein recited. And it was thereby agreed and declared that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of the trust-fund according to the said six appointments; and Christopher Richard Preston, the father, did thereby release unto the parties of the first ten parts the power of appointment vested in him as the survivor of his wife.

This deed of confirmation was executed by all the parties. The three youngest children, Edward Hillary, Sophia Isabella, and Charles Ernest, the plaintiff, were infants at the date of the deed, and they all executed it on attaining their majority. The plaintiff came of age on the 30th Aug. 1860, and executed the deed in the following October.

The six-tenths of the trust-fund, the appointments of which were sought to be set aside, were disposed of thus: Of the four-tenths assigned to Timothy Tyrell in Dec. 1853, two-tenths were sold to the Law Reversionary Interest Society, on the 6th June 1854 for 1466*l.*, and two-tenths were sold for 1400*l.* to the National Reversionary Interest Society, and the proceeds, after payment of the mortgage-debts, were divided amongst the four youngest children of the marriage, to whom no appointment had been made.

On the 10th June 1854 the remaining two-tenths were assigned to Timothy Tyrell, on the trusts of the indenture of Dec. 1853.

In 1853 Messrs. Longbourne and Vickerman were appointed trustees of the original settlement of 1818, in the place of Messrs. Disney and Fortescue.

By an indenture dated the 18th Jan. 1861, and executed by the plaintiff, the two-tenths of the trust-fund remaining in Timothy Tyrell were assigned to Longbourne and Vickerman, upon certain trusts in favour of the four youngest children of the marriage, and at the same time the plaintiff signed an account showing the dealings with the four shares.

Christopher Richard Preston, the father, died in Feb. 1861.

On the 19th April 1861 the plaintiff assigned his one-fourth part of the two-tenths to trustees to raise a sum of 600*l.*, and on the 23rd May following he assigned this fourth part to Stephen Moore absolutely, subject to the indenture of 19th April 1861.

The plaintiff now filed his bill to set aside the appointments of Jan. 1846 and Dec. 1852, and also the deed of confirmation of 1854, which he alleged that he had executed in ignorance of the fraudulent nature of the appointments.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Jason Smith, for the plaintiff, submitted that it was clear that the appointments of Jan. 1846 and Dec. 1852 had been made in fraud of the power for the benefit of the appointors, and that the purchasers (the Reversionary Societies) could not be in a better position than the persons in whose favour the appointments were made. These appointments were void, at least in so far as they were made for the benefit of the appointors:

Lord v. Colvin, 3 Dr. 222;
Sturgis v. Morse, 26 Beav. 562;
Powys v. Blagrave, 2 W. R. 289.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Blackmore, for Augustus Preston, contended that if the appointment to him was originally voidable, the plaintiff could not now set it aside after having deliberately ratified it nearly seven years ago.

Southgate, Q. C. and Bristowe, for the Law Reversionary Society, contended that the appointments could not be set aside as against the society who were purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. Ranking v. Barnes (sup.) was not an authority applicable to the present case; there the appointment was merely for the benefit of a stranger. They cited

Stroud v. Norman, Kay, 313.

W. Pearson, Harrison Dalton, and T. A. Roberts appeared for the other defendants.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. in reply, contended that the deed of confirmation did not render the appointments valid; the deed of confirmation ought to have set out the reason why the matter to be confirmed was considered invalid. He cited Wellesley v. The Earl of Mornington, 2 K. & J. 143.

Aug. 6.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit praying for the delivery up and cancellation of certain deeds of appointment executed on the 8th Jan. 1846, and the 8th Dec. 1852, on the ground that they were in fraud of the power enabling the appointments to be made. In order to explain this matter, it is necessary to examine the facts which raise the question, and to explain the grounds of my decision. [His Lordship stated the settlement, the six deeds of appointment and the two mortgages, and continued:] As regards the application of the money raised by the two mortgages, I think it is proved that out of the 700*l.* raised in Jan. 1846, 100*l.* was paid to Augustus, 435*l.* was applied for the advancement of William Richard Preston, another younger son of the marriage, but whose name does not appear in the deed of appointment, and that the remainder, amounting to 165*l.*, was retained by the father. It is also proved that the whole of the 850*l.* raised in Dec. 1852, was paid to or for the benefit of the father and mother. If the matter rested here there could, I think, be no doubt that the two appointments were bad and invalid as being in fraud of the power, and exercised in some measure for the benefit of the father, and not for the benefit of the appointees. That the money was applied as I have stated is, I think, established by the evidence consisting principally of the letters proved in the cause, and the dates of the appointments show that they were made in order to raise the money which was raised immediately after the execution of the deeds of appointment. [His Lordship stated the subsequent facts, and continued.] The plaintiff contests the validity of his execution of the deed of 1854. He says that he executed it in ignorance of the real facts of the case, and that he never discovered the fraud that had been practised by these two appointments until it appeared by the correspondence of his mother, which he discovered amongst his father's papers after his death. The two reversionary societies are each of them purchasers for value, and, as they allege, without any notice or means of discovering the fraud, and the question I have to consider is, first, whether the two appointments are void; and secondly, whether the purchasers for value without notice stand in any better situation, or take more than the appointees had to give them. The appointments must, I think, be considered separately. By themselves I think it would be difficult to support either appointment. As to the four-tenths appointed to Augustus in Jan. 1846, of which two-tenths were sold to the Law Reversionary Society, the appointment was obviously executed in order to raise 700*l.*, and, accordingly, within a few days 700*l.* was raised on this share, but of this 435*l.* was paid in respect of the premium and stamp on the articles of clerkship of William Richard Preston, who was one of the objects of the power of appointment, and 100*l.* was applied in payment to Augustus himself, but I find it difficult to say that this application of 435*l.* for the benefit of William Richard Preston can legitimately be treated as an appointment made to him; if it were so, it ought to have been in writing, which it is not, and I can only treat this as money paid by the father for the benefit of his son, and, as far as I can gather from the evidence, the remaining 165*l.* was retained by the father for his own benefit. It would, I think, be contrary both to principle and authority if an appointment to one object of the power could be supported by the application of money raised by the appointee on the share so appointed for the benefit of another object of the power nowhere mentioned in any of the deeds of appointment. It is, I think, unquestionable that to render this valid as an appointment it must be put in writing according to the express words of the power; this is, I think, distinctly established by the case of Topham v. Duke of Portland, 31 Beav. 525. As to the other appointment, the arrangements for raising the money had obviously been made previously to the execution of the deed, and the transaction is in fact contemporaneous. The appointment to Mary Ann is executed on the 8th, and the money is raised on the 9th Dec. 1852, and the money raised seems to me to have been wholly employed for the benefit of the father and mother; and if the matter rested here I should, as at present advised, set aside both these appointments. This brings me to the consideration of the effect of the deed of the 1st Jan. 1854, and this raises two questions: Was this a transaction capable of confirmation? and, if it was, has it been confirmed? On the first question I think it clear that the appointment was not ipso facto void, but that it was only voidable. As the appointments stand alone on the deed polls they are good and valid; it is only the discovery of the purpose for which they were made that renders them invalid, and this purpose must be proved by the persons who seeks to impugn the appointments. I therefore hold it to be clear that they were only voidable and consequently that they were capable of being confirmed. The next question is, Has this deed of the 1st Jan. 1854, confirmed these two appointments? I have no doubt that it has, provided that it has been duly executed by every person who is a party thereto understanding its true purport and effect. It is only impugned by the plaintiff; some of the defendants, if it be set aside, will be ready to take advantage of it, but they do not, as indeed they could not as defendants, directly attack it. The question is, therefore, resolved into this: does the plaintiff prove that he was induced to execute the deed without fully understanding its purport and effect? On this head I must say that after considering in every way and examining all the evidence on the subject, it appears to me that it is impossible for the plaintiff to overcome, or in the least degree to impeach his execution of the deed on the 9th Oct. 1860. He was the articled clerk of a solicitor (his brother-in-law). He was endeavouring to raise money on his share; he was aware that the deed he was called upon to execute was a deed to confirm six appointments. He knew, therefore, that the appointments, to render them valid, required confirmation, and in this state of circumstances he voluntarily, not on compulsion or persuasion, or indeed at the instance of anybody, unless it be that of his intended mortgagee, deliberately executed the deed. I think that it is impossible to get over this. The direct evidence is insuperable, and it is confirmed in various ways. In the first place, he executes the deeds of April and May 1861, and he does this six months after the execution of the deed of confirmation. If the transaction were capable of being ratified and made valid by confirmation, this has made it so. I think, as I have stated, that the appointments were not ipso facto void, that they were capable of being ratified, and that the plaintiff has ratified them. It lies upon him to show that he was induced to do so by undue influence or by misrepresentations or other circumstances of fraud. He has wholly failed in doing so; he was bound to inquire why he was called upon to confirm the appointments, in other words, why the appointments required confirmation; he deliberately ratifies them, and he takes no step to set them aside for nearly seven years. It is true that he was out of the country during a large portion of that time, but he was in the country for many months after he had executed the deed, and while he dealt with these shares. In this state of circumstances I am of opinion that he cannot now rip open the transaction, and that his bill must be dismissed with costs.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday July 9th.

ROSE v. ROWE.

Will—Construction—Gift of rents, with power to sell—Life estate.

A testator gave to his wife the rents and interest of all property for her life, but still giving her liberty to sell and dispose of the whole or any part of the said property if she should think proper so to do; and he directed that all his property remaining at her death should be divided into two equal parts, one moiety among six persons, and the other moiety among three, but that if any of the nine legatees should die before receiving their share, having no child, such legatee's share should be equally divided between the other legatees:

Held, that the testator's widow took only a life interest in the property:

Held, further, that none of the legatees to whom one moiety of the property was bequeathed were entitled to share in the other moiety.

This was an administration suit.

Joseph Swann by his will, dated the 28th Feb. 1834, made the following disposition:—

I give to my dear wife Ann Swann the rents and interest of all my property whatsoever and wheresoever for her life, but still giving her the liberty to sell and dispose of the whole or any part of the said property if she shall think proper so to do; and what property remains at her death my will is that the freehold and copyhold estates be then sold, if not sold before, and with all the other property remaining to be divided into two equal parts; one part I direct to be equally divided between the six following persons: my brother William Swann, of Little Bookham, in Surrey, my sister Elizabeth, the wife of Peter Weller, my sister Ann, the wife of Richard Chitty, my sister Hannah, the wife of Richard Rose, my brother-in-law James Comfort, all of Dorking aforesaid, and my brother Henry Swann, now or lately living with Edward Hamshar, at Newick, in Sussex; and the other part I direct to be equally divided between the three following persons: William Hall, my brother-in-law, now or late of Eltham, in Kent, Stephen Hall, my brother-in-law, Mary Cant, my sister-in-law, both of Dorking aforesaid. If any of the above nine legatees should die before receiving their share, having no child or children, such legatee's share to be equally divided between the other legatees. And if the legatees should die before receiving their share, having a child or children, such shall receive their parent's share the same as such parent would do if living, and to be equally divided if more than one child. And I make my dear wife Ann Swann executrix, and William Ryde, of Dorking aforesaid, executor, of this my will.

The testator died in 1843, and his will was proved by his widow alone. Part of his personal estate consisted of 700*l.* stock, which the widow sold in order to lend 200*l.* to a friend, and which on being repaid she placed to her own credit in the London and County Bank.

The testator's widow made her will in March 1857, and by it she bequeathed the residue of her personal estate to two persons therein named, and appointed the defendant her executor. She died in 1865, and upon her death the defendant claimed the property. Thereupon this suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate.

Two questions arose upon the construction of the will—first, whether the testator's widow took an absolute, or merely a life interest in his property, and, secondly, whether the persons to whom one moiety of the testator's residuary estate was bequeathed were entitled to share in the other moiety, some of the persons to whom the said moieties were respectively bequeathed having died in the lifetime of the testator's widow without children.

Hallett, sen., for the plaintiff, submitted the questions to the court.

Renshaw, for the representative of a deceased legatee, argued that the testator's widow had only a life interest in the property. He cited

Martin v. Holgate, L. Rep. 1 Eng. & Ir. App. 175;
Lanphier v. Buck, 2 Dr. & S. 484;
Re Orton's Trust, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 375; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 146.

Karslake, Q.C. and A. E. Miller, for the defendant, contended that the life estate given to the widow was enlarged by the subsequent words in the will to an absolute interest. The gift over merely operated on such part of the property as she had made no disposition of either in her lifetime or by her will. They cited

Martin v. Martin, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 404; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99;
Wynne v. Hawkins, 1 Bro. C. C. 179;

Hemming and Hallett, jun., for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It has been argued that the testator's widow took an absolute interest under her husband's will. That argument, however, is inconsistent with the plain and sensible view of the testator's language. Nothing can be clearer than the words at the beginning of the will, which give the widow a life estate. It has been said that the life estate, so clearly given, is enlarged into an absolute interest by the subsequent words giving the widow power to sell or dispose of the whole or any part of the property, and directing a division on her death of the residue. That direction to divide, however, applies not merely to that portion of the property which should remain undisposed of at the widow's death, but to every part of it. To enlarge the life estate into an absolute interest would be not only to destroy the estate expressly given, but to defeat the gift over. The authorities referred to differ from the present case. That of Gude v. Worthington (sup.) is the strongest, but that is a most remarkable decision, and the case was not very elaborately argued. It is not necessary to notice the other cases. My opinion is that the widow took only a life estate with power to sell for the purpose of conversion. As to the other question, there is a clear gift over of one moiety of the property to the first six persons named in the will, and a similar gift of the other moiety to the last three persons named. The direction that if any of the nine legatees should die before receiving their share, leaving no child or children, such legatee's share should be divided among the other legatees, must be read reddendo singula singulis, in which case none of the persons to whom one moiety of the property is bequeathed can be entitled to share in the moiety given to the others.

Re ASIATIC BANKING COMPANY; Ex parte DR. COLLUM.

Company — Winding-up — Shares—Provisional certificate for—Liability of holders.

The directors of a company duly issued provisional certificates for new shares, which provided that if a second instalment of the capital and premium money in respect of the shares was not paid before a particular day, the amount paid for the shares, with all the rights and privileges appurtenant to the certificate, would be forfeited.

Held, that the holder of such certificates who had transferred his shares without paying the second instalments was not liable as a contributory.

This was an adjourned summons on behalf of Dr. Collum, for the purpose of having his name removed from the list of contributories of the above company under these circumstances.

The company was established under a royal charter and a deed of settlement, dated respectively the 19th Feb. and the 11th April 1864.

The original capital was 500,000*l.*, in 25,000 shares of 20*l.* each. On the 3rd Jan. 1865 the directors, having previously received the consent of the Commissioners of the Treasury, passed a resolution to increase the capital of the company from 500,000*l.* to 1,000,000*l.*, by the creation of 25,000 new shares of 20*l.* each. From the date of the formation of the company the shares stood high in public opinion, and the directors issued the new shares at 15*l.* premium on the 20*l.* shares.

On the 27th Jan. 1865, Dr. Collum, who had not held any original shares, but had seen the prospectus embodying the resolution of the 3rd Jan., applied, on one of the printed forms, for 100 new shares. On the 10th Feb. 1865, the acting manager wrote to Dr. Collum stating that the directors had allotted him thirty-five shares, and requesting the payment of 350*l.*, being 2*l.* 10*s.* per share capital, and 7*l.* 10*s.* per share premium on the allotted shares. At the foot of the letter was affixed the following statement: "This sheet to be presented entire at the bankers, who will sign the receipt annexed, and must be retained by the allottee until exchanged for the usual certificate."

On the 15th Feb. 1865, Dr. Collum paid the 350*l.*, and received a receipt from the bank. Shortly afterwards the directors, having caused to be prepared certain provisional certificates of the new shares, thirty-five of them were forwarded to Dr. Collum in respect of his shares. These certificates were in the following form:

Provisional Certificate of New Issue.
New Share, 02240.
Asiatic Banking Corporation; Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1864.

This is to certify that the holder of the provisional certificate having paid to the Asiatic Banking Corporation the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, being the first instalment of capital, and 7*l.* 10*s.*, the first instalment of premium, in respect of new share, No. 02240, for 20*l.*, in the Asiatic Banking Corporation, will be entitled upon payment of the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.*, being the second instalment of capital, and 7*l.* 10*s.*, being the balance of premium in respect of the said shares, on or before the 30th June 1865, and in execution of the deed of accession, to be prepared in respect of such new capital, to be registered as a proprietor of share No. 02240 for 20*l.* in the new capital of the said company, having 5*l.* paid thereon, subject to the published terms of issue and to the regulation of the charter-deed of settlement and deed of accession thereto.

Dated this 21st day of March 1865.

J. A. RUSSEL, THOMAS CARDWELL, } Directors.
J. W. LAWRENCE, Acting General Manager.
Entered. A. D. DAVIS, Acting-Accountant.

N.B. In default of payment of the second instalment of capital and the balance of premium on or before the 30th June 1865, the amount paid, together with all the rights and privileges appurtenant to this certificate, will be forfeited. Holders desirous of doing so may anticipate these payments at a discount of 6*l.* per cent. Payment may be made at Bombay at the rate of 2*s.* per rupee.

On the 29th March 1866, Dr. Collum, without paying the second of the above-mentioned instalments, sold his thirty-five shares through his brokers. In the case of twenty-five of the shares, the purchasers, having paid the second instalments, were accepted by the company and placed on the register, but as to the other ten no instalment had been paid, and the allottee had not been registered.

The company having been ordered to be wound-up, Dr. Collum's name had been placed on the list of contributories.

Hence this application.

Sir R. Palmer, Q. C., A. E. Miller, and Chitty, in support of the summons, submitted that the new shares which were held by Dr. Collum were transferable by the delivery of the provisional certificates, and that upon the terms of the contract between him and the company as above set forth, he was clearly no longer a shareholder in the company. They cited:

Re Littlehampton, Havre and Honfleur Steamship Company, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 110;
Eustace v. Dublin Trunk Connecting Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 182; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679;
Re Kollman's Railway, Locomotive, and Carriage Improvement Company; Ex parte Berresford, 2 M. & G. 197.

Dickenson, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the liquidator, contended that the true contract, by which Dr. Collum was bound, was that which arose out of his undertaking (when he accepted the shares), to sign the charter and deeds of the company; that in connection with that the bank could have compelled him to perform his contract, and accept all the shares for which he had agreed with them, and that the delivery of the provisional certificates could not exonerate him from his original contract, of which, in reality, he had committed a breach. Even if the case rested entirely upon the contract contained in the certificates, the provision as to the rights under the certificate being forfeited in default of payment of the second instalment must be understood as for the benefit of the company, and not for the benefit of the shareholders. It could not be intended that a shareholder, by breaking the contract, was to be allowed to avoid his liability. They cited

Edwards v. Kilkenny Railway Company, 14 C. B., N. S., 526;
De Pass's case, 4 De G. & J. 537.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The subject-matter of this contest relates to a contract between the directors of the company and the holder of certain provisional certificates for new shares in it. At the end of each certificate is a notice showing that the right to the shares conferred by the certificate is not, upon the authorities, one that could enable the company to make the holder of the certificate liable as a shareholder. The case of Eustace v. The Dublin Trunk Connecting Railway Company (sup.) shows that a mere allottee of shares by virtue of such a document as this, cannot be compelled to go further and make himself a complete shareholder. The terms of the contract between the directors and the holders of the provisional certificates are clear and distinct; they are as follows:—"In default of payment of the second instalment of capital, and the balance of premium on or before the 30th June 1865, the amount paid, together with all the rights and privileges appurtenant to this certificate, will be forfeited." It is said that Dr. Collum dealt with the thirty-five shares as his own property, and that he has retained some of them. But even if that were so he never paid the second instalments, and therefore all his rights and privileges as a holder of the provisional certificates is forfeited. There is no analogy between the present case and those cited in the course of the arguments against the application. The summons must be allowed with costs. The liquidator will have his costs out of the estate.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. Edwards, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, July 2.

Ross v. Tatham.

Administration suit—Distribution of assets—Liability of executor—Creditor.

Where a creditor omits to bring in his claim under a decree of administration, he loses his remedy, not against the property, but against the executors, who, by distributing the assets under the decree, are exonerated from all liability in respect of them.

The testator in this administration suit was a lessee for a term of ninety-nine years from Christmas 1860 of certain land, upon which he covenanted by the lease to expend 1800*l.* in building a messuage or warehouse of certain dimensions within twelve months from the date of the lease, and to keep the messuage so to be built in good repair, and give it up in good repair at the end of the term. The testator died in 1864, having been prevented by an injunction of this court from building according to this covenant. A decree for the administration of his estate was made in Dec. 1864. In March 1866 the executors sold the leasehold property, and obtained from their assignee a covenant of indemnity against all breaches of the covenants in the lease.

The whole of the testator's estate was now in court, and the only question which arose upon the present petition, which was presented by a residuary legatee of a moiety of the testator's estate, for payment of his share, was whether the executors were entitled to have any portion of the fund retained in court to meet the liabilities under the covenants of the lease.

Owen for the petitioner, and Nalder for the plaintiff in the suit, contended that no part of the fund should be retained, as the executors were sufficiently indemnified by the decree of the court.

Wickens for the executors, and Romer for other parties, maintained that a portion of the fund should be retained as an indemnity fund.

The Vice-Chancellor.—This petition raises a point of great importance. It appears that the testator was the lessee of various properties, and in particular of one which was subject to a covenant within twelve months to erect a building, and thereon to expend 1800*l.*, and the lease being dated in 1861, that there was a breach of that covenant in 1862, which entitled the lessor to recover damages before the 1st Jan. 1863. In 1864 the testator died, and there has been a decree for the administration of his estate, which calls on all the creditors on that estate, to bring in their claims. The lessor was a creditor for or in respect of the breach of the covenant, and if he had brought an action against the executor, would have been entitled to recover. I apprehend that every creditor is bound, under a decree for administration, to bring in his claim, and if he omits to do so, the consequence is, not that he loses his remedy against the property, but against the executor who, by distributing the assets under the decree, is exonerated, and the claim on the assets thereby must fail. The lessor omitted to bring in his claim, for it was a debt to which he was entitled as much at that time as now or on any day between that and the expiration of the lease. Not having brought in the claim, he can no longer proceed against the executor, but must follow the assets. This is a rule of much convenience, and being a rule of this court, I do not know how I can do otherwise than hold that the executor is exonerated; for if I do not, suppose there is a lease of ninety-nine years, and an executor distributes the assets where there has been a covenant broken, there is a liability during all that time, and in this case there are thirty or forty years to run, and the argument goes to that extent, because it is a continuing breach, and the lessor may bring an action at any time, and the executor seeks protection. The case of Bennett v. Lytton, 2 J. & H. 55, was referred to, where the assets were distributed under an order of the court in an administration suit, and there was an indemnity to the executor precisely as in the present case. Mr. Wickens has done right to bring this matter to the attention of the court, but I am of opinion that there is no right to keep the assets in court. It may be made a part of the order that the peculiar circumstances were brought to the attention of the court. The executor having made a claim to retain the fund to answer any liability under the head of covenant in omitting to build such buildings as by the contract are covenanted to be erected—Order as prayed. I have not put this case as coming under Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 55, s. 27), but have decided quite independently of that statute.

Twynam v. Porter.

Practice—Order to continue suit without representative of a deceased defendant—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 44.

In a suit for account against a trustee, the court on death (before replication or notice of motion for decree) of a defendant who was a tenant for life of one share of the trust property, made an order, ex parte, to continue the suit without any personal representative of the deceased.

This was a suit instituted against the defendant, George Twynam Porter, for an account of moneys which he had received on behalf of the plaintiff, including the rents and profits of certain real and leasehold estates to which the plaintiff, her brother

Edward Twynam, and her sister Emily Porter, the wife of the first defendant, were entitled, as tenants in common. The plaintiff and Edward Twynam had conveyed their share of the same estates to the defendant G. T. Porter, upon trusts for the management thereof, and the same defendant had received the rents and profits thereof for a number of years. Edward Twynam and Emily Porter were made defendants to the suit in respect of their interests in the estates. The share of the defendant Emily Porter was in settlement, but she was entitled to the rents and profits of the estates for her life for her separate use, with remainder to the defendant G. T. Porter for his life. In March 1869, the defendant Emily Porter, duly appeared to the bill, and in Aug. 1869, she died before replication or notice of motion for decree.

Thurstan Holland now moved ex parte on behalf of the plaintiff that the suit might be carried on and prosecuted either without any representative of the deceased defendant, Emily Porter, being present, or against the defendant, G. T. Porter, her husband, as representing her interest.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR had some doubt whether he had jurisdiction to make such an order ex parte without notice having been given to the other defendants; but upon being informed that the bill did not pray for a partition, he made an order that proceedings in the suit might be carried on without any representative of the defendant, Emily Porter.

THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. GARNETT.

Injunction—Covenant not to use a house as a beerhouse.

A covenant not to use a house as "a beerhouse, inn, or public house for the sale of spirituous liquors":

Held not to be infringed by the sale of beer by retail to be drunk off the premises.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using a house and premises as a beerhouse for the sale of beer or other liquors, or otherwise, in contravention of a covenant entered into by the defendant

The plaintiffs had sold to the defendant certain building land at Wolverton, in the county of Buckingham, and by the deed of conveyance, dated the 24th March 1860, the defendant covenanted (inter alia) that the land and other hereditaments thereby conveyed, and the buildings to be erected thereon, or any of them, should not "be used as a beerhouse, inn, or public-house, for the sale of spirituous liquors," and that no slaughter-house, candle, hat, or soap manufactory, tanyard, brick kiln, tinman, blacksmith, or common brewer, or any other trade or business of any description, should be carried on, which should, or might hereafter, be a nuisance or annoyance to the said company, their successors or assigns, or their tenants or the owners or occupiers for the time being of the neighbouring premises.

The defendant occupied a house built on the land, and in Aug. 1869, he had taken out a licence to sell beer in casks, and had subsequently taken out a licence to sell by retail beer to be consumed off the premises, and had sold beer by retail in accordance with the licence.

Speed and Ince, in support of the motion, contended that the defendant had committed a breach of the covenant, and referred to Jones-Bateman, for the defendant, contra.

Speed in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said it was conceded that a beer-house could not mean a place where beer was sold in any quantities. The question was what did the parties to the deed mean? What was the ordinary meaning of the word beer-house at the time (1860)? To a person minded to ascertain the legal meaning of the word beer-house, he would naturally resort to Barnes' Justice of the Peace, and in that book (edit. of 1845, heading "Alehouse"), there was the following definition: "A beer-house or shop is a house in which beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry is sold by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises." He was, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the injunction asked. Costs to be costs in the cause.

(Before O'BRIEN, J.)

Treating—Sects. 4 and 23 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102—Cooper v. Slade—Decisions of committees of the House of Commons—Procedure—Costs.

The 4*th section of* 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 enacts that "every candidate" who "shall corruptly" by himself give meat or drink to persons for the purpose of being elected, or for being elected, or with the view of corruptly influencing such persons, shall be guilty of treating.

The 23*rd section makes no reference to the candidate, but enacts that the giving of entertainment on the polling day by way of refreshment shall be punishable in the penalty of* 40*s.:*

Held, that the 23*rd section applies as well to acts done by the candidate or his agent as to other persons, and that the giving of such entertainment on the polling day is not necessarily corrupt because it is done by a candidate or his agent.*

Cooper v. Slade, 6 E. & B.; 6 H. of L. Cas., examined, and all the decisions of the House of Commons committees on the subject of treating considered and compared.

On the polling day a large number of voters partook of drink at the house of G., the agent of the respondent. They had all promised to vote for the respondent; many of them had their polling cards with them, and the great majority were country voters, who left their homes very early. The principal part of the drink, moreover, was not supplied until the contest was virtually decided. G. denied that he had any corrupt intention, and stated that what he did was of his own motion:

Held, not to be treating within sect. 4.

Where drinking, &c., goes on during the canvass, the candidate soliciting votes in public houses and places where drink is supplied, the inference must be in favour of a corrupt intention.

A voter was promised a day's coursing for his son.

Another voter who solicited employment was told to go to certain works, and see if the manager wanted hands. The respondent denied that he contemplated influencing votes:

Held, that neither inducement amounted to bribery, the latter act being one of mere charity.

The respondent was declared duly elected, but his agent was proved to have offended against sect. 23 of the Act, and to have done acts which were to be reprehended:

Held, therefore, that the respondent was not entitled to his costs.

This was a petition against the return of Mr. Dalway. It contained the usual allegations.

O'BRIEN, J.—(Having dealt with the allegation of undue influence said):—Now, it is material to direct attention to the two sections of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, which have been so much referred to. The fourth section provides that, "every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person, in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, and shall forfeit the sum of 50*l.* to any person who shall sue for the same, with full costs of suit." According to the obvious and grammatical construction of that section, the word "corruptly" at the beginning of it governs the entire of the section. It is not necessary to rely on the word "corruptly" which occurs in the middle of the section of the Act before the word "influencing," because that refers to only one of the acts mentioned in the section, but the word "corruptly" at the beginning of that section, renders it necessary that every act therein mentioned should be done corruptly, in order to constitute an offence within that section. The 23rd section then provides, "That the giving or causing to be given to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket, to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40*s.* for each offence, to any person who shall sue for the same, together with full costs of suit." In that 23rd section the word "corruptly" is not used, and though that section does not mention the word "candidate," it applies as well to acts done by the candidate or his agent as to acts done by any other person. Upon those two sections of that statute what is the reasonable conclusion? That the same act of a candidate which, if it fell within the 4th section (as having been done corruptly) would disqualify him from being elected, would, if it only fell within the 23rd section, render him only liable to a 40*s.* penalty. There must therefore be a difference between the acts of the candidate, which were legislated against by those two sections. As it could not be reasonably supposed that the Legislature intended to subject the candidate to different penalties by the two sections for the same act; I think the difference is, that to bring the act within the fourth section so as to disqualify the candidate from being elected, the act should be done corruptly. I have attentively considered the authorities which were referred to by counsel during the trial, and the first I shall mention is the case of Cooper v. Slade, 6 H. of L. Cas. 746, and previously in 6 E. & B. 447, when before the Court of Exchequer Chamber. That case was an action for penalties under the 2nd section of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, which, by the first paragraph, provides that every person shall be guilty of bribery "who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person, on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce such voter to vote or to refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted, or refrained from voting at any election." The questions in that case arose upon the 7th and 8th counts of the declaration. The 7th count proceeded on the first part of that first paragraph, and alleged defendant's promise before the election of money to induce the voter to vote. And the 8th count proceeded on the 2nd clause of that first paragraph, and alleges that the defendant, after the election, corruptly gave money to the voter on account of his having voted. The money given was for the purpose of paying the expense of conveying the voter. The case was tried before Lord Wensleydale, then Baron Parke. The verdict was had for the plaintiff on both counts, and the case came before the Court of Exchequer Chamber on a bill of exceptions, alleging (amongst other grounds of error), that there was no evidence to support the charge contained in the 8th count, namely, that the act was done corruptly. The Court of Exchequer Chamber held that there was no such evidence; and Alderson, B., in delivering the judgment of that court, makes the following observations with respect to the 4th and 23rd sections of the Act. In pp. 456 and 457, he says, "the 4th section only prohibits the corruptly giving of meat, &c., for the purpose of corruptly influencing a voter to give a vote. It does not prohibit the bona fide giving of such meat, &c., unconditionally, while sect. 23 absolutely prohibits any giving of refreshment to any voter on the day of nomination, or day of polling, on account of his having polled, or being about to poll, without using any such words as 'in order to induce'"; now, a giving of refreshment might clearly be within sect. 23, and not within sect. 4, because not given in order to induce the voter to vote. Again, in p. 459, he says, "We think the word 'corruptly' has a definite meaning. If, for instance, there had been a previous unlawful promise conditional on the voter voting, or if there had been a previous understanding to that effect, or a corrupt bargain, for the future, we think the case would have been within the statute." Alderson, B then observes upon the consequences that would result from not giving to the word "corruptly" the meaning he contended for. Upon that case coming before the House of Lords, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was reversed; but Mr. Rogers states in his work on Elections p. 351, last edit., that the decision was reversed without impugning the law laid down; and, upon looking at the report of the proceedings in the House of Lords, I find, that, so far as the construction of the 4th section is concerned, there is no decision of the House of Lords opposed to the construction put upon that section by Alderson, B. The case before the House of Lords arose upon the word "corruptly" in the 2nd section, and Alderson, B. had, in the course of his judgments in the Exchequer Chamber, referred to sect. 4 for the meaning of the word "corrupt." It has been urged that the majority of the judges in answering the questions put to them by the House of Lords expressed their dissent from the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but they did so upon the ground that there was, in their opinion, evidence to go to the jury that the act was done corruptly. It will be found that Channell and Watson, BB., and Williams and Wightman, JJ., in their judgments, referred to the fact of the promise having been made before the vote, as evidence that the subsequent performance of it was corrupt. It is true that Willes, J. goes somewhat further, and expresses his opinion that if a man purposely does an act which the law forbids as tending to corrupt voters, then he does that act "corruptly." But, as he has since observed, in giving that opinion, he was dealing with the case of bribery, and with the word "corruptly," as used in sect. 2. And Coleridge, J. in pp. 784 and 785, states his opinion that, in case of payment to a voter after the election, it was material (in order to bring that act within the second section) that it should have been done corruptly. He also observes, that the statute expressly made the operating motive in the mind of the party material, and required that that motive must be "corrupt"; and he further observes, that it would be against the proper construction of the statute to make the act of itself evidence of corruption. The judgment of the House of Lords in that case was given by Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale. It is true that Lord Cranworth, in his judgment (p. 788), states that he could not give to the word "corruptly," as used in the 2nd section with reference to a payment after voting, any other meaning than a payment in violation of that which the statute was passed to prohibit. But Lord Wensleydale, in his judgment pp. 790 and 791, referring to the construction which he had put at the trial upon the word "corruptly," stated, that "he did not exactly understand the meaning of that word as used in that Act;" and that he was not perfectly satisfied with the correctness of the opinion he had expressed as to its construction. In a further part of his judgment (page 797), he also says, "I have, however, very great doubt whether I was right in my construction of the obscure terms of the Act, &c., in holding, that if a candidate, after the election, pays a voter money, the moving cause of his doing so being that the voter has given him his vote, the payment is 'corrupt.'" The final decision of the House of Lords was, that upon plaintiff entering a nolle prosequi upon the eighth count he obtained judgment upon the seventh count; which did not raise the question at all. I have referred so fully to this case, being one of such importance and high authority, and because it was so much relied on by counsel during the trial as bearing upon the meaning of the word "corruptly," in the fourth section. With regard to the acts that have been held to constitute the offence of treating, Mr. Kisbey, in his very able address, has referred to two cases decided by committees of the House of Commons. One was the Roscommon case, 1 Wolf. & Bris. 107, in which the election of Captain Gough was voided, it appearing that voters had, when they came in from the country the night before the polling, been kept and accommodated in various refreshment houses in the district. That was held to amount to treating. The other case referred to by Mr. Kisbey was the Peterborough case, 2 P. R. & D. 250, in which the election was also held void upon the ground of treating, because on the morning of the declaration (and, of course, after the election was over) cards were issued announcing that a public dinner would be given to the successful candidate, and because the successful candidate going to the dinner paid for the wine. This case certainly goes very far; but, with every respect for the decisions of committees of the House of Commons, and admitting that so far as practice goes, and where a case is without precedent, they are decisions to be regarded, it will be seen that those decisions are by no means uniform upon the subject of treating. Thus in the Carlisle case, which is also reported in 1 Wolf. & Bris. 95, immediately preceding the report of the Roscommon case, it appeared that the petition was for bribery and treating. It was proved in that Carlisle case that the agent of the sitting members had invited about twenty out voters to breakfast at his house on the day of the election, that the voters came there in conveyances provided for that purpose by the agents of the sitting members, and that the solicitor of one of the sitting members had also invited four other voters to breakfast. But the ground relied upon by counsel for the sitting members, as disproving the charge of treating and corruption, was that all the persons so invited had long before promised their votes to the sitting members, and were all supporters of the political party to which the sitting members belonged (a fact to which there is something similar in the present case), and the committee adopted the view pressed by the counsel for the sitting members, namely, that what was done was done bonâ fide, and that the treating was not corrupt, and accordingly the election was held good. Mr. Kisbey also relied on the Fulkirk case, 1 Wolf. & Dew, 170, in which case the member was unseated on the ground of treating, it appearing that not only on the polling day, but on previous days, eatables and drinkables were supplied to voters without payment or stint at several inns in the town, and that the treating went on at the committee-rooms on the polling day; and that the agent of the sitting member, for election expenses, ordered some of the refreshments supplied on the polling day to be put down to the committee; but, in the very same book, pp. 111 and 113, the Tewkesbury case, relied on by Mr. Law, is reported, in which the committee held that the charge of treating was not sustained, although it appeared that on the polling day, from early in the morning until evening, refreshments (not certainly considerable in quantity), were supplied in the house of the sitting member's agent for election expenses, and were partaken of by some voters and others. I shall also refer to the Aylesbury case, 1 Wolf. & Brist. 13 and 15, in which it appeared that refreshments were supplied at the hotels to various voters; that the agent of the sitting members was "in and out of the inn during the whole day," which would imply his sanction of what was done; and yet the committee found that the charge of treating was not proved. I refer to these cases, to show that the decisions of the House of Commons cannot be said to be uniform upon this question of treating; they are decisions which it would be difficult to reconcile one with the other, and therefore we must consider each case upon the facts proved in evidence. I shall now refer, in the first instance, to the alleged treating at Gray's house. It is clear, in my opinion, that Gray should be regarded as the agent for Mr. Dalway. That has not, indeed, been controverted; and what I have to consider is, whether the act of supplying drink there was done "corruptly" within the meaning of the 4th section. If it was it would subject the parties to a severe penalty, and under the 36th section the sitting member would be subject to the further penalty of disqualification for sitting for this borough during the present Parliament. I feel, therefore that I should not come to such a conclusion except upon satisfactory and sufficient evidence. I need not go in detail through all the evidence on this matter, which could not be done within any reasonable limits, and it has been already very ably commented on by Mr. Kisbey in his reply. But it appears to me that the result of such evidence is, that all the voters who partook of drink in Gray's house had come there with the express determination to vote for Mr. Dalway; that all of them, with the exception of some ten or twelve, had their voting cards with them; that the great majority of them were country voters who had left their houses very early; and that the principal part of the drink supplied upon that occasion (namely, that supplied by Adamson and Logan) was not got till the election was virtually decided, namely, about half-past eleven o'clock, when, it appeared upon the evidence, that Mr. Dalway's majority was one that could not be got over, and that his return was morally certain. It is not shown that previous to that day there had been any promise or announcement that such drink or refreshment would be supplied. Gray states that nothing was said to any of the voters about their votes at the time of their getting the drink, and he also swears that what he did was of his own motion; and that in giving the people drink he had no intention whatever of influencing their votes. This is not similar to cases found in the reports of some election proceedings in England, in which it appeared that the treating was going on during the canvass, and that the candidate before the election had solicited the votes of the electors at public-houses, or other places where drink was supplied, and in which cases the elections on various occasions have been properly voided upon the ground of treating. So far as the drinking at Gray's is concerned, I do not consider it necessary to refer to the evidence more minutely. I think I have stated the fair result of it; and upon these grounds and considering that the charge of corruption should be clearly made out, I cannot come to the conclusion that the drink in that place was given corruptly, or constituted the offence of treating within the 4th section. Before I consider the other cases of treating relied on, I think it convenient to refer to the charges of bribery which have been brought against Mr. Dalway and his agents. I refer to the transactions with Thomas Boyd and John M'Dowell, who were examined yesterday. The transaction as to Boyd is that Mr. Dalway canvassed him, that the man said, "Come to my house and I will give you a promise," and that on the way he asked Mr. Dalway, not for employment or for money, but for liberty for his son to have a day's coursing with a young dog over the property of Mr. Dalway's father. The case as to M'Dowell is that Mr. Dalway met M'Dowell, that the man came over to him, was canvassed by Mr. Dalway and immediately promised him his vote; that the man afterwards asked Mr. Dalway to give him work at the mines, and that Mr. Dalway said that he could not tell him anything about it; that he did not know whether there was work for him or not; but that he should go to Mr. M'Cartney who was employed by Mr. Dalway over the works at the mines which were several miles distant, and that he (M'Cartney) would tell him whether he wanted any hands, or had work to spare. Mr. Dalway further states that, in this conversation with M'Dowell about work, he had not in his mind the slightest reference to the man's vote at the election, and that he thought so little of the matter that he never spoke to M'Cartney about it, and did not, until some time after M'Dowell was employed, know that he had been so employed. Now can it be seriously contended that either the one or the other of these cases will support a charge of bribery? With regard to the case of Boyd I pass by the singularity of the inducement alleged to have been held out; and even assuming that it comes within the definition which Alderson, B. is stated, in Rogers on Elections, p. 341 (n), to have given of the words "valuable consideration" in the Bribery Act, namely, that they mean valuable consideration estimated in money, it seems almost a waste of time to dwell further upon this case for the purpose of showing it is not a case of bribery. The liberty of coursing was one which Mr. Dalway states he had given to several; and was in the habit of giving on various occasions. With respect then to the employment of M'Dowell, I am at a loss to know if that be considered a case of bribery, what a person who was a candidate for a city or other place, and happened to be engaged in business could do, if any voter came and asked him for employment; can it be held that he should employ no voter? I may refer on this matter to the observation of Willes, J. in the Windsor case, in which a sovereign was deposited by the sitting member, with a clergyman who was opposed to him, for the relief of a voter whom the sitting member had asked for his vote. Willes, J. said the question was whether the depositing of the sovereign was a corrupt Act or an act of humanity, and he held that it was not, under the circumstances, an act of bribery. I may also refer to the Carlisl. case already mentioned, in which the agent for the sitting member, on the day of the election gave a pound to a voter named Macpherson, who had asked for his travelling expenses; which only amounted to a few shillings; but the agent said that he gave it more out of charity than anything else, the voter having stated that he was a struggling man. The counsel for the sitting member insisted that the payment had been made bonâ fide, and did not amount to bribery, and so the committee decided. Upon these grounds I have no doubt that neither of these charges of bribery against Mr. Dalway has been sustained. His Lordship then declared that the sitting member was duly elected, and that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed. He added:—It now remains for me to dispose of the last, and not unimportant, matter, namely, the cost of these proceedings. The 41st section of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, provides that "all costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the presentation of a petition under this Act, and to the proceedings consequent thereon, with the exception of such costs, charges and expenses, as are by this Act otherwise provided for, shall be defrayed by the parties to the petition, in such manner and in such proportions as the court or judge may determine, regard being had to the disallowance of any costs, charges, or expenses, which may, in the opinion of the court or judge, have been caused by vexatious conduct, unfounded allegations, or unfounded objections, on the part either of the petitioner or the respondent, and regard being had to the discouragement of any needless expense by throwing the burden of defraying the same on the parties by whom it has been caused, whether such parties are or are not on the whole successful." As a general rule, the object of this Act was to assimilate, to a certain extent, the practice as to costs, with the rule of law that costs should follow the result. But a discretion is left to the judge, and it is perfectly clear that, under the Act, such general rule might be displaced by special circumstances. Mr. Law relied, very properly, on the unfounded allegations of bribery made in the petition; and if it was not for the other circumstances in the case, these allegations, unsustained by evidence and inconsiderately made, would be ground for adhering to such a general rule. In my opinion, however, there are circumstances in this case which exempt it from the operation of that general rule. The giving of the drink on the polling day at Gray's house, though, as

Digitized by Google

I have already stated, it was not done corruptly, and was not a ground, under sect. 4, for avoiding the election, was still a proceeding much to be reprehended, and was clearly illegal under the 23rd sect. of the Act. This transaction, and some of the others to which I have referred, with respect to drinking, were of a character calculated to excite suspicion of undue practices, and not unreasonably calculated to invite inquiry. It is true that the giving of drink in the committee-room was the act of Mr. Gray himself, and was not done with Mr. Dalway's concurrence, and that the only knowledge brought home to Mr. Dalway of any such thing having been done was a circumstance that might have struck him, and did strike me, as immaterial—namely, that he saw some whisky in two bottles in the room. But it must be recollected that, under the election law of Parliament, a candidate, however morally innocent of any charge, is legally answerable for the practices of his agents; and though the case, either as to Mr. Gray or Mr. Dalway, does not come within sect. 4, yet I cannot but hold that, so far as regards the costs of this petition, Mr. Dalway is responsible for the drink having been given. It is a matter to be deplored that habits of drink should prevail upon the occasion of elections. They prevail unfortunately upon many occasions, but the indulgence in them is far more dangerous at an election, when hostile and antagonistic political feelings are excited, and people naturally feel more interest than ordinarily in the result. In the present case it certainly does not appear that the assaults upon Mr. Wilson and Mr. Cornwell arose from drink, or that the drinking on the polling day was otherwise productive of any injurious consequences so far as outrages were concerned. But when drink is once given, those who give or sanction it cannot know or form an opinion of the consequences to which it may lead. I think it should be discouraged, and that not only candidates, but their over zealous friends and partizans should be apprised of the risks they run, and of the consequences to which they expose the candidate by such a practice, and that it might be attended with positive loss to him. Upon these grounds I think I should, in this case, do what I clearly have authority to do under the Act of Parliament—namely, refuse to give the respondent the costs of these proceedings. A similar decision has, I see, been recently made by Willes J. in the case of the Guildford Petition, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 729, in which, because he considered there were reasonable grounds for inquiry, and for presenting the petition, he would not award any costs to the respondent, though he declared his election valid. I shall, therefore, make the order that each party should abide his own costs of these several proceedings.

THOMAS CHERRY and JOHN MCDOUGALL (apps.) v. THE COLONIAL BANK OF AUSTRALASIA (resps.)

Victoria—Company—Personal liability of directors—Misrepresentation of authority, without fraud—Implied warranty.

The appellants, two directors of a company, wrote a letter to the respondents' bank, stating that they, as directors, had appointed C. to be legal manager, and had authorised him to draw cheques upon the account of the company. The appellants were not empowered to give C. this authority. On the faith of the above letter, advances were made by the respondents' bank on cheques drawn by C., purporting to bind the company.

There was no imputation of fraud in the transaction.

In an action by the respondents against the appellants to recover the amount so paid on C.'s cheques:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria), that the law implied a warranty to the bank, on the part of the appellants, that C. had authority to bind the company, so as to make the appellants responsible to the bank for the advances on the cheques.

If a person represents himself as having authority to do an act when he has not, and the other side is drawn into a contract with him, and the contract becomes void for want of such authority, he is liable for the damage which may result to the party who confided in the representation, whether the party making it acted with a knowledge of its falsity or not.

Collen v. Wright (8 E. & B. 647) followed and approved.

The warranty which the law implies in such cases depends on the position of the parties and on the nature and effect of the representation, but when ascertained, as a matter of fact, the legal effect is the same as if the warranty had been express.

The remedy by special action where there is fraud or deceit is a distinct matter.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria, upon a rule nisi to set aside the verdict for the plaintiffs, and instead thereof to enter a nonsuit in an action wherein the said Colonial Bank of Australasia were the plaintiffs, and Thomas Cherry and John M'Dougall were the defendants; and also from a judgment of the court for the plaintiffs, upon demurrers to the defendants' fourth, fifth, and sixth pleas in the same action. The court refused to make the rule absolute, but reduced the amount of damages recovered by the plaintiffs.

The respondents were a banking corporation, carrying on business at Melbourne, and had branch banks at Matlock and Wood's Point, in the Colony of Victoria.

The appellants were two of the directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company (a company registered under the Mining Companies Limited Liability Act 1864 (27 Vict. No. 228), engaged in mining for gold at the Loch Fyne Quartz Claim, near to Matlock, in the Wood's Point district.

An action was commenced by the respondents against the appellants in Feb. 1867 to recover 4127*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, being the amount paid by the bank on cheques drawn by Charles Ernest Clarke.

The declaration stated that in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would honour and pay, on account of the company, the cheques of Charles Ernest Clarke, the defendants promised that he was duly authorised by the said company to make cheques for them as their agent, and the plaintiffs alleged, that relying on such promise they did honour such cheques on account of the company, but that the said Charles Ernest Clarke was not authorised by the company to make the same. There were also money counts.

The defendants pleaded to the special count. 1. That they did not promise. 2. That the cheques were not honoured on account of the company. 3. That the said Charles Ernest Clarke did not make any cheques on account of the company. 4. That the promise was in the words and figures following:

The manager of the Colonial Bank of Australasia, Matlock.

Sir,—We have to inform you that we, as directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, have appointed Mr.

Digitized by Google

Charles Ernest Clarke, to be the legal manager of the company, and have authorised him to draw cheques upon the account of the said company.—We remain, Sir, yours truly,

THOMAS CHERRY, } Directors Loch Fyne Q. M.
JOHN M'DOUGALL, } Company, Regd.

And that the said Thomas Cherry and John M'Dougall therein mentioned were the defendants, and the Colonial Bank of Australasia therein mentioned were the plaintiffs, and the said Charles Ernest Clarke was the person of the same name in the declaration mentioned. 5. That (repeating the several allegations in the fourth plea, with the exception of the words "And the Colonial Bank of Australasia mentioned therein are the plaintiffs") the said Colonial Bank of Australasia, Matlock, mentioned therein was a branch bank established at Matlock of the Colonial Bank of Australasia, the plaintiffs, who had their principal establishment in Melbourne, and several branch banks thereof throughout the colony. 6. That as to 4000*l.* parcel of the money claimed, cheques of the said Charles Ernest Clarke to that amount were drawn by him on the bank by way of overdraft, and there was not at the time of their being drawn any money standing to the credit of the company in the bank, out of which the same were payable. 7. To the money counts that they never were indebted.

The plaintiffs joined issue on the first, second, third, and last pleas, and demurred to the fourth, fifth, and sixth pleas. The defendants joined in demurrer.

The cause came on to be tried on the 4th June 1867, before Barry, J., and a jury, when the following facts were proved:—

That the appellants were directors of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company. That previous to the month of Dec. 1865 the company had opened an account with the respondents' branch bank at Matlock. That at the commencement and before the 4th of that month, the account of the company with the branch bank was overdrawn, of which the appellants had notice. That on the 4th of that month the appellants wrote and signed the letter set forth in the fourth plea, and sent it to the respondents.

That thereupon Clarke drew cheques, which were honoured by the bank, which increased the overdraft. That the account was then, by consent of the appellants and respondents, transferred to the branch bank at Wood's Point. That Clarke drew a cheque for 2336*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* on the Wood's Point branch of the respondent's bank, in order to pay off the overdraft of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company at the Matlock branch. That the pass book was regularly furnished to Clarke; that he subsequently drew several cheques, which were all duly honoured, the amount of the overdraft being finally the amount claimed in the action. It was further proved that the appellants did not form a quorum of the directors of the Loch Fyne Gold Mining Company, and were not empowered to give Clarke the authority mentioned in their letter to the respondents, or to authorise him to draw cheques on account of the company.

Upon these facts the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the full amount of their claim.

On the 27th June 1867 a rule nisi was obtained by the appellants to set aside the verdict obtained by the plaintiffs and to enter a nonsuit, on the following grounds:—First, that the authority given to Charles Ernest Clarke was a limited one, and that he was not justified in exceeding such authority. Secondly, that there was no evidence of any authority to Charles Ernest Clarke to pledge the credit of the company or overdraw, but only to draw on the funds of the company in the bank. Thirdly, that the authority given to Charles Ernest Clarke was not as stated in the declaration, but limited to drawing cheques on the plaintiffs' branch bank at Matlock. Fourthly, that there was no evidence of personal responsibility of the defendants. Fifthly, that there was no such promise as that declared on, and the letter produced, signed by the defendants, substantially varied from the allegation in the declaration, setting forth that the defendants promised the plaintiffs that Charles Ernest Clarke was authorised by the company to make drafts or cheques for them, as their agent. Sixthly, that there was no evidence of a promise by the defendants that Charles Ernest Clarke was duly authorised and empowered by the company to make drafts or cheques for them, as their agent. Seventhly, that there was no evidence of the consideration stated in the declaration. Eighthly, that there was no evidence to support the plaintiffs' issue on the second plea. Ninthly, that there was no evidence that Charles Ernest Clarke made any drafts or cheques on account of the company, or any drafts directed to the plaintiffs, as stated in the declaration,

On the 6th Sept. 1867 the Supreme Court gave judgment in favour of the respondents, on the points raised by the rule, but ordered the damages to be reduced by 2245*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, being a portion of the total advance of 4127*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, which had been overdrawn before the date of the said letter, the judgment being that the verdict should stand, and that the damages be reduced by the amount of 2245*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*; on the demurrers the judgment was for the respondents. Final judgment was accordingly entered in favour of the respondents for 1882*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* and costs.

Against this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Mellish, Q.C. (Griffits with him) for the appellants.—The action is founded on contract, but no contract was proved. The letter relied on contains no words of contract, stipulates for no consideration, and there was no intention on either side to make a contract. Assuming there is any contract, there is merly a contract that Clarke was manager and had power to draw such cheques as a manager might legally draw, and there is no contract that he had power to draw cheques for the purpose of borrowing money contrary to the provisions of the Colonial Statute (26 Vict. No. 228, s. 21). The letter says only that the directors had authorised Clarke to draw cheques, and not that the company had authorised him. The power of directors to bind the company by giving such an authority to Clarke was a matter of law not particularly within the knowledge of the appellants. The reasons for implying a warranty of authority in the case of contracts made by one person on behalf of another, do not extend to notifications of acts done by directors of a public company in the exercise of their own powers or supposed powers as directors. The letter does not purport to authorise Clarke to overdraw. There was no evidence that the alleged loss was consequent upon any contract contained in the letter, and the respondents would have sustained the same loss if the letter had been accurate. There was no evidence of any warranty of power to draw on the respondents except at their Matlock branch. The following cases were referred to:

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q.C. (Macnamara with him) for the respondents.—The appellants having incorrectly represented Clarke to be the duly authorised agent of the company, were personally liable to the bank for such damage as occurred to them through acting upon such representation. The sum for which the verdict now stands was money paid by the respondents for the appellants at their request and for their benefit. On the facts proved there was evidence to maintain the action, and the judgment on the hearing of the rule was right. The pleas demurred to afforded no answer to the action. Cur. adv. vult.

July 19.—Judgment was delivered by Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.—This was an action of assumpsit brought by the Colonial Bank of Australasia against the defendants who were two of the directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company (Registered). The declaration states that in consideration that the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendants, would honour and pay on account of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company, &c., the drafts or cheques of one Charles Ernest Clarke, to be directed to the plaintiffs, the defendants promised the plaintiffs that the said Charles Ernest Clarke was duly authorised and empowered by the said company to make drafts or cheques for them as their agent; and that the plaintiffs, relying on the promise of the defendants, did honour and pay on account of the said company, divers drafts or cheques of the said Charles Ernest Clarke, directed as aforesaid. It also states that Clarke was not authorised by the company to make the said drafts or cheques as their agent, by reason whereof the plaintiffs lost the amount advanced upon them. To this declaration defences were pleaded, in which the making of the promise by the defendant, the drawing of the cheques, and the payment on account of the company as alleged, were respectively denied, and issue was joined thereon. The statement of the consideration was not expressly traversed, nor the allegation that Clarke was not authorised by the company to make the drafts or cheques as their agent. There were other pleas pleaded by the defendants, which were demurred to on the part of the plaintiffs, but it was conceded that it was not necessary to notice these more particularly. It appears from the evidence given at the trial that, before the month of December 1865, the company had opened an account with the branch bank of the defendants at Matlock, and that cheques were from time to time drawn upon the bank by the then manager of the company, which were duly honoured and paid by the bank on account of the company. The account was overdrawn to the knowledge of the defendants at the time when they signed the following letter, and handed it to Clarke, who gave it to the manager of the bank; "The Manager for the Colonial Bank of Australasia, Matlock. Wood's Point, Dec. 4, 1865. Sir,—We have to inform you that we as directors of the Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company have appointed Mr. Charles Ernest Clarke to be legal manager of the company, and have authorised him to draw cheques upon the account of the said company. We remain, &c., THOS. CHERRY, JOHN McDOUGALL, Directors, Loch Fyne Quartz Mining Company (Registered)." After this letter was deposited by Clarke with the manager of the bank, advances were continued by the bank on cheques drawn by Clarke, purporting to bind the company. These cheques were duly honoured by the bank on the faith of this letter. Under the 21st section of the Colonial Act the credit of the company could have been pledged for advances on overdrafts, provided the borrowing had been authorised by a majority of the shareholders, but not otherwise. No evidence was offered to prove that such authority was given. The case proceeded on the assumption that Clarke had not authority to bind the company by the cheques which he drew. There was no imputation of fraud in the transaction. It was contended by Mr. Mellish, that on the face of the letter it appeared that the defendants acted merely as directors of the company, and never meant to bind themselves otherwise than as directors; that, therefore, they cannot be made personally liable. If the question was, whether the defendants in fact intended to bind themselves personally, it might be admitted that such was not their intention. But it remains to be considered whether upon the view which the jury were entitled to take of the evidence, the law does not imply a warranty to the bank, on the part of the defendants, that Clarke had authority to bind the company so as to make them responsible to the bank for the advances on the cheques. In the case of Downman v. Williams, 7 Q. B. 111, Tindal, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, states, that where a contract appears upon its legal construction to have been entered into by an agent on behalf of his principal, the only ground on which the agent could become personally liable thereon is that which has been stated by Story, J. in his commentaries on the law of agency (7th edit. p. 311, c. x., s. 264). The ground therein stated is said to be "a plain principle of justice; for every person so acting for another, by a natural if not by a necessary implication, holds himself out as having competent authority to do the act, and thereby draws the other party into his reciprocal engagement." According to the opinion of that eminent jurist, if a person represents himself as having authority to do an act when he has not, and the other side is drawn into a contract with him, and the contract becomes void for want of such authority, he is liable for the damage which may result to the party who confided in the representation, whether the party making it acted with a knowledge of its falsity or not. "In short," says Story, J. "he undertakes for the truth of his representation" (ubi sup. p. 312, note). This doctrine of an implied warranty in such cases seems to have met with the approval of the learned judges who decided the case of Lewis v. Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 511, 513, &c., although expressed with some reserve, as it was not necessary for them to decide the question. It became necessary to decide it in the case of Collen v. Wright, and the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in that case (8 E. & B. 647) must be considered to have settled the law upon the subject, in conformity with the view of Story, J. The remedy by a special action, where there is fraud or deceit, is a distinct matter, upon which no question is made. It appears to their Lordships that there was evidence upon which it was open to the jury to find that the defendants, professing to act on behalf of the company, had led the plaintiffs to believe that Clarke had authority to draw cheques as the agent of the company, and thereby induced the bank to make advances on the cheques, on the supposition that, as between the bank and the company, the latter was bound. It can make no difference that the engagement into which the plaintiffs were thus drawn by the defendants has to be collected by inference from the evidence laid before the jury. When it has been ascertained, as a matter of fact, the legal effect is the same as if it had been express. The warranty which the law implies depends on the position of the parties, and on the nature and effect of the representation. The representation in this case was admitted on the record to be untrue. Their Lordships agree with the judges of the Supreme Court in thinking that, in this state of things, the law implies the warranty or undertaking on the part of the defendants, as stated in the declaration, and that there was no ground for entering a nonsuit. Their Lordships will therefore humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court should be affirmed with costs.

Money handed to another for an immoral purpose—Action to recover it back—Maxim of "In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis."

The law will not assist a party to recover back property which he has paid or handed over in pursuance of an illegal or immoral contract. Where, therefore, the plaintiff declared upon a bailment of the half of a 50l. bank-note, to which the defendant pleaded and justified the detention of the note as a security for payment of 20l. due from the plaintiff; to which the plaintiff replied that the alleged debt to the defendant was for wine and suppers supplied by the defendant in a brothel and disorderly house kept by the defendant, for the purpose of being consumed there by the plaintiff and divers prostitutes in a debauch to incite them to riotous, disorderly, and immoral conduct:

Held, that the maxim of "In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" applied, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

This was a demurrer to a replication. The declaration stated that in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, delivered to the defendant the half of a promissory-note of certain bankers for the sum of 50*l.*, to be safely kept and taken care of by the defendant, and to be redelivered by the defendant to the plaintiff on request, the defendant promised the plaintiff to safely keep and take care of the half note and redeliver the same to the plaintiff on request. The breach alleged was the non-delivery of the same to the plaintiff on request. There was a second count in detinue.

The defendant pleaded, first, the general issue.

Secondly, as a plea to the first count, that the alleged agreement was subject to the term or condition that the half note was to be kept by the defendant as a pledge or security for the payment of 20*l.* then due from the plaintiff to the defendant, and that the defendant received the half note for this purpose, and that the plaintiff would not pay the defendant the sum of 20*l.*, and that the defendant was prevented from performing her agreement by the neglect and default of the plaintiff.

The defendant pleaded a similar plea to the second count.

The plaintiff replied to both pleas that the alleged debts in respect of which the defendant justified the non-delivery and detention of the security claimed by the plaintiff, were due for wine and suppers supplied by the defendant in a brothel and disorderly house kept by the defendant, for the purpose of being consumed there by the plaintiff and divers prostitutes in a debauch, to incite them to riotous, disorderly, and immoral conduct, and for money knowingly lent for the purpose of being expended in riot and debauchery and immoral conduct in a brothel.

To this replication the defendant demurred.

Hopwood (Holker, Q. C. with him) appeared for the defendant in support of the demurrer.

Herschell (Pope with him) appeared contra.

The judgment of the court is so copious that it is unnecessary to give the arguments of counsel at length.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25.—MELLOR, J.—On the trial before me at Manchester, the case of the plaintiff was, that the note had not been deposited at all with the defendant, but had been fraudulently taken and appropriated by her. The jury, however, did not adopt that view of the facts, but found that the note was deposited by way of security as alleged by the defendant, and they further found upon the evidence that the debt was incurred, and the money advanced as alleged in the plaintiff's replication to the special pleas. On these findings the verdict was entered for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him for 50*l.*, to be reduced to nominal damages in case the note should be restored to the plaintiff. A rule was accordingly obtained to enter the verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that the jury had found all the issues tendered by the plaintiff in his favour. This rule and the demurrer to the replication came on together for argument at the sittings in banco after last Hilary Term before my brother Hannen and myself, and at the close of the argument we took time to consider our judgment. It was argued on the part of the defendant in showing cause against the rule, and in support of the demurrer to the special replication of the plaintiff, that upon the finding of the jury and the facts, as admitted by the demurrer, the plaintiff and defendant were "in pari delicto," and that therefore upon the whole record judgment must be entered for the defendant. On the part of the plaintiff it was urged that it was the defendant who was relying on the illegality of the transaction as an answer to a claim of the plaintiff founded on his ownership of the note, and his right to recover back the same, and many startling consequences were pointed out to us as likely to result from a decision that the plaintiff could not recover. We have fully considered the case, and are satisfied that the plaintiff cannot recover under the circumstances found by the jury, and admitted on the record. The maxim that "In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis," is as thoroughly settled as any proposition of law can be. It is a maxim of law established not for the benefit of plaintiffs or defendants, but is founded on the principle of public policy which will not assist a plaintiff who has paid over money, or handed over property in pursuance of an illegal or immoral contract to recover it back; for the court will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect. Lord Ellenborough in Edgar v. Fowler, 3 East, 22; Collins v. Blantin, 2 Wils. 34; Lord Mansfield in Holman v. Johnson, Comp. 343.) The true test for determining whether or not the plaintiff and defendant were in pari delicto is by considering whether the plaintiff could make out his case otherwise than through the medium and by the aid of the illegal transaction to which he was himself a party: (Simpson v. Bloss, 7 Taunt. 246; Fivaz v. Nicholls, 2 C. B. 501, 512.) It is to be observed that in this case the illegality is not in a collateral matter as in the case of Feret v. Still, 15 C. B. 207, which was cited for the plaintiff, but is the direct result of the transaction upon which the deposit of the half note took place. Mr. Herschell's argument was based upon the hypothesis that, in spite of the findings of the jury, the plaintiff was entitled to recover by virtue of his property in the half note, and that it was the defendant alone who set up an immoral transaction as the answer to the plaintiff's claim. This argument appears to us to be founded upon an entirely erroneous view of the facts. The plaintiff no doubt was the owner of the note, but he pledged it by way of security for the price of meat and drink provided for and money advanced to him by the defendant. Had the case rested there and no pleading raised the question of illegality, a valid pledge would have been created and a special property conferred upon the defendant in the half note, and the plaintiff could only have recovered by showing payment or a tender of the amount due. In order to get rid of the defence arising from the plea which set up an existing pledge of the half note, the plaintiff had recourse to the special replication in which he was obliged to set forth the immoral and illegal character of the contract upon which the half note had been deposited. It was therefore impossible for him to recover except through the medium and by the aid of an illegal transaction to which he was himself a party. Under such circumstances the maxim "In pari delicto potior est conditio possidentis" clearly applies, and is decisive of the case. It would also appear, from the case of Scarfe v. Morgan, 4 M. & W. 281, per Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court, p. 282, that, notwithstanding the illegality of the transaction itself out of which the deposit in this case arose, the lien would exist, because the contract was executed, and the special property had passed by the delivery of the half-note to the defendant, and the maxim would apply. It is, however, difficult in the present case to determine it on the ground that the plaintiff could not recover without showing the true character of the deposit, and that being upon an illegal consideration, to which he was himself a party, he was precluded from obtaining the assistance of the law to recover it back. It is not necessary to consider what might have been the effect of a tender of the amount for which the note was pledged, as there is nothing to raise any such question in this case. The result, therefore, will be that the verdict must stand for the defendant on the issues taken in the special pleas, and for the plaintiff on the issue taken on the replication; but as upon the whole record it is manifest that the plaintiff cannot recover, judgment will be entered for the defendant.

SALTER v. WALKER.

Seduction—Relationship of master and servant—Plea of "not guilty"—Evidence of pecuniary means.

In an action for seduction, the plea of "not guilty" does not put in issue the relationship of master and servant. If, therefore, it is intended to dispute the existence of this relationship it must be specially pleaded.

Quære, whether in such an action evidence is admissible of the defendant's specific pecuniary means:

Held, however, that general evidence of his condition in life is unobjectionable.

This was an action for seduction tried at the last assizes for Devon, before Keating, J., when the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with 50*l.* damages, the learned judge having reserved to the defendant leave to move to enter a nonsuit or for a new trial, on the ground of the improper reception of evidence. The defendant pleaded "not guilty" only.

It appeared upon the trial that Mary, the eldest daughter of the plaintiff, carried on the business of a dressmaker, and that her mother (the plaintiff) and Sarah, the second daughter of the plaintiff, lived with her and assisted in the household duties. The house in which they lived was taken by the mother, but the rent and all the expenses were paid by the eldest daughter, who acted as the head of the family. There was no evidence to show any services performed for her mother by the second daughter Sarah, in respect of whose seduction the action was brought. This daughter having been debauched by the defendant, and having been delivered of a child, her mother brought the present action.

Prideaux, Q. C. now moved pursuant to leave as aforesaid. To sustain this action, the relationship of master and servant must exist. Here the plaintiff was herself in the capacity of a servant to her eldest daughter, and the second daughter, Sarah, also was serving her sister and not her mother. In Manley v. Field, 29 L. J. 79, C. P., it was held that, in order to support an action by a father for the seduction of his daughter, it is necessary that the relationship of master and servant should subsist between them at the time of the seduction, and the fact that the daughter rendered services in the sense of conferring benefits upon the father is not, of itself, sufficient to constitute such relationship. In that case the defendant pleaded, 1st. Not guilty; 2nd. That the daughter was not the servant of the plaintiff. In giving judgment, Erle, C. J. said: "I think the nonsuit was quite right. There was no evidence that the daughter was the servant of the plaintiff in the sense in which the word 'servant' is used in this declaration. She was herself the head of an establishment of her own, and though she conferred benefits on her father's family, she was not a subordinate member of it, and did not render the plaintiff services for the loss of which this action can be maintained." So, too, Williams, J. says: "I am of the same opinion, and however I may regret that the maintenance of this action should depend upon the question of service or no service, I must abide by the law which makes the relationship of master and servant the foundation of it." In Grinnell v. Wells, 7 Man. & Gr. 1033, Tindall, C. J. says, "The foundation of an action by the father to recover damages against the wrongdoer for the seduction of his daughter, has been uniformly placed from the earliest time hitherto not upon the seduction itself which is a wrongful act of the defendant, but upon the loss of service of the daughter, in which sense he is supposed to have a legal right or interest." In Eager v. Grimwood, 1 Ex. 61, it was also held that an action for seduction cannot be maintained without some proof of a loss of service thereby. Therefore where it appeared that the defendant had debauched the plaintiff's daughter, and that she was delivered of a child, but the jury found that the child was not the defendant's, it was held that they were rightly directed to find a verdict for the defendant. [HANNEN, J.—If the relationship of master and servant exists, the inability to perform services must be assumed.] Here it was in evidence that the daughter was not the servant of her mother, for she was really the servant of her elder sister. [COCKBURN, C. J.—It has been decided that if you wish to put in issue the relationship of master and servant, you must do so by plea, and that it is not sufficient for that purpose to plead the general issue. The case of Torrence v. Gibbins, 5 Q B. 297, is an authority for that.] The defence certainly may be pleaded, but as a loss of service must be proved under the plea of the general issue, it would seem that if it turns out that there is no relationship of master and servant there can be no loss of service. This objection having been taken at the trial, the learned judge was asked to amend by adding such a plea, which he refused to do, and in so refusing, it is submitted that he was wrong. In addition to this, the learned judge improperly admitted evidence of the defendant's circumstances in life. Questions were asked as to the business he was carrying on, and as to his keeping servants and a horse and trap, &c.: (James v. Biddington, 6 C. & P. 589.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. In order to let in evidence of the non-existence of the relationship of master and servant that fact should be specially pleaded. Torrence v. Gibbins is an express authority upon the point, and is a decision binding upon us. It appears, however, that the learned judge at the trial was applied to for leave to add a plea to that effect, and he refused permission, and I think very properly, for when you come to look at the matter in its real substance it will appear that the relationship of master and servant is a mere inducement, and that the real question is the loss of service. If therefore it is intended to traverse the relationship it must be put on record. I think the learned judge was quite right in refusing to add such a plea since it was a mere technicality. The real question was whether or not the daughter became pregnant, and so became a burden. The other question is as to whether it was right to allow evidence to be given of the means of the defendant to pay damages. It is really not necessary in this case to decide whether or not such evidence would have been admissible, for, according to the established practice such general evidence as was given in this case is always admitted. There was no evidence given of precise pecuniary means. It was merely general evidence of the defendant's condition in life.

The other learned judges concurred.

Rule refused.

GODWIN v. FRANCIS.

Agreement in writing—A telegram—The 4th sect. of Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3).

A valid contract for the sale of lands may be made by means of a telegraphic message.

The defendant held himself out to the plaintiff as having authority to sell an estate on behalf of the owners. The plaintiff, by letter, offered a price for it. The defendant gave and signed written instructions to a telegraphic company to send a message to the plaintiff accepting his offer. The company accordingly transmitted the message by their wire, and delivered a copy of it as from the plaintiff to the defendant, and signed by their clerk, to the defendant:

Held, that this message, coupled with the plaintiff's letter, constituted a valid contract within the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3).

The declaration stated that the defendant, by warranting the plaintiff that he was authorised by certain others, to wit, &c., who were interested together with him in a certain estate known as, &c., to sell the same to the plaintiff for a certain sum, to wit, 10,500*l.*, agreed with the plaintiff as for himself and the said others, and procured the plaintiff to agree as with himself, the defendant and the said others, that the defendant and the said others should sell to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, should purchase from the defendant and the said others, the said estate for the sum of 10,500*l.*, and the plaintiff did all things necessary, &c. Yet the defendant was not authorised by the said others to sell, &c., whereby, &c.

The defendant pleaded, 1, a denial of the warranty; 2, a denial that he agreed or procured the plaintiff to agree; and 3, that at the time, &c. he had authority to sell, &c.

The case was tried at Salisbury, at the last summer assizes, before Lush, J. It appeared that the defendant had held himself out to the plaintiff as having authority to sell an estate, and thereupon a correspondence ensued between the plaintiff and the defendant, in the course of which the plaintiff offered to buy the estate for 10,500*l.* In answer to this offer, the defendant sent the following message to the plaintiff: "From B. Francis to Chas. Godwin. Your offer for the L. estate is accepted. Confirm yours by next post" The defendant had taken the usual course in sending this message, having written it out and signed it, and the telegraphic company delivered to the plaintiff a verbatim copy of the message, signed by their clerk. It afterwards turned out that the defendant had not power to sell the estate for 10,500*l.*, and the proper owners of the estate repudiated the bargain that he had made. The plaintiff accordingly brought this action against the defendant for his breach of contract. It resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for 726*l.* 9*s*, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, on the ground that the defendant had not entered into any agreement with the plaintiff for the sale of the estate that was valid within the Statute of Frauds.

Lopes, Q. C. (Bowen with him), moved accordingly.—No agreement in writing was signed by the defendant himself. It is true that he signed his name to the instructions given by him to the telegraph company, but the paper to which he so signed his name was a contract between him and the company to send a message, and was not a contract between him and the plaintiff. The signature, to be binding, must be intended to govern the contract, and this had no such intention. Then, again, the copy of the message that was delivered by the telegraph clerk to the plaintiff may have been signed by the clerk, but the clerk was not the "lawfully authorised" agent of the defendant, nor did he assume to sign as such. Then, again, the defendant only held himself out as the agent for the sale of this estate, and as delegatus non potest delegare, the signature of the clerk was certainly inoperative. [BOVILL, C. J.—That is hardly so. If the defendant had had a general authority to sell for what he thought fit, he could not delegate that authority to another to sell for what that other might think fit. But the case is different here. WILLES, J.—What he did was to give authority to the telegraph company, and the action is brought against him for giving that authority without himself possessing it.] He cited

Pitts v. Beckett, 13 M. & W. 743.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. This action is brought for a breach of warranty. The declaration alleges that the defendant represented himself to the plaintiff as having authority to sell an estate, whereas in point of fact he had no such authority. In order to maintain the action it lies on the plaintiff to show that the defendant contracted with him for the sale of this estate in such a way that, if he had had authority from the vendors to act on their behalf, the vendors would have been bound by his acts. This being so, it is objected on behalf of the defendant that no contract within the Statute of Frauds was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant for the sale of this estate. It appears that certain correspondence took place between the plaintiff and the defendant in which the sum of 10,500*l.* was mentioned as the price that the plaintiff was ready to give for the estate. Under these circumstances the defendant telegraphs to the plaintiff to tell him that he accepts this offer. We must assume that at the trial both the original instructions for the telegram, furnished by the defendant to the telegraph company, and the copy of the telegraphic message, actually delivered by the company's servant to the plaintiff, were put in evidence. This being the case, the point was reserved at the trial, whether these documents constituted an agreement or memorandum of agreement in writing within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. There is no question as to the terms of the proposed contract being in writing, or as to the telegram referring to the terms which had been proposed in the letters that had passed between the parties. We have then first of all the instructions given by the defendant to the telegraph company. These were signed by him. They directed the company to do what is usual in such cases, to transmit the message by the wire, copy it out, and deliver it to the person to whom it is addressed. We have it then that the company is lawfully authorised by the defendant to write out this message and deliver it to the plaintiff, as from the defendant, and the company does this by means of its servants. I am of opinion that this constituted a binding contract between the parties. Independently of all other circumstances, as the telegram was written out and signed by the telegraph clerk acting under the written instructions of the defendants, that is certainly sufficient to satisfy the statute. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that there should be no rule.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether there was a sufficient contract to bind the vendors of the estate, assuming that the defendant had authority from them to sell? It appears that the terms of the proposed contract were fully set forth in the correspondence that passed between the plaintiff and the defendant prior to the sending of the telegram. Instructions for the telegraphic message were signed by the defendant and left by him at the office of the telegraph company. This telegraphic message purported to bind the owners of the estate to sell it to the plaintiff on the terms mentioned in the correspondence that had taken place between the plaintiff and the defendant. A copy of this message was sent by the company to the plaintiff, authenticated by the company in the usual way, and signed by their clerk. If this same message had been sent by the plaintiff by letter through the post, there would be no doubt about the matter. Why, then, should there be in this case? The message is sufficiently stamped with the character of part of the correspondence to make it part of an agreement by which both parties are bound. Justice must be halt, indeed, if it cannot adapt itself to the altered circumstances of the day.

BRETT, J.—We must take it that both the instructions for the telegram and the telegram itself were put in evidence at the trial. This being so, the substance of this action is, that the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiff so as to bind certain parties to sell an estate to the plaintiff, the defendant warranting that he had authority from those parties to sell the estate, and that this contract could not be enforced against these proposed vendors, because the defendant had no authority to bind them. It is then objected, on behalf of the defendant, that he entered into no such contract. The only evidence of the contract is the telegram, and the instructions for the same, and it is objected that this is not sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The signature of the defendant on the instructions for the telegraphic message is not the signature to a contract, it is only mandatory to the telegraph company. But we must take it as against the defendant that he intended this signature as his signature to a contract, and what he did was to deposit a message with his signature at the telegraph company's office, with instructions to the company to deal with it in the ordinary course of their business. The company accordingly transmitted and delivered a copy of the message, signed by one of its clerks, to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the defendant had made the company his agent to sign this message for him, and as it was signed by the company's servant on behalf of the defendant, nothing more is required to make a binding contract. If, then, the defendant had no authority from the owners of the estate to enter into this contract, the action will well lie against him.

Rule refused.

VIVIAN v. THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD.

Ship sunk in the port of Liverpool—Expenses of removing obstruction—Liability of owners of cargo.

By the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) s. 59, the defendants are empowered to destroy wrecks or vessels sunk within the port of Liverpool that are obstructions to navigation; and they may also remove any stone, timbers, anchors, or other obstructions or impediments to such navigation that may be found or arise therein; and in case the master or owner of such vessel or other obstruction shall refuse or neglect to pay the charge of removing the same, the board may sell the same, and out of the proceeds of such sale, retain the expenses incurred in raising, destroying, and removing such wrecks or other obstruction, rendering the overplus to the person entitled to the same:

Held, that if the cargo in a sunken ship be included in the terms of this section (of which the court expressed some doubt), the power to detain for the expense of removing an obstruction is to be read distributively, and the owners of cargo, the plaintiffs in this case, could be liable only for the cost of raising their goods, and not of destroying the hull of the ship.

This was an action which was commenced on 17th June 1868, and was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover damages for the refusal of the defendants to deliver up to the plaintiffs certain goods of the plaintiffs', which formed part of the cargo of a vessel called the Swansea, and by the consent of the parties and by order the following case was stated for the opinion of the court without pleadings:

On the 21st Dec. 1867 the steamship Swansea came into collision with a steamer called the Mag- netic, and was sunk in the Mersey, within the port of Liverpool, and was, and continued to be, when so sunk, an obstruction to the safe and convenient navigation of the port.

The Swansea, at the time she was sunk, belonged to Mr. John Bacon, of Liverpool, and had on board a cargo consisting, amongst other goods, of silver and copper ores, and barilla, a portion of which belonged to the plaintiffs.

The defendants are a corporate body, constituted under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii, Local Act), to which either party is to be at liberty to refer on the argument of this case.

By sect. 59 of the said statute it is provided:

The board may raise, destroy, remove, and take away any wrecks of vessels, and any vessels that shall be sunk in any dock or elsewhere within the port of Liverpool, or any of the sea channels leading thereto, and be in their judgment an obstruction to the safe and convenient navigation or use thereof, and may also remove any stone, timbers, anchors, or other obstructions or impediments to such navigation that may be found or arise therein; and in case the master or owner of such vessel or other obstruction shall refuse or neglect to pay the charge of removing the same for the space of three days after demand, or in case any such master or owner cannot be found, then the board may sell the same, and out of the proceeds of such sale retain the expenses incurred in raising, destroying, and removing such wrecks or other obstructions, and the charges of such detainer and sale, tendering the overplus to the person entitled to the same; and if from such proceeds sufficient to pay all the aforesaid charges shall not be recovered, then the deficiency shall be recoverable from the master or owner of such vessel or articles so raised, destroyed, or removed, in like manner as penalties are by this Act authorised to be recovered.

Shortly after the sinking of the Swansea arrangements were made on the part of the plaintiffs with the Liverpool Steamtug Company for the recovery of their goods by removing and raising them from the wreck of the Swansea. Under these arrangements, 218 bags of barilla being a portion of the plaintiffs' goods, were raised and landed, and a further portion might have been raised and recovered under the aforesaid arrangements, when the defendants took possession of the wreck, and claimed the exclusive right of dealing with the Swansea and the cargo on board of her.

The said 218 bags of barilla have been delivered to the plaintiffs.

The defendants so intervened and took possession of the wreck as after mentioned with a view of removing with all possible despatch the obstruction which the wreck of the Swansea caused to the safe and convenient navigation of the port of Liverpool.

In answer to the complaints of the plaintiffs with reference to these proceedings of the defendants, the following letter was written and sent to the plaintiffs on behalf of the defendants:

Marine Surveyor's Office, 28th Dec. 1867.
Swansea.

Dear Sir,—Referring to the subject of our interview this morning, I beg to inform you that, after full consideration of the circumstances of the case, I feel that I cannot properly delay any longer the making of such arrangements as may be necessary for the removal or destruction of the wreck. Referring to your mention of the Messrs. Vivian, I beg to say that I cannot regard their interest in the matter. The cargo as one of the incidents of the wreck is liable along with the rest for the expenses of removal. Incidentally to such removal, I may find it necessary to raise some part of the cargo in the first instance, and if any persons claiming to act for owners or consignees of cargo wish to interfere, they must furnish me with a sufficient indemnity to cover all expenses that I may eventually incur in the removal or destruction of the hull.—Yours truly,

GRAHAM H. HILL.

The Messrs. Vivian mentioned in this letter are the plaintiffs. The indemnity mentioned in this letter was not given by the plaintiffs.

A few days after, the defendants took possession of the wreck of the Swansea as aforementioned. They ordered a survey to be held, and as it was found that the sand had banked round the vessel to such an extent that it was impossible to get chains under her so as to raise her, the defendants determined to lighten her of some of her cargo. Accordingly, on or about the 1st Jan. 1868, the defendants proceeded to remove portions of the cargo from the wreck and to bring them ashore, and continued doing so until the 22nd day of that month.

Between the 1st and the 22nd Jan. the defendants raised and landed, as aforementioned, a certain portion of the plaintiffs' goods, namely the goods which are the subject matter of this action; and the expenses which they incurred in so doing amounted to 294*l.* 14*s.*

On the 22nd Jan. the tides no longer suited for the raising of cargo, on account of its being low water at night. On the 30th Jan. the tide again answered, but it was found that the hatchway, from which the goods had been previously removed, was filled up with sand, and the defendants, who expected that if they opened another hatchway it would likewise in a very short time fill with sand, resolved to abandon, and did abandon all attempts to remove and raise any more cargo.

After having wholly abandoned as aforementioned all attempts to remove any more cargo, the defendants proceeded, in Feb. 1868, to make attempts to raise the wreck by means of chains which were placed under the vessel, and these attempts were continued until the following July, but met with no success.

In the month of May 1868 the plaintiffs applied to the defendants for the delivery of such of their goods as had been raised and landed as aforementioned by the defendants between the 1st and 22nd Jan., and at the same time tendered to the defendants the sum of 294*l.* 14*s.*, being the expenses which the defendants had incurred as aforementioned, in raising and landing those goods.

The defendants refused this tender, and also refused to deliver the said goods to the plaintiffs, but made to them the proposal contained in the following letter:

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.
Marine Surveyor's Office, Liverpool, 4th May, 1868.
Wreck Swansea.

Sir,—Your letter of the 7th March, offering to pay charges on certain cargo removed from the wreck of the steamer Swansea, sunk in the channel of the Mersey, or to guarantee whatever may be found to be due (together with the several representations made to me on your behalf by Capt. Edgell), has been considered by the Marine Committee of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and I am instructed to reply thereto.

Your letter states generally your authorisation as representative of owners and underwriters of Swansea cargo, without specifying the particulars of cargo subject to such authority, therefore it is assumed, subject to your correction, that you represent the owner's interest in the whole of the cargo shipped for the Messrs. Vivian, which, according to the best information I can obtain was nearly as follows:—

	Tons	Cwts.
Copper ore in bulk	285	0
Do. barilla in bags	29	0
Silver ore	5	18
Total	319	18

And of this cargo the portion removed from the wreck, and now in the custody of the board is,

Copper ore in bulk, estimated at	0	1¾
Do. barilla in bags, do.	16	12
Silver ore do.	3	5
Total estimated	19	18¾

So that of the whole cargo included in your ownership only about 1-15th has been removed, and 14-15ths still remain as an obstruction in the channel.

Under these circumstances it is impossible at present to render account of what may be found to be due from the owners of the cargo, but as further proceedings must necessarily be tedious, the marine committee have instructed me to say that they are anxious to meet as far as possible the wishes of the owners, and that, provided public funds intrusted to their administration are properly protected, they will not object to the delivery up to you of a portion of cargo in their custody. By inquiry of the agent of Messrs. Vivian and others interested, the value of the Swansea cargo has been approximately ascertained, and it appears that the portion now in custody of the board for which you claim is worth nearly 1200*l.*

The portion of expenses already incurred, calculated ratably according to that value, amounts to 294*l.* 14*s.*, or in round numbers 300*l.*, and the committee are of opinion that if in addition to that sum a like amount were paid down to cover the risk of deficiency in removing and realising the remainder of the property which you claim to represent, the justice of the case would be met; and upon such payment they would be willing to release from all lien the cargo now in the board's custody; the proposed sum of 600*l.* to be carried to account to be ultimately dealt with according as the final result may show either surplus or deficiency.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

GRAHAM H. HILL, Marine Surveyor.

The plaintiffs did not accept this proposal.

On the 26th May 1868 Mr. Squarey, the solicitor of the defendants, wrote and sent to the solicitors of the plaintiffs the following letter:

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.
Solicitor's Department, Liverpool, 26th May 1868.
Copper, Ex Swansea.

Dear Sirs,—In this case the board removed from the sunken hull of the Swansea a quantity of ore, of which a portion is, as I am informed, the property of Messrs. Vivian. The board are still working upon the hull, which is believed still to contain a further quantity of ore also belonging to Messrs. Vivian, forming part of the same shipment with that which was removed from the hull in the first instance, and it is quite possible that further quantities of Messrs. Vivian's ore may be removed from the hull. Under these circumstances, I submit that the operation must be regarded as still pending, and that the board cannot reasonably be required to give up the portion already removed until they have finished the work, and are in a position to render a statement of the entire charges properly applicable to the cargo removed.

You will, I think, agree with me that where the process of removing cargo is going on day by day, it would not be reasonable that the owner should, at the end of any day, be able to come to the board and say, "Here is the money you have spent to-day in removing this particular bit of my cargo, which is very valuable; give it to me," when on the following day the cargo removed might not be worth half the sum expended in getting it. I will admit that a tender of 300*l.* was made to the marine surveyor of the board in respect of the expenses incurred in removing a portion of Messrs. Vivian's cargo which had been obtained up to that time. If you determine to sue, yor may issue your writ against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and send it to me.—Yours truly A. T. SQUAREY.

Messrs. Waltons and Bubb, Bucklersbury, London.

All the attempts which were made as aforesaid between February and July 1868 to raise the wreck by means of chains proved wholly ineffectual.

Between the 22nd Jan. and the 13th July 1868 no cargo whatsoever was raised by the defendants. In fact, they did not during that time make any attempt, or contemplate making any attempt, to remove from the wreck, or raise separate from the wreck, any goods whatsoever, and no inference to the contrary is to be drawn from the afore-mentioned letter of the 26th May 1868.

In July 1868 the attempts to raise the Swansea by means of chains having wholly failed, the defendants determined to blow up the wreck, and accordingly commenced blasting operations on the 13th July 1868. These operations were continued as the weather and tides permitted, until the 9th of the following November, by which time the whole of the wreck including cargo was blown up, with the exception of certain goods which were during the blasting operations removed from the vessel as hereinafter mentioned.

During the aforesaid blasting operations, as parts of the vessel were blown up, and as portions of the cargo on board became exposed, such goods as could be readily got at were removed from the vessel and brought ashore. These goods, amounting in value to about 212*l.*, included some of the plaintiff's goods, which, however, are not the subject-matter of this action. The whole of the expenses incurred by the defendants in blowing up and removing the wreck of the vessel and cargo amounted to 4485*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* No part of this expense was incurred separately or specifically in and about the recovery of the goods which were brought ashore during the blasting operations; but if the defendants had not saved these goods by removing them from the Swansea and bringing them ashore, the total expenses incurred by them as aforementioned would have been less than the said sum of 4485*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* by a sum of about 40*l.* or 50*l.*

On the 20th Nov. 1868, after the whole of the wreck had been blown up and removed as aforementioned, the defendants wrote and sent the following letter to J. Bacon, Esq., the owner of Swansea:

Marine Surveyor's Office, Liverpool,
20th Nov. 1868.

Sir,—I beg to inform you that subsequently to the notice which I gave you on the 21st Dec. 1867, of the danger caused to navigation by the sinking of your steamer Swansea in the Crosby Channel; as no steps were taken by yourself for the removal of the obstructions, the water bailiff of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board proceeded under my direction, and with the sanction of the commissioners for the Mersey Conservancy, with the operations necessary for the safety of navigation. These proceedings have now been completed by the total destruction of the vessel.

For the charges incurred in abating this obstruction to the navigation of the Mersey, the owners are liable to this board.

The charges incurred, including an estimated per centage to be paid to the Liverpool Steam Tug Company, and the value, when ascertained, of a quantity of ore saved from the wreck, amount to 456*l.* 15*s* 9*d*, which has been reduced by a payment made by the underwriters of a part of the cargo on a cask of silver ore, and by sale of some old materials recovered from the wreck, to 4515*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*

A tender has also been made by owners of the greater part of the cargo saved of salvage on the said cargo to the amount of 300*l.*, by which the balance is reduced to 4215*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*

I may add for your information that this board has claimed to hold the whole of the cargo saved against the entire charge incurred, but the parties interested in such cargo are contending that cargo is only liable for expenses actually incurred in raising it, and not for expenses incurred on the wreck of the vessel.

This question is now in course of decision; and if the position taken by the board is sustained, the sum payable by you will be reduced by the nett proceeds of the cargo saved.

The value of the cargo involved in the question to which I have referred, may be estimated at 1000*l.*, leaving 3215*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* which will in any case be payable by you to the board.

I have, therefore, to request that this amount may be paid at your convenience to the treasurer, leaving the remainder of the claim open pending the result of the proceedings in respect of the cargo.

Besides the cargo above referred to, chain cable broken in pieces about ninety fathoms, three anchors, and some other articles of trifling value, estimated to be worth altogether about 35*l.*, are lying at the Toxteth Dock, and will be given up to you on your payment of the sum now due and demanded, but otherwise will be sold; the amount credited to the wreck after three days from the date of this notice.—Your obedient servant, GRAHAM H. HILL,

J. Bacon, Esq. Marine Surveyor.

It is agreed that the court shall have power to draw all such inferences of fact as a jury ought to have drawn.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants were entitled, under the powers conferred upon them by the said Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, to refuse to deliver to the plaintiffs the said goods of the plaintiffs which were raised and landed as aforementioned between the 1st and 22nd Jan. 1868.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. (with him J. C. Mathew), argued for the plaintiffs.—The point in dispute between the parties turns entirely upon the 59th section of the Mersey Docks Act, and in that section no power is given to the board to raise the cargo at the expense of the owners of cargo. It may be that the power to remove obstructions authorises the board to raise the cargo in the ship, but the expense of getting it out must by that section come from the proceeds of the vessel. Here the plaintiffs were willing to raise their cargo themselves, or to pay the defendants for doing it, and the amount tendered was sufficient to cover any amount for which they might have been liable for salvage.

Quain, Q. C. (with him Maclachlan) for the defendants.—The objects of the section are two, first, to give power to the board to remove obstructions to navigation; secondly, to recoup the board for their expenses in so doing. By the two cases, Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B., 599, and White v. Crisp, 10 Ex. 312, the liability for injury occasioned by a sunken ship is devolved upon the owner; in this particular port a duty is imposed upon the board to prevent any injury from being caused by such obstructions. The word "wrecks" in the section must mean more than the hulk of the ship; it includes the cargo also. "Wreck of the sea in legal understanding is applied to such goods as after shipwreck at sea are by the sea cast up on the land." Coke, 2nd Inst. 167. The word obstruction throughout the section includes cargo as well as ship.

Honyman, in reply, referred to the 326th and 328th sections of the Act, which give penalties for not removing obstructions within three months.

Nov. 11.—BOVILL, C.J.—In this case, which was argued yesterday, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment. The question argued was whether the defendants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, were entitled to refuse to deliver to the plaintiffs the goods belonging to them, which the defendants had raised from the Swansea, a ship which had sunk in the Mersey and become an obstruction to the navigation. The goods were detained by the defendants as security for the expenses incurred by them, not only in raising the cargo, but also in destroying the ship. I am of opinion that the defendants were not entitled so to refuse to give up the plaintiffs' goods. The case was argued entirely upon the construction of the 59th section of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858, and it was contended that under and by force of that section the defendants were entitled to a lien upon the cargo saved, for the expenses not only of recovering the cargo, but also of recovering or destroying the ship. No doubt there is considerable difficulty in interpreting the section so as to make the different parts of it consistent, but there is nothing in it, from beginning to end, in my opinion, to support the argument of the defendants. Assuming they are right in their argument, that cargo is included in the first branch of the section, and the board has authority to remove cargo which is an obstruction or impediment to the navigation, it is not necessary to hold that the board are entitled to detain and sell the cargo to pay the expenses of removing or destroying the whole obstruction. I think those expenses, if the owner of cargo be liable for them at all, must be limited to the expenses of raising the cargo itself. The section was probably framed with some relation to the general law; it seems to refer to vessels and obtructions in a portion of the navigation where there would be some impediment created to that navigation, and where, consequently, there would be some means of removing the impediment. A vessel, therefore, may well be in a position in which the owners might exercise control, and be liable, in accordance with the cases in this court and the Exchequer, to which reference has been made, Brown v. Mallett, and White v. Crisp, which decided that the owner of a sunken ship is liable for the injuries she may cause other ships, if he continues in possession and control of his ship; and with regard to the cargo, we have to consider the right which is frequently exercised against the owners, viz., the claim for salvage; this, however, is covered by the sum of money which has been tendered by the plaintiffs and refused by the defendants. Many arguments were brought before us to establish that "other obstructions or impediments to navigation" included cargo sunk in ships. Without expressing any opinion on this point, but assuming that cargo is within the meaning of this part of the section, it seems to me that in any view the expenses for which the owner of cargo is liable should be confined to the cost of raising the cargo. I am of opinion, therefore, that our judgment should be in favour of the plaintiffs.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs insisted that cargo was not within the terms of the section at all, but if they were wrong in that they further maintained that at all events the power given to the board to sell and detain must be read against the owner of the cargo only so far as the board incurred expenses in raising the cargo itself; and that the expenses of raising or destroying the ship, after the cargo had been recovered, could not be obtained from the owner of cargo. On the other hand, two propositions were necessarily contended for by the defendants; first, that cargo came within the terms of the section; and secondly, that the power to sell and detain was general against all owners of ship and cargo for the removal of the whole obstruction. But even if we treat the ship and cargo as one obstruction, so as to create what we may call without pedantry a solidarité between all the owners of ship and cargo, yet it does not follow that the defendants' contention is right, for the plaintiffs who are owners of cargo here offered to pay the expenses of raising their goods, but the defendants refused to give up the cargo without receiving from the plaintiffs the expenses of raising or destroying the ship. Assuming the section to refer to cargo, and if not there is immediately an end of the defendants' case, I think the power to detain for expense of removing obstructions should be read distributively, and the plaintiffs are liable only for the cost of raising their goods, and upon the payment of that cost should be entitled to their property. If this be the true construction of the section, I am of opinion that our judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs.

KEATING, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. No doubt there is some difficulty in construing the section, but it is unnecessary to decide the main question raised, for assuming, with the defendants, that cargo is within the section, the power to detain the cargo would be limited to a lien for the expense of raising the cargo only. Mr. Quain suggested a difficulty which might arise if there were a variety of owners of cargo; no doubt it might be a complicated matter to distribute the expenses, but it would not present difficulties greater than others which are frequently overcome by public staters in the ordinary proceedings of settling contributions. This, therefore, can be no objection to the conclusion we have arrived at, which seems to me to be in accordance with the equitable view of the case.

BRETT, J.—I should be very sorry to come to a decision which should limit the board's control over the navigation of the Mersey, because I believe they have always exercised their powers for the benefit of the public. It may be difficult to see how cargo is within the terms of the section at all, but it is impossible to hold with the defendants that it is included in the latter part of the section. Besides being in accordance with the words of the Act, it seems to me that the construction we put is the most equitable way of dealing with the matter.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. Leigh and E. Lumley, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Nov. 6.

Luckin v. Hamlyn.

Bill of sale—17 & 18 Vict. c. 36—Occupation—Sufficient description of.

The "occupation" of the person making or giving a bill of sale within the 1st section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, means the ordinary business or calling in life of such person, by reference to which he may be identified:

Held, therefore, that a woman who, at the time of giving a bill of sale, carried on a farm, which had belonged to her deceased husband, merely as his executrix, and not with a view to taking permanently to it, and had no other occupation, need not be described as a "farmer" in the affidavit filed under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, s. 1, but was sufficiently described as a "widow."

This was an interpleader issue between the plaintiff, the assignee under a bill of sale, and an execution creditor. At the trial the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, subject to leave to move to enter it for the defendant, on the ground that the maker of the bill of sale had been insufficiently described in the affidavit required by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, s. 1 (The Act for Preventing Frauds upon Creditors by secret Bills of Sale of Personal Chattels).

That section enacts that every bill of sale of personal chattels, &c., and every schedule or inventory annexed thereto, or therein referred to, or a true copy thereof and of every attestation of the execution thereof shall, together with an affidavit of the time of such bill of sale being made or given, and a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the same, or in case the same shall be made or given by any person under or in the execution of any process, then a description of the residence and occupation of the person against whom such process shall have issued, and of every attesting witness to such bill of sale, be filed with the officer acting as clerk of the docquets and judgments in the Court of Queen's Bench, within twenty-one days after the making or giving of such bill of sale, otherwise, &c.

The maker of the bill of sale was described as a "widow," and the contention of the defendant was that she should have been described as a "farmer." It appeared that her husband and she had been master and matron of a workhouse, and that three months before her husband's death, which occurred in 1868, he had taken a farm. The widow was left by his will executrix and universal legatee. The bill of sale was made to the plaintiff, who had supplied the widow with goods, in Jan. 1869.

It appeared from the evidence of the widow herself and her bailiff, that she had come to the farm, which was a little distance from the place where she lived, at intervals of about a fortnight, and stayed there a day or two; that she had paid wages to persons employed on the farm, caused winter crops to be sown, and given general directions, but up to March she said she had no intention of permanently carrying on the farm, but had only carried it on as executrix until it might be disposed of. One of her neighbours stated in evidence that she carried on no business at the time of the giving of the bill of sale.

Parry, Serjt. now moved for a rule nisi, in accordance with the leave reserved. He contended that the provision of the Act of Parliament had not been complied with, inasmuch as the word "widow" did not describe an occupation, and that the maker of the bill of sale ought to have been described as a farmer, as she was at the time of the making of the bill engaged in carrying on the farm. He cited, Allen v. Thompson, 25 L. J. 249, Ex.

Kelly, C.B.—This is a question of the meaning to be put upon the word "occupation" in the Act of Parliament. In my opinion, it means the trade or calling by which the maker of the bill of sale ordinarily seeks to get his livelihood. In this case the maker of the bill of sale had been married a short time to the master of a workhouse, who, a month or so before his death, had taken a farm, and who died leaving the farm as part of his assets. It thus came into her hands as executrix of his will, and she was put to the alternative of abandoning it altogether, or sowing it with seed and cultivating it till disposed of. She did not do this personally, her previous life and habits rendering her incapable of so doing; but she employed a bailiff to carry on the farm for her. I do not think she could be, with the least propriety, described as a farmer; she did not carry on the business of farming as her ordinary means of livelihood, and that, I think, is what the Act means by the term "occupation."

Martin, B.—The word "occupation" in this Act means the business in which a man is usually engaged to the knowledge of his neighbours. The intention is, that such a description should be given that if inquiry be made in the place where the person resides, he may be easily identified. I am quite sure if this woman had been inquired for in her place of residence as a farmer, that it would only have tended to mislead. One of her neighbours himself said in his evidence that she did not carry on any business. I am quite satisfied on the evidence that this woman was no more a farmer within the meaning of Act than I am.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Will—Bequests identical with trusts of marriage settlement.

A testatrix bequeathed all her estate on the same trusts as those contained in her marriage settlement. The court dispensed with the necessity of incorporating the whole of the settlement in the probate, and required only such extracts as would explain the nature of the bequests.

Sarah Garbett, late of Allenswick, near Hereford, widow, died 20th March 1868, having duly executed her last will and testament, bearing date March 28, 1863. She bequeathed all her freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates to which she was entitled as devisee on the same trusts as her marriage settlement, bearing date Aug. 22, 1863.

Searle now moved for probate of the will without incorporating the settlement.

Lord Penzance.—There have been cases before in which the court has directed so much of the settlement only to be incorporated as was necessary, to show how the residue was disposed of. If your client will turn his attention to making such extracts from the settlement as may be necessary, I will make an order that you shall receive probate without setting out the deed at length, on your giving such a suffi-

ROBERTS v. COWMEADOW.

Testamentary suit—Nude executor—Costs.

A nude executor who propounds a testamentary paper, of the validity of which there is no reasonable primâ facie probability, cannot escape from the liability of being condemned in costs by the fact that he takes no interest under the paper.

Eliza Meek, late of the Victoria Hotel, in the Forest of Dean, died leaving a will dated Dec. 1864, and a codicil dated June 1868. By the will she divided her property equally among her grandchildren, but by the codicil she gave a considerable preference to the family of one of her daughters, Mrs. Tyler. She was upwards of seventy years of age when she died, and very infirm. The will and codicil were propounded by the plaintiff as executor, who took nothing under either. The will was not disputed, but in opposition to the codicil the defendant pleaded incapacity, and that the testatrix did not know and approve of the contents.

The case was tried before Lord Penzance on June 30th, and the court pronounced for the will and against the codicil, and condemned the plaintiff in the costs.

Webster, on behalf of the plaintiff, applied for an order directing the costs to be paid out of the estate. He submitted that there was reasonable ground for propounding the codicil, and that under such circumstances the court never condemned a nude executor in costs. He cited

Rennie v. Massey, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 118;
Dodge v. Mees, 1 Hagg. 112;
Critchell v. Critchell, 32 L. T. Rep. 108.

Lord PENZANCE.—I think this application must be refused. The circumstances of the case showed that there was no reasonable ground for litigation—for the deceased was plainly insane when the codicil was made, and the person who benefited by the codicil knew perfectly well what her state of mind was. She does not come forward and propound the codicil herself, but puts the executor forward to do it. If he has not taken the precaution to get an indemnity from the legatee behind him he must take the consequences. It is his own fault; but he is plainly liable to be condemned in the costs of a litigation for which there was no reasonable ground. If it were otherwise, wills might be successfully litigated every day as regards costs, for all a legatee would have to do would be to put forward the executors to propound a paper which had no pretence to validity. This is what the court held in Rennie v. Massey, and this application, therefore, must be dismissed.

INGALL v. DRAYTON.

Supposed intestacy—Administration granted to wife—Will subsequently discovered and admitted to probate, although prior grant not brought in.

A deceased died as was supposed intestate, and letters of administration were granted to his wife. She realised as much as she could of the estate, and left the country. A will was subsequently discovered, and a citation was issued, calling on her to bring in the letters of administration, which she did not obey.

The court admitted the will to probate, notwithstanding that the letters of administration had not been brought in, but directed the fact that the administration was outstanding to be recited on the probate.

J. Ingall died June 1867. No will was forthcoming, and in July 1867 his wife took out letters of administration of his estate. She realised all the property she could lay her hands on, and shortly afterwards went away to Mexico, without having paid the deceased's debts, or furnished any residuary account. Shortly after her departure, on more diligent search being made, a will was found. There was no property at the time, but on further investigation it turned out that there were between 600*l.* and 700*l.* due to the estate in outstanding accounts. The executors desired to prove the will, and a citation was issued calling on the administratrix to bring in the letters of administration for the purpose of being revoked, but she had not obeyed it.

Bayford now moved that probate might be granted of the will, notwithstanding that the letters of administration had not been brought in.

Lord PENZANCE.—I think it is impossible that your hands should be tied because this woman in Mexico does not bring in the grant of administration. It is inconvenient that there should be two grants out, but that must give way to the consideration of doing justice. The probate when made out will recite on it the fact that the grant of administration is outstanding.

Will—Chain of representation—Will of testator and executor both proved in Ireland—Irish grant resealed in Court of Probate in England—20 & 21 Vict. c. 79, s. 95.

The will of A. was proved by his executor B. in Ireland. B. died, and his executor C. proved his will in Ireland, but had the grant resealed in this country:

The court held that this did not continue the chain of representation, and that C. was not entitled to a grant of administration in this country of the goods of A.'s wife, who died before A.

Bridget Gaynor died at Athlone, in the county of Westmeath, Ireland, June 1841, intestate, leaving Wm. Gaynor, her lawful husband, surviving, who died in 1848, without having taken out letters of administration to his deceased wife. He left a will, which was proved by his executor and residuary legatee, John Gaynor, in the Prerogative Court of Armagh. John Gaynor died in 1865, leaving a will by which he appointed James John Gaynor, George Atkinson, and Wm. Stanley, his executors. They proved this will in the Prerogative Court of Armagh, and subsequently a copy of the Irish probate was resealed in the principal registry of the Court of Probate in England. Bridget Gaynor at the time of her death was not possessed of any property, but she was entitled to sum of 200*l.* at the death of a relative, which happened in 1863.

McMahon, on behalf of William Stanley, the surviving executor of John Gaynor, moved for a grant of administration to the effects and personal estate of Bridget Gaynor, contending that the chain of representation was complete. He cited

Aug. 5.—Lord PENZANCE.—An application was made to the court on Tuesday last for a grant in this case. The intestate, Bridget Gaynor, was the wife of William Gaynor. She predeceased him, and William Gaynor died in 1848, before this court was established. William Gaynor made a will, whereof he appointed John Gaynor executor. John Gaynor proved the will in the Prerogative Court of Armagh in Ireland, but did not prove the will in England. He died, having made his will, by which he appointed three persons his executors. They have proved and they now represent him, and this is an application on their part for a grant of administration of the estate of the deceased wife of William Gaynor, the first testator. The objection which was made to the grant in the registry was in conformity with the practice of the court. The applicant being the executor of John Gaynor, and John Gaynor never having proved the will of his testator in this country, it was said that the chain of representation was broken. It was insisted upon the other side that the effect of John Gaynor having proved the will in Ireland, although it gave him no power over assets in England, was yet sufficient to continue the chain of representation; and that is the question for the court to consider. Now, after the best consideration that I have been able to give to the case, I have come to the conclusion that the applicant is not entitled, and that the chain of representation is not continued. The matter may be simplified by considering it as if it arose during John Gaynor's life. Mrs. William Gaynor having died, her property passed to her husband. He died and made his will, whereof he appointed John Gaynor executor. John Gaynor proved the will in Ireland. Question: Can he take a grant of administration to the goods of Mrs. William Gaynor without first proving William Gaynor's will in this country? And it seems to me that he cannot; for, after all, this system of taking the grant of probate to form the chain of representation is, in fact, nothing but following the interest. Under the Irish probate John Gaynor had no interest or control over the effects of William Gaynor, his testator, in England. That grant gave him no power to deal with such assets, and could certainly give him none. At the time of William Gaynor's death he was possessed of assets in England, namely, his wife's assets; and, therefore, if John Gaynor wished to possess himself of those assets, he must have taken a grant of probate of his testator's will in this country. Having obtained no such grant he was entitled to no control over them. His executors cannot stand in a better position than he stood in. Whatever rights they have are transmitted rights. But if he had no rights himself—if he could not come to this court and ask for this grant, à fortiori, those to whom he has transmitted his rights cannot do it. There are a great many cases that throw considerable doubts upon the matter, but it seems to me that in principle the case of Twyford v. Trail, 1 Sim. 12, the marginal note in which runs thus—"A. died in India, B., one of his executors, proved the will in India. B. died, and C. his executor proved his will in England. C. is not the personal representative of A.," decides the question with which we are now dealing. It was suggested that some sort of difference existed between the full rights of an executor, with which it was conceded the party here was not clothed, seeing that he had only taken the grant in Ireland, and a certain sort of partial rights sufficient to continue the chain of representation. The court, with a view of rendering superfluous grants unnecessary, has very much considered that view of the case, to see if it rests upon any solid foundation, but I am unable to ascertain that it does. Therefore I think that in this case the grant cannot go as moved for. The applicant, however, will have no difficulty in getting a grant, because it turns out that John Gaynor, as well as executor, was also residuary legatee, and therefore through that interest he will be able to get a grant in the ordinary way.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A. DORIA and JOHN FONBLANQUE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Oct. 28.

(Before Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW.)

Re THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

Adjudication—Privilege—4 Geo. 4, c. 33—B. A. 1849, ss. 66 and 87—B. A. 1861, s. 69.

A non-trader, having privilege of Parliament, cannot be made bankrupt.

The Duke of Newcastle moved to set aside an adjudication in bankruptcy made against him.

Reed, for the bankrupt, after some formal objections, referred to in the judgment, contended that the bankrupt's person was privileged from arrest; it would be useless to enforce process against the estate unless the bankrupt could be committed in case of his failing to make the necessary disclosures. In such a case as the present a bankruptcy would be in effect a nullity.

Sargood, Serjt. (with him Bagley), counsel for petitioning creditor, relied upon a dictum of Lord Hardwicke, in Ex parte Meymot, 1 Atk. 20, that a peer who had traded might be made a bankrupt, and upon the abolition of the distinction between trader and non-trader by the Act of 1861, s. 69.

Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW said: This is a petition to adjudge his Grace the Duke of Newcastle bankrupt, and two preliminary objections are taken by Mr. Reed, the counsel for the duke, to the hearing of the petition, and one to the manner in which the petitioner proposes to proceed at the hearing. Although it is not usual to dispose of applications for adjudication in open court on account of the effect it may have upon the parties, yet, as the question now to be decided is one of some public importance, but entirely one of law, and as it has been notorious for some time that these proceedings have been instituted, a departure from the usual course will not, I think, injure the parties in any way. The third objection I do not consider important. The mode of procedure is that provided in the case of a person not a trader. It has been the practice to require a petitioner against a person not a trader to produce some evidence of a debt and act of bankruptcy before the court appoints a day for hearing; otherwise a debtor might be called from the antipodes to answer a petition issued without the proper requisites, and the inconvenience and hardship might be very great. I can conceive cases in which a man might even submit to pay an unjust demand rather than come a long distance to dispute it. The respondent insists that the petitioner should be confined to this evidence, and should not be allowed to produce any other. But this precautionary measure was never intended to prevent a petitioner from producing at the hearing of a petition any evidence he may be able to get in proof of his debt, or of any act of bankruptcy on which the petition can be sustained. It is true that, the petition having been served on the alleged debtor, the petitioner cannot withdraw therefrom, and, by substituting another petitioner, hand the proceedings over to another person. He can no more do that than a plaintiff, having served his writ for the recovery of his debt, can substitute another plaintiff; but the petitioner may at the hearing produce all the evidence in his power. The objections to the hearing the petition are much more important, and are, first, that the duke is not within the jurisdiction as a person capable of being made a bankrupt; secondly, that if he be so, the proper manner of proceeding has not been adopted. These two objections appear to me necessarily to resolve themselves into one proposition, namely, that a person having privilege of Parliament cannot be adjudicated bankrupt unless he be a trader; for I am of opinion that, if the petitioner has not pursued the proper course in this case, there is no other course open to him to obtain adjudication. In determining this question, it will be necessary to consider the law as it stood before the Act of 1861, and the alterations then made. Prior to the 11th Oct. 1861 there was no mode of procedure by which a hostile creditor could have obtained an adjudication of bankruptcy against a person having privilege of Parliament except as a trader. The law as applicable to traders entitled to the privilege was contained in the 66th and 87th sections of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849, which are as follows: "That if any such trader having privilege of Parliament shall commit an act of bankruptcy, he may be dealt with under this Act in like manner as any other trader; but such person shall not be subject to be arrested or be imprisoned during the time of such privilege, except in cases made felonies or misdemeanors by this Act." "That if any creditor or creditors of any such trader having privilege of Parliament to an amount hereinafter declared to be requisite to support a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall file an affidavit in any court of record at Westminster that such debt is justly due to him, and that such debtor as he verily believes is such trader, and shall sue out of the same court a writ of summons in the form contained in Schedule E to this Act annexed against such trader, and serve him with a copy of such summons, if such trader shall not within one month after personal service of such summons, pay, secure, or compound for such debt to the satisfaction of such creditor or creditors, or enter into a bond in such sum and with two sufficient sureties as any of the judges of the court out of which such summons shall issue shall approve of, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in such action, together with such costs as shall be given in the same, and within one month next after personal service of such summons cause an appearance to be entered to such action in the proper court in which the same shall have been brought, every such trader shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy from the time of the service of such summons." Such being the state of the law, the Act of 1861 was passed, one of the objects of which was to make all persons, whether traders or not, liable to be made bankrupt. The provision by which that was sought to be obtained was as follows: As to persons subject to this Act (sect. 69) thus provides "all debtors, whether traders or not, shall be subject to the provisions of this Act; but no debtor who is not a trader shall be adjudged bankrupt, except in respect of some one of the acts of bankruptcy hereinafter described as applicable to non-traders." It is then provided that if certain things be done by persons who are not traders, they should be acts of bankruptcy, and it is upon one of these that this petition is grounded. The petitioner contends that the general words of sect. 69 will include all persons who are entitled to the privilege of Parliament, whether traders or not; while for the respondent it is argued that there must be some special enactment in order to bring persons having the privilege within the bankruptcy law, or at least something to show an intention to include them in the general words. This involves a consideration of previous decisions and legislation upon the subject. The earliest, and, as far as I can ascertain, the only case in point is in a dictum of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in the year 1747, reported 1 Atk. 201, which is as follows: "A commission of bankruptcy formerly issued against a peer, an Earl of Suffolk, for trading in wines; and though there may be some particular powers that commissioners of bankruptcy could not exercise against a peer, yet, notwithstanding this, he may be liable to a commission of bankruptcy if he will trade, and so may a member of the House of Commons, though while he continues a member there are some particular powers of commissioners that cannot be exercised." It is singular that this case has continued to be cited in most of the books of practice, down to the present time, as an authority for the proposition that a peer could be made a bankrupt if he traded; but in the year 1764, the statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, was passed, the preamble to which Act shows the reasons the Legislature had; and, as it appears to me, removes all weight which would otherwise have attached to this case. "Whereas merchants, bankers, brokers, factors, scriveners, and traders within the description of the statutes relating to bankrupts having the privilege of Parliament are not compellable to pay their just debts or to become bankrupts by reason of the freedom of their persons from arrests upon civil process; and some doubts have also arisen whether, in cases of bankruptcy, a commission can be sued out during the continuance of such privilege, to remedy which inconveniences, and to support the honour and dignity of Parliament, and good faith and credit in commercial dealings, which require that in such cases the laws should have their due course, and that no such merchants, bankers, brokers, factors, scriveners, or traders in case of actual insolvency should by any privilege whatever be exempted from doing equal justice to all their creditors—be it enacted, &c." The remedial measures for the first time passed in that Act are substantially the same as those I have mentioned as being contained in sect. 66 and 87 of the Act of 1849; namely, that a creditor was entitled to proceed by filing an affidavit and suing out a summons from a Superior Court, and might thus compel the debtor to commit an act of bankruptcy—a proceeding rendered necessary, because an act of bankruptcy could be obtained by arrest; and in case any other act of bankruptcy had been voluntarily committed, then the creditor might issue a commission of bankruptcy; but the statute provided that in every case the bankrupt should be privileged from all arrest except for a felony, and the Act was limited to creditors whose debts were contracted after 8th March 1764, and to traders who should commit an act of bankruptcy after the last day of that session. Now the Legislature having thus stated the reasons for enacting those laws, it must be presumed, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, that the same reasons influenced Parliament in re-enacting them from time to time, down to the year 1861, when, though the bankruptcy laws were extended, by the general words of sect. 69 which I have cited, to all persons, whether traders or not, yet it was considered necessary to retain the special enactment which extended bankruptcy to persons having privilege of Parliament, if they were traders. But this shows, upon the ordinary rules of construction, that Parliament did not consider that non-traders, having the privilege of Parliament, would be liable to bankruptcy without a special enactment, and that such persons were not intended to be included in the general words of sect. 69. If it had been otherwise, Parliament would no doubt have provided some means in these cases for compelling such a person to commit an act of bankruptcy, and would also have extended to such person that privilege from arrest, except for criminal acts, which it has provided for traders. The Bankruptcy Act of last session may, I think, be referred to, in order to ascertain the intention of the Legislature, although it has not yet come into operation; and by that Act, "If a person, having privilege of Parliament (without any other limitation), commits an act of bankruptcy, he may be dealt with under the Act in like manner as if he had not such privilege." Parliament, which always claims to be the judge of its own privileges, thus still considers a special provision necessary to enable a creditor to proceed in bankruptcy against a person possessing the privilege. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the petition cannot be sustained, and must be dismissed.

Reed applied for costs, as the petition was no doubt an experiment.

Bagley objected.

His HONOUR said, however, that as the duke had been brought before the court upon a petition which had failed, he was entitled to his costs.

PARTINGTON v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Letters of administration—Stamp duty—Accretions of interest—Husband dying without having administered to his wife—Property to be distributed abroad—Construction of fiscal statutes—55 Geo. 3, c. 184, s. 38—Domicile.

In 1819 S., a widow, died intestate, and the Solicitor of the Treasury took out administration to her estate, and received under it 23,821l. In 1823 I. C., the wife of E. C., applied to the Crown, claiming to be next of kin of S., but died in 1825, without establishing her claim. In 1830 E. C. died intestate without having taken any steps to recover the money, and without having administered to his wife. In 1855 administration, by two several grants, was granted to P. in respect of the estates of I. C. and E. C., on behalf of their children. P. instituted a suit in equity to administer to the estate of S., when it was found that J. C. (the son of I. C. and E. C.) was the sole next of kin of S., and it was ordered that the Solicitor to the Treasury should pay to P., as the representative of J. C., the money in his hands, with interest at 4 per cent. I. C., E. C., and J. C. were all resident and domiciled in the United States of America.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber), First, that stamp duty was chargeable on the accretions of interest; for the interest, as an accretion, merged into and became a part of the sum which had to be paid, and the whole amount taken together became the estate in respect of which the administration was granted; and Secondly (Lord Westbury dissentiente), that letters of administration having, in fact, been granted to both I. C. and E. C., the stamp duty must be paid on each administration.

Fiscal statutes must be construed strictly.

Per Lord Westbury dissentientem, the double duty was payable only on the assumption that the estate was twice distributed in this country; an assumption incorrect, because, regard being had to the domicile of the parties, the distribution of the estate was governed exclusively by American law; and, the administration to E. C. being unnecessary, the Stamp office ought not to take advantage of a mistaken form of proceeding.

This was a writ of error brought upon a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, partly affirming and partly reversing a judgment of the Exchequer upon a special case stated between the parties by order of Bramwell, B. for the opinion of that court. The special case will be found in 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 900; shortly the facts stated therein were as follows:—

In 1819, Mrs. Shard, widow, died intestate, and on her death the Crown, by Mr. Maule, the then solicitor to the Treasury, took out administration to the estate, and received under it 23,821*l.*

In 1823, Isabel Cook, the wife of Ellis Cook, both of whom were resident and domiciled in the United States, applied to the Crown, claiming to be next of kin to Mrs. Shard, but died in 1825, without establishing her claim. At this date the estate of Mrs. Shard, legacy duty being deducted, amounted to 22,403*l.*

In 1830, Ellis Cook died intestate without having taken any steps to recover the money, and without having administered to his wife.

In 1855, the children of Ellis and Isabel Cook, who, like their parents, were resident and domiciled in the United States, applied to Mr. Partington, the plaintiff in error, to take proceedings to recover the money from the solicitor to the Treasury, which he proceeded to do, and a personal representative to Isabel Cook's estate being necessary, a power of attorney was made by James Cook, one of the said children, authorising Partington to take out administration to the estates of both Ellis and Isabel Cook. Accordingly grants of administration to both those estates were, in July 1855, severally made to Partington for the use and benefit of James Cook, by virtue of which grants the claim of Partington, as representing James Cook, the representative of Isabel Cook, was allowed by Kindersley, V. C., in a Chancery suit, instituted under the title of Partington v. Reynolds: (see 31 L. T. Rep. 7; 27 L. J. 505, Ch.; 4 Jur. N. S. 200.)

The chief clerk's certificate found that the sum due from Mr. Reynolds, the successor to Mr. Maule, as solicitor of the Treasury, was 23,885*l.*, and Kindersley, V. C., by an order dated June 26th 1858, subsequently declared that 34,124*l.* should be added thereto, as interest at 4 per cent. per annum on the above sum, and that the whole amount should be paid over to Partington.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue thereupon claimed that the stamp duty should bear a value including all accretions, from the death of Isabel Cook to the date of administration in 1855, and also claimed that the grant of administration for the effects of Ellis Cook, who survived his wife, should be stamped at the same rate.

Judgment was to be entered for the Crown, without costs, for such an amount of duty as should appear to be due, according to the opinion of the court upon the above facts, the questions for the opinion of the court being: First, what probate duty is payable in respect of the estate of Isabel Cook? Secondly, whether any, and if any what, probate duty is payable in respect of the estate of Ellis Cook?

The case was argued in the Exchequer on June 12, 1862, and on June 17th following, the court (Pollock, C. B., and Bramwell, B.; Martin, B. dubitante) answered the first question by deciding, on the authority of Doe d. Richards v. Evans, 16 L. J. 305, Q. B., and Attorney-General v. Brunning, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 36; 30 L. J. 379, Ch., that the value of the estate, at the time of obtaining the letters of administration, was that on which the stamp duty should be calculated, and that Partington was therefore liable to pay duty on the whole amount of principal, increased by the subsequent addition of interest: (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 900; 1 H. & C. 457.) The second question was not noticed in the above judgment, but in the following term, Nov. 12, counsel for the Crown (Sir F. Kelly, Q. C.), asked the court whether judgment was to be entered for the Crown for the duty claimed upon both the estates, and the court, on a subsequent day, April 30, 1863, said that judgment should be entered for the amount claimed in respect of the estate of Isabel Cook only, and that no duty was payable in respect of the estate of Ellis Cook: (1 H. & C. 477.)

Error on the above judgment was then brought in the Exchequer Chamber and that court (Willes, Byles, Blackburn, Keating, Mellor, and Shee, JJ.), on May 16, 1864, affirmed the judgment of the Exchequer on the first, and reversed it on the second of the above questions; holding, as to the latter, that it was necessary for the next of kin of Ellis Cook, in order to enforce the right of the wife and reduce the property into possession for their benefit, to take out letters of administration to both Ellis and Isabel Cook, and to pay stamp duty upon each grant, each grant being in respect of a distinct devolution of property: (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 751; 3 H. & C. 193.)

Cotton, Q. C. and Holl, for the plaintiff in error, contended, first, that duty was not chargeable on both grants of administration, but that duty should be charged only on the grant of administration to Isabel Cook. As to the distribution of the property the law of England did not affect it. The parties were domiciled in America, and the law of America governed the distribution. It was a mistake to take out two grants of administration, but such a mistake would not create a liability to which the property, but for it, would not have been liable. The following cases and authorities were cited on this point:

Loy v Duckett, 1 Cr. & Phill. 305;
Fielder v. Hanger, 3 Hagg. 769;
Enohin v. Wylie, 10 H. of L. Cas. 1.

Secondly, duty was not payable on the accretion of interest, for the value of the property on which duty is payable is to be estimated according to the value at the date of the death of Isabel Cook. On this point the following cases and authorities were cited:

Attorney-General v. Hope, 1 Cr. M. & R. 530; 2 Cl. & Fin. 84;

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.), Sir Roundel Palmer, Q. C., and Hutton, for the defendant in error, contra, cited the following cases:

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this writ of error is brought in respect of a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which in part affirmed, and in part reversed, a previous judgment of the Court of Exchequer, the question being one with reference to the duty payable on certain letters of administration under circumstances which I shall presently refer to. There were two points originally raised, namely, first, whether or not considerable delay having occurred between the death of the intestate, and the taking out the letters of administration, the duty should be chargeable upon the accretions of interest which had occurred in the interval; and the second point, being one of more importance, and requiring more consideration, namely, whether or not a double duty was payable, there having been a lady entitled, in the first instance, to administer to the intestate, and entitled also to the beneficial interest in the property of the intestate, and she having predeceased her husband, and the husband also having died before taking out letters of administration to her, and before any were taken out by Mr. Partington. With regard to the first point which was here raised, there was no difference of opinion on the part of any of your Lordships, namely, with respect to the duty being chargeable upon the accretions of interest. Upon that point we all entirely concurred in the view which had been taken by both the courts below, that the duty was so chargeable upon the accretions of interest. I do not go into the reasons for that decision, because they were sufficiently explained in the judgment in those courts. To these judgments I adhere, and for the reasons which are there assigned for the decision. With regard to the other point the facts are very short. [His Lordship stated them and proceeded.] Now it is important, as it seems to me, to see the exact form in which those letters of administration were granted. They were in the form used in the course of procedure in the Ecclesiastical Courts, because it is now well known, and it is so laid down in Williams on Executors, 5th edit., p. 360, and perfectly in consonance with all the authorities, that the course now in the Ecclesiastical Court is, in all cases where the wife has predeceased her husband, to grant to the representative of the husband alone letters of administration to the wife. There was a time when the Ecclesiastical Courts thought themselves justified, and even bound, to give letters of administration to the next of kin of the wife; but it was determined that the next of kin of the wife in that case, holding such letters of administration, were only trustees for the administrator of the husband, and it was finally concluded, I think in the time of Sir John Nichol, that the right and proper course in all such cases was to grant the letters of administration only to the person who invested himself with the character of administrator of the husband. That course was followed in this case, which appears by the form of the letters of administration. [His Lordship stated the form in each case.] So that in those letters the administration is not only granted to Partington because he had already clothed himself with the character of representative of Ellis Cook, but, in noticing that he is acting as attorney to James Cook, there is this reservation made of James Cook's right, that he is to have the benefit of coming in and claiming as the representative of Ellis Cook if so minded, but not until he has clothed himself with the character of the representative of Ellis Cook. That being so, it appears to me that if this had been a case in which the parties were residing and domiciled in this country no question could have arisen about the payment of the duty upon administration. In regard to the administration of Ellis Cook, the husband, the administration is, of course, taken out in respect of all his property. His property at that time included his beneficial interest in the estate of his deceased wife; and, of course, therefore, the stamp duty payable on it, being the stamp duty that must be paid upon all that was his at the time of his decease, would include that interest which he took in the estate of his predeceased wife. Then, with regard to Isabel Cook's estate, the representative of the husband, who has clothed himself with that character, and who applies for administration to her, must pay duty upon all which was hers at the time of her decease. In that way it appears to me to be plain, and beyond all dispute, that a double duty must be payable upon it. Nor, as was observed in the courts below, is there any injustice in such a conclusion, because had Ellis Cook done that which was perfectly competent to him to do in his lifetime, namely, had he applied for letters of administration to his wife, he, of course, would have had to pay the duty in respect of her estate at her decease, and then when he himself died those who represented him would have had to do exactly the same thing which they are now called upon to do, namely, they would have had to pay duty upon his estate, which, of course, would include (unless he had spent it in the interval) the property which he had so derived from his deceased wife. We are referred to one case in which Lord Brougham thought it proper that payment should be made to the administrator of the deceased wife, without having any regard whatever to the position of those who were entitled to represent the interest of the deceased husband. It was the case of Gutteridge v. Stilwell, 1 M. & K. 487, in which Sir John Leach had refused to direct any payment to be made to the representative of the deceased wife, except in the presence of the representative of the deceased husband. Lord Cottenham, on having that case called to his attention in the case of Loy v. Duckett, Cr. & Phill. 312, intimated that the view of Sir John Leach was the preferable view, and that the payment to the representative of the wife alone ought not to have been so made. But, without considering that question at all, it appears to me that the administration was so granted upon the grounds that I have stated, namely, that the person entitled to administer to the deceased wife should be the person who had the right and interest in the property, and that that would be the administrator of the deceased husband. Certainly it is not a course of proceeding which, it appears to me, we are called upon or justified in finding any fault with, as having thrown improperly any burden upon those parties who made application for, and acquired in the usual manner, the representation of the estate of Isabel Cook. The Ecclesiastical Court would not have granted it to them unless they had first of all clothed themselves with the character of the representatives of Ellis Cook. That being so, it became necessary for them to take out administration, and they did take it out; and, that being done, the duty was charged in the usual mode in which it ought to be charged in a case of this description. But then there arises in this case the circumstances of the parties having been domiciled in America. I have been favoured by the kindness of one of your Lordships (Lord Westbury) with the view which was partly thrown out in the course of the argument by that noble and learned lord upon this part of the case, which created considerable doubt in his mind. He doubted whether or not, under the circumstances of the case, the duty ought to have been payable in respect of the interest which Ellis, the father, acquired by surviving his deceased wife, and upon this ground, namely, that Ellis the father being domiciled in the United States of America, and all the parties interested in the estate being also there domiciled, when the payment was directed by Kindersley, V.C. in this case to be made by the Solicitor of the Treasury to Mr. Partington, after Mr. Partington had clothed himself with the character of representative of Isabel Cook, and had made out his title in that character to the fund, the matter was placed in this position—that he, as the representative of Isabel Cook, would be entitled to receive the fund, and to carry with him that fund and to distribute it according to the rules and regulations of the country where the parties interested in it as beneficiaries were domiciled. Under such circumstances it appeared to my noble and learned friend that the Ecclesiastical Court in this country had nothing to do with the administration of the property, and that the property, having to be administered in America, the course of proceeding ought to have been simply to make payment to Partington, as the representative of Isabel Cook, leaving him afterwards to distribute the property as the law of the United States, the country of the domicile of the parties beneficially interested, should require. Now, whatever weight there may be in the observation, as to what ought to have been the course of proceedure of the Ecclesiastical Court, namely, whether or not it might not have been proper and reasonable for that Ecclesiastical Court, if duly informed of all the circumstances, to grant to Partington letters of administration to Isabel Cook without requiring previous letters of administration to be taken out to Ellis Cook, I think that those letters having been taken taken out, the parties having, and I think with reason, chosen to adopt that course, it is not for your Lordships to say that there is error in the judgments which have been pronounced. The sole question before us whether or not certain letters of administration having been taken out both to the one party and to the other, the proper amount of duty must not be paid in respect of the property, to which both the one and the other are entitled. It is true that where it is made out plainly in the Ecclesiastical Court, that the husband has no right or interest whatever in the wife's estate (a case which is not of very uncommon occurrence where, under a marriage settlement, the property passes directly to the children, and the husband takes no interest in it), the court does not require, according to its rule in making the grant of administation, that the grant should be made to the representative of the husband, the husband taking no interest. But it would not be so where he did take an interest in the property. I have thought very much upon the subject, in consequence of having been furnished with my noble and learned friend's view upon that point, and have felt that it was a matter deserving of very deep and anxious consideration. It has occurred to me that it might have been possible here for the representative of Ellis Cook in America, one who had taken out representation to Ellis Cook (for it appears upon the proceedings that representation was taken out in the United States to Ellis Cook), to come over here and satisfy the Ecclesiastical Court that, being the representative of Ellis Cook in America, he was entitled in that right to ask for letters of administration to Isabel Cook to be granted to him. I need not further follow up the supposition, because what has been de facto done is this, that Mr. Partington, acting according to the best advice that could be obtained, feeling the difficulty and doubt which might have arisen if he had so made an attempt to take out administration in that course of proceeding, has not done so. He thought it expedient to take out the administration in the usual and only mode in which it is granted in this country, unless it can be shown either that the husband's representative has no interest, or that some other person has an interest which would enable him to take out representation to the wife without previously taking out representation to the husband. Feeling there might be difficulties in not adopting the usual course he has adopted that course which is usual and regular with regard to the administration of property situated within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and therefore the court having followed the usual course, it appears that all that your Lordships can say upon the present occasion is, that the duty upon these several letters of administration must be the duty payable in all ordinary cases in which letters of administration are taken out, namely, that there must be full payment of duty upon the husband's estate, it being in respect of that estate that the letters are taken out. And so, of course, when the representative of the husband approaches the court, requiring administration to the wife, the duty must be paid upon the same principle, namely, full payment upon all that which, at the time of the wife's decease was her property, upon which the charge imposed by the Legislature falls. It does not appear to me that there is any ground for saying that any mistake or misconception has arisen. The case is simply this, that Partington, having had two courses open to him (as to one of which I cannot pronounce decisively, because I cannot say what might have been the case if he had come forward in the other form, namely, as a foreign representative claiming directly the estate of Isabel Cook), but, he having taken the ordinary course, it appears to me that it necessarily follows that the duty payable upon the property which he so acquired is payable in the present instance upon each estate. I come, therefore to the conclusion that in this case your Lordships ought to affirm the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and, consequently, with costs.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack upon both the questions raised by the special case. With respect to the liability to the full duty upon both the administrations taken out by the appellant, it was admitted by his learned counsel that, if the question had arisen with respect to subjects of this country, no doubt would have existed as to the double duty being payable. But it was contended that as Isabel Cook and her husband Ellis Cook were domiciled Americans, it was not necessary to take out administration to Ellis Cook in order to obtain administration to Isabel Cook; that the husband was not an interested party; that the wife's administrator might give a sufficient receipt and discharge; and that the whole of the duty of the administrator was to remit the money received by him under the administration to America, to be distributed to the persons entitled. I must confess my inability to follow this reasoning, or to understand how the question of domicile can enter into the consideration of the grant of letters of administration in this country. If it could, I do not see, in the absence of evidence upon the subject, how we can assume that the law of America differs from our law as to the right of succession to the estate in question. Upon the facts stated in the special case, it appears that the power of attorney, given by James Cook to the appellant, was to take out administration to the estates of Ellis Cook and Isabel Cook respectively. There is nothing stated in the special case which would render this course unnecessary. It is not shown that upon Isabel Cook's dying intestate her husband, surviving her, would have been entitled to his wife's interest in Mrs. Shard's estate without taking out letters of administration; or that upon his death, without having obtained administration to his wife, the right to this administration and to the property to which it would give a title, would not pass to his personal representative. If administration had been granted to Isabel Cook alone, her administrator would have held the property in trust for the representatives of Ellis Cook. Therefore, the administration to Ellis Cook was not a mere formal proceeding, much less an unnecessary act, but it was an essential step in order to obtain a title to the property as to which Isabel Cook died intestate. In the case cited, The Goods of Jane Elizabeth Crause, 1 Sw. & Tr. 146, it was held, that where the husband has survived his wife and died intestate, without administering to her estate, his next of kin must constitute themselves the legal personal representatives before they can have any claim to administer his estate. In that case, the Judge Ordinary quoted the words of Sir John Nichol in a former case (Fielder v. Hanger, 3 Hagg. 770), where the learned Judge of the Prerogative Court said: "On the principle, the grant ought to follow the interest, and that the whole interest is vested in the husband's representatives, I shall decree this grant. I should have done the same if the husband had not taken out administration, unless it could be shown that he had no interest, but that the property belonged to the wife's next of kin." But it was said, that even assuming two administrations to have been necessary, yet that one duty alone ought to be payable, because they were administrations to one and the same property. But although the property is the same, the right to the property claimed by the administrator was different. The administrator of Isabel Cook represents her right to the estate of Mrs. Shard as next of kin; the administrator of Ellis Cook represents his, as entitled, jure mariti, to his wife's property. If Ellis Cook had taken out administration to his wife and afterwards died intestate, there would, of course, have been two probate duties payable in respect of the same property; and what differnce can there be in principle between the duties payable under the supposed circumstances and those which are in question in this case, where in order to reach the property it was necessary to take out two administrations simultaneously, to vest distinct and different rights to that property in the same administrator? With respect to the question whether the probate duty payable ought to have been calculated on the value of the estate at the time of the death of Isabel Cook, or upon the increased value it had acquired at the time of the grant of the letters of administration, I have no difficulty in agreeing with the judgment of both the Courts of Exchequer and of Exchequer Chamber. The appellant's counsel contended that the duty is assessable upon the estate and effects for or in respect of which the administration is granted, and that the administration granted is of the goods, chattels, and credits of the intestate at the time of his or her death. When the grants of letters of administration were made, the estate to be administered had increased by the accumulation of interest accruing since the death of the intestate. The estates of the intestates at the time of their death were, however, interest-bearing estates; and what the administrator was entitled to was those estates ascertained to have become of a certain value. I consider this question to have been settled in the case of Doe d. Richards v. Evans, 16 L. J. 305, Q. B., because the counsel there having quoted a passage from Gwynne on the Law relating to the Duties on Probates and Letters of Administration, 3rd edit. p. 25, which states "that the Commissioners of Stamps require all rents, interests, and dividends, from the death of the testator or intestate to the date of the probate on letters of administration to be included in the estimate upon which duty is to be paid, but there had been no judicial decision upon the point, and that counsel of great eminence had held a different opinion." Lord Denman said, "The improvement is inseparably part of that which the deceased had, and of which administration was granted." I think the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

Lord WESTBURY.—My lords, the facts of this case are few and simple. (His Lordship stated them, and proceeded.) On this order being made in the Court of Chancery, directing the payment to Partington, "as the legal personal representative of the said Isabel Cook," the Crown has claimed a double ad valorem duty—that is to say, it has required that the letters of administration to Isabel should be stamped with an ad valorem duty to the extent of the estate directed to be paid to Isabel's personal representative, and it has required the same amount of duty to be paid on the letters of administration of the estate of Ellis Cook. It is contended for the Crown that there have been two distinct devolutions of the beneficial ownership—one on the death of Isabel, and the other on the death of Ellis; and that two administrations, therefore, are necessary, as if there were two distinct estates. In the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it is said (10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 754), "So, in respect of the letters of administration to the estate of the husband, the stamp duty is equally chargeable, as they are necessary to establish the devolution of the property upon James Cook, and to entitle him to receive it." The case for the Crown, therefore, is founded on the transmission of beneficial ownership. The Crown assumes to follow the estate from the hands of the administrator of Isabel into the hands of the administrator of Ellis, and claims two duties, upon the ground that the estate is twice distributed or administered in this country under the two administrations. One ad valorem duty is claimed in respect of the administration of Isabel; but inasmuch as the property, when received by the administrator of Isabel, will (according to the assumption of the Crown) belong beneficially to the estate of Ellis, the Crown claims the second ad valorem duty in respect of the new character or quality which the same property receives by transmission in the second place, namely, the character of personal estate of Ellis. In short, the Stamp office regards the estate as undergoing two processes of distribution in this country, first as the personal estate of Isabel, and secondly as the personal estate of Ellis. The first duty on the administration to Isabel is necessary to enable the administrator of Isabel to give a valid discharge to the administrator of Mrs Shard; but there is no ground whatever for claiming the second duty, except the contention that the money, when received by the administrator of Isabel, belongs to Ellis, and, therefore, must be distributed as his personal estate. That the beneficial interest in the estate of Isabel belongs to Ellis is laboriously proved by the Court of Exchequer chamber upon the principles of English law, and by the authority of English decisions. The answer to this assumption, and the conclusions founded upon it, lies in the fact that by law neither the personal estate of Isabel, nor the personal estate of Ellis, is to be distributed or administered in this country, and that the assumption on which the Crown's claim is founded, is untrue both in law and in fact. The case has been decided in the court below as if the ownership and distribution of the personal estates of Isabel and Ellis were to be regulated entirely by the law which would be applicable if Isabel and Ellis had been domiciled in England. The fact that English law and the jurisdiction of English courts are excluded by the circumstance that the ownership and the distribution of the estates of Isabel and Ellis are governed exclusively by the laws of a foreign country was not adverted to in the judgment of the court below. But, when regard is had to the law of the domicile, which the courts here were bound to take notice of, the true grounds for the decision of the case seem to be clear. Mrs Shard at her death was domiciled in this country. The forum for the administration of her estate was therefore in England. The personal representative of Mrs. Shard is entitled to have such a discharge for the clear residue of the estate paid over by him under the decree as is valid according to the law of the forum of his administration. Consequently, as Isabel Cook, the sole next-of-kin, was dead at the date of the order, it is the right of Mrs. Shard's administrator to have a discharge from a personal representative of Isabel, constituted in this country. It was therefore necessary to take out letters of administration to Isabel, but solely for the purpose of giving a discharge; and for that purpose it was necessary that the letters of administration to Isabel should, in conformity with the fiscal law of this country, be stamped with a stamp corresponding to the amount of the estate to be received by virtue of them. So far the right of this country, as the forum of administration of Mrs. Shard's estate clearly extends, but it extends no farther. English law has nothing to do with the distribution of the estate of Isabel, nor with the regulation of her succession, nor with the transmission of the beneficial right to her estate, subjects which belong exclusively to the foreign tribunals. The English law furnishes no other rule than this, that the English letters of administration, which the administrator of Mrs. Shard has a right to have produced to him, ought to be granted to the person entitled to represent Isabel by the law of her domicile. By that law her succession is wholly governed; and, therefore, it follows that the person entitled to represent Isabel Cook, and the person beneficially entitled to her personal estate, fall to be ascertained by the law of the United States. They are matters foreign to the law of England, and to the jurisdiction of her tribunals. The course that ought to have been adopted by the parties was this, namely, they should have duly constituted a personal representative of Isabel Cook in the proper court in America, and such person, by himself or his attorney, should have applied to the Court of Probate in this country for ancillary letters of administration of the estate of Isabel. In this mode of proceeding, as has been already observed, no question of the devolution of the beneficial interest of the estate of Isabel could have arisen. This course, however, was not taken by the parties, and the judgment of the court below proceeds on the application of the case of rules of the English law, to which it was not subject. The application being made by Mr. Partington, not for an ancillary grant, but for original letters of administration, the Court of Probate in this country acted in conformity with the rules applicable to English administrations. According to English law, if a married woman becomes entitled to receive a sum of money, the husband becomes entitled to it jure mariti; but if the wife dies before the husband has received it, the husband, although his beneficial right remains the same, must, in order to receive the money, take out administration to his wife; and if he dies without having done so, it is necessary that letters of administration should be taken out to the wife's estate (for such is still the legal character of the money), but the wife's administrator is only a trustee for the representative of the husband. On this ground, looking at the succession as a subject for English law to determine, it was supposed to be necessary that letters of administration to Ellis should be obtained. Two distinct letters of administration were therefore granted on the same day and to the same person. For the reasons already given, the mode of proceeding was a result of mistake and misapprehension on the part of Mr Partington or his advisers. If the proper course had been taken, no letters of administration to Ellis, the husband, were needed in this country. This mistaken form of proceeding does not affect the justice of the case, nor the rights of the parties, nor ought the stamp office to attempt to avail itself of the form of the application in order to claim a second duty on grounds which are not applicable to the circumstances. For the claim of the Crown is founded on the assertion that there have been two devolutions of the beneficial interest in the same property—that is, two successions; and the Court of Exchequer Chamber rests its judgment on this—that by English law James Cook would be entitled to the property as administrator of his father, and not as administrator of his mother; and they have put their decision on matters which were coram non judice. There is but one succession of which the English Court could take cognisance, namely, the succession of Isabel to Mrs Shard, and this it has done; but as Isabel died domiciled abroad, English law has no right to make any inquiry or pronounce any judgment touching the succession to Isabel, still less to treat the succession to Isabel as governed by its own laws of transmission, and to insist on imposing a tax on the assumed subsequent devolutions of that estate. The injustice of the claim as against the foreigner is obvious. Even if Isabel and Ellis had both died in England, the claim of the Crown to double duty would, as appears from the judgment of the Court below, and the last reason of the respondent's case, have rested on the merest technicality. But when the foreign domicile being adverted to, it becomes clear that the courts of this country had no power to follow and decide on the alleged transmission of the beneficial interest, it is most unjust to enforce a claim by the Crown founded on the assumption of a jurisdiction which does not belong to its tribunals.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords, when this case was argued at the bar I felt no difficulty as to one of the points, namely, that relating to the accretions to the estate of Mrs Shard. But at that time I certainly did participate much in the doubts which have been expressed by my noble and learned friend who has last spoken. It appeared to me that there might be a very considerable difference between the case of a wife succeeding to a property, she being a foreigner and dying abroad, and the case of a wife succeeding to a property, she being a domiciled Englishwoman and dying here. I did not see very clearly how the Ecclesiastical Court here was entitled to arrive at the conclusion that the succession to the estate of Isabel Cook was the same as if she had been a domiciled Englishwoman and had died here. But when I come to consider the rule that prevails in England as to the succession in such a case, the party possessed of the property being English, and her property and her domicile here, it appeared to me that the matter comes very much to this: That when James Cook, the representative of Isabel Cook, came forward to ask for letters of administration to obtain the property, the Ecclesiastical Court here was entitled to inquire who was the representative of Isabel Cook. And then I do not understand that there is any question as to this—that if it had been inquired into it would have appeared that there was in that respect no practical distinction between the succession that did occur and that which would have occurred if the party had been domiciled here. But the consideration that most strongly prevails with me now is, that the parties themselves well and fully advised as they must have been, came forward and claimed letters of administration in regard to both estates—that is, letters of administration with reference to the estate of Isabel Cook, and letters of administration with reference to the estate of Ellis Cook. Treating the matter in that way, first, as to the letters of administration to Ellis Cook, and then as to the letters of administration to Isabel Cook, as if tracing retro, as it were, the successions that have occurred in the devolutions of this estate, and the parties having taken the benefits, whatever they were, of the course which they had adopted, I think we must now treat the matter as one in which the rule that prevails in such cases in the Ecclesiastical Court must be held to prevail here. It may be that, by following a different course, by following the course in America, pointed out by my noble and learned friend, the parties might have brought about a different result. They may, perhaps, not have taken the course that was most beneficial to themselves. I cannot say how that may be. But, at all events, they have not taken that course. They have taken a different course, and we must deal with the case with reference to the course that has been taken; and viewing it in that light, I cannot but concur in the judgment which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

Lord CAIRNS.—My Lords, upon one part of this case I think there is no difference of opinion between any of your Lordships—I mean that with regard to the interest. The interest is clearly payable as damages or compensation for the withholding of the principal. Whoever is entitled to the principal is entitled also to the interest as an accretion. It merges into and becomes part of the sum which has to be paid; and the whole taken together becomes the estate in respect of which the administration is granted. On the other part of the case, I should be far from saying—especially after what has fallen from my noble and learned friend opposite—that no doubt can be entertained. I have had an opportunity, through his kindness, of considering very carefully the strong and powerful arguments which he has addressed to your Lordships; but I am bound to say that I myself have arrived without hesitation at the conclusion that the judgment ought to be affirmed. I do so both upon form and also upon substance. I am not at all sure that, in a case of this kind—a fiscal case—form is not amply sufficient, because as I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation, it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute. Now, upon the form, how does this case stand? I put aside the name of Mr Partington, who is only acting as attorney. Take the name of James Cook. James Cook comes to this country. He applies to the proper forum for the grant of two letters of administration. These two separate grants of letters of administration are made to him in entire accordance with the practice of the forum in this country. According to the Act of Parliament, they are to be granted "for or in respect of certain property." And in this case, beyond all doubt, the property "for or in respect of which" they are granted is, in the first instance, the personal estate of Isabel Cook, which is within the jurisdiction, and in the second place the personal estate of Ellis Cook, which is also within the jurisdiction. And in both these cases before the grant can be made an affidavit must be given in, and for the purposes of this argument it does not alter the matter, that from the difficulty of ascertaining the truth the affidavit has to be made afterwards, and not before. If the truth is known before, the affidavit must be made on the part of the person applying for probate, that the estate and the effects of the deceased for and in respect of which letters of administration are to be granted, exclusive of trust estate, without deducting anything on account of debts, are under a certain value to be therein specified. Now no person disputes that there was, both in the case of Isabel Cook and in the case of Ellis Cook, at the time of the death of each, the property within the jurisdiction in respect of which duty is sought. There is no dispute that if the letters of administration are to be granted, that is the property in respect of which they are granted. Therefore it appears to me that we have nothing more to consider in this case than this: It being admitted that there are two grants of letters of administration, what is the proper stamp to be affixed upon those letters of administration? I think, therefore, that in point of form these considerations would be quite sufficient to dispose of the case. But I am quite willing to look also at the substance. It appears to me that in respect of substance also the judgment is right, and for this reason. What is the privity which James Cook coming here is able to establish between himself and those in respect of whom the letters of administration are granted? Could James Cook come here and establish any privity between himself and Isabel Cook? Could he say, "At the death of Isabel Cook the whole of her personal estate devolved upon me, and I now ask for letters of administration to administer it?" He clearly could not, because at the death of Isabel Cook her personal estate did not pass at all in any shape or form to James Cook it passes to a wholly different person. Therefore, ex necessitate, James Cook must come to the court in this country and say, "I admit that I have no connection whatever directly with Isabel Cook. I admit the property, which passed from Mrs. Shard to Isabel Cook, passed from Isabel Cook to some one else." If he came without any intermediate link between himself and Isabel Cook he would be obliged to confess that he has no right to the estate. Therefore he says, "My right is not to the estate of Isabel Cook, my right is to the estate of Ellis Cook. I am the son of Ellis Cook, and the person entitled to his estate. I want and I must have letters of administration to the estate of Ellis Cook in this country." And then, when he has obtained letters of administration, it does not matter that they were both granted uno flatus. They must be marshalled according to their proper order. When he has obtained letters of administration to Ellis Cook, he goes further and says, "Now I have the same right that Ellis Cook would have had if he had been alive, namely, a right to ask a further grant of letters of administration to the estate of Isabel Cook;" and the process is performed, after the death of Ellis Cook, just in the same way as if Ellis Cook had first obtained letters of administration, and then, before taking the property in this country, had died, and James Cook had come forward and obtained letters of administration to his father. My Lords, it might be tested in another way, and it would come to the same result. Suppose Isabel Cook had, by a proper testamentary disposition in America, bequeathed the whole of her property, coming to her as next of kin of Mrs. Shard to a stranger, say to John Smith, and that then before any of the money was recovered, John Smith died, leaving his sole next of kin, and that son came over here, he could not have established any privity between himself and Isabel Cook. He would have been obliged to confess that he claimed as the son of John Smith, who was the universal devisee and legatee of Isabel Cook. And in that way he would have first to take out letters of administration to his father, John Smith, and then, as administrator of his father, to prove the will of Isabel Cook. It does not matter that it is done through the medium of letters of administration. The result is the same. I therefore entirely agree in the motion that this appeal should be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by Thomas Brooksbank and E. Stewart Roche, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 25 and 26.

(Before the Lords Justices.)

Re Lush's Trusts.

Married woman—Her fraud—Influence of husband—Her reversionary interest—Assignment by her—Subsequent sale of her interest—Declaration by her to purchaser that she had duly assigned—Bonâ fide purchase.

A married woman may, by fraud, preclude herself not only from her equity to a settlement, but also from any right to a reversionary interest falling due after the death of her husband.

Under the will of L., a lady became absolutely entitled to a sum of money, subject to a prior life interest therein. She married, and soon after marriage she, under threats from her husband, who was in embarrassed circumstances, executed a very informal document written out by herself, purporting, in contemplation of her marriage, to give up to him all her interest, and requesting the trustees of the will to pay it over to him. This instrument was dated two days before the marriage; it was signed by the lady alone, using her maiden name; it was unattested, and no notice of it was ever given to the trustees. The husband soon after contracted to sell the reversion to C., who was a clerk to the husband's solicitor; the purchase was not completed, and a suit, held by the court to be conclusive, was instituted by the husband against C. to compel performance; C. appeared by another clerk of the husband's solicitor; the cause was heard as a short cause, the alleged assignment was admitted by both parties, and there was no evidence. A decree was made by consent, declaring that the husband was entitled to his wife's late interest. Nothing more was done in the suit, and the contract for the sale was abandoned. A month later, the husband, on the strength of this declaration, put up the interest for sale by auction, when it was bought by the Law Rever-sionary Interest Society, who had no notice of the fraud; but before completion they obtained from the lady, who was then living apart from her husband, and consequently not liable to his influence, a letter stating that before her marriage she had assigned her interest to her husband. The purchase was completed, and the price paid to the husband. He afterwards deserted his wife, and had not been heard of for several years. On the death of the tenant for life, the trustees paid the fund into court, and the society petitioned for payment to themselves.

The Master of the Rolls refused payment to them, holding that it was their duty to have inquired into the circumstances under which the decree had been obtained; and further, that, in signing the documents mentioned, the lady had been under her husband's influence; therefore, he retained the fund in court, but ordered payment of the dividends to her. But, upon appeal,

Their Lordships reversed this decision, considering that the lady had been guilty of fraud, and could not receive benefit from it, and ordered payment to the society.

This was an appeal of the Law Reversionary Interest Society against an order of the Master of the Rolls made upon a petition by them for payment of a fund bequeathed by the late Charles Lush, and paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act, by his trustees. The circumstances fully appear in the judgments which follow:

Jessel, Q. C. and Bristowe supported the appeal.

May v. Roper, 4 Sim, 360.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said: "I am of opinion that the case of the petitioners fails altogether. In the first place, I consider that a more suspicious document than this was never produced. Totally independent of everything else, it is obviously not the composition of Mrs. Bowren, the lady, herself. It is, 'I, Ellen Louisa Buckland, of Shaftesbury, Dorset, spinster, being about to marry Edward Bowren (and upon his marrying me), I, in consideration of such marriage, give up to him, the said Edward Bowren, for his own sole use and benefit, the whole of my interest under the will of Charles Lush, Esquire, late of Hoxton, Middlesex, and, in case of such marriage, I hereby request and direct the trustees of the said will to pay over to the said Edward Bowren, in case of such marriage, the whole of such interest of me, the said Ellen Louisa Buckland, under such will.' And then it goes on with a very singular sentence: 'And I, Ellen Louisa Buckland, have assigned my interest under the said will to the said Edward Bowren before my marriage,' looking exceedingly like a sentence written after the marriage, 'As witness my hand this 1st Feb. in the year of our Lord Christ one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight. (Signed) Ellen Louisa Buckland,' with a great flourish at the end which I do not see to others of her signatures.

"Now, I proceed upon the assumption that that is really her signature; I believe it to be her signature, and I believe the whole of the document to be in her handwriting. She swears positively that it was not written before her marriage; she gives a detailed account where she was before her marriage, and no cross-examination upon that subject has shaken it at all, or shows that she was anywhere else. There are no witnesses to the document. It is a very singular thing that the husband to whom money was important should have obtained a document of this sort from his wife without having witnesses to it, or giving any notice of it to the trustees The result is that I believe this document is correctly described by her when she says it was written after her marriage, and I believe her evidence on that subject.

"The rest of the story is one of the most singular that, I think, you could ever meet with in a court of justice. The thing itself is as plain to a person who has a little experience in Chancery matters as a thing well can be. The husband says: 'I want to raise money; how shall I do it?' 'Well, have you got a document assigning that property to you before marriage; either you have or have not; if you have not, of course you must get it. Then if you attempt to sell it by auction to an ordinary purchaser, he will look at these documents very sharply, and you will never be able to get any person to take the property upon that evidence. But get a decree of the Court of Chancery, and you will do it immediately. Now I have a clerk in my office, or one who was in my office, who will enter into a contract to buy it. I have another clerk, who is a solicitor, in my office, who will act for him; file a bill for specific performance against the clerk who buys; I will appear for you, and the other clerk shall appear for the clerk who buys. Let him admit the document; don't have it proved at all, let it be admitted in evidence; you will get a decree in the course of a few months, then if he will give up the purchase you will get a decree for sale; sell it by auction; there is the decree of the Court of Chancery for sale, and at a sale under a decree of the Court of Chancery persons don't look so sharply at these documents as they otherwise would look.' I declare that this is as plain to me upon the evidence as anything I ever saw.

"Then the interest no doubt is put up to auction, and the Reversionary Interest Society buy it; they do not look into it. It is true that this lady was a party to the suit; she put in no answer; the document itself was not proved in the suit, it was merely admitted, and thereupon a decree was obtained from the courts. I must say that the court has been made an instrument of fraud for the purpose, and I am grieved to say that it is a decree of my own; that, though without any knowledge on my part of the facts, it is a decree of mine, with a most careful and attentive registrar present, Mr. Latham, than whom there is no gentleman more careful and cautious. Nothing is more certain than that if I or Mr. Latham had had the slightest intimation of what was being done, or what was intended to be done, that decree never would have passed the Court of Chancery.

"Then the Reversionary Interest Society purchases; I am bound to say that they are perfectly innocent in the matter; but there is this to be said, they make no inquiry into the matter at all, they are satisfied with the decree of the Court of Chancery; they do not look into the document, they do not require any distinct evidence as to the document, they are not struck by the circumstance that it was not proved in the cause. I suppose it was delivered over to them, as they now produce it.

"Mr. Bristowe says, What more could be done? A great deal more could have been done. If they had any doubt upon this document, they might have required that this lady should have gone before a magistrate, and made a judicial declaration respecting the accuracy of it, or said something to her about it, and inquired something about it.

"In this state of the case the matter comes before me. Now I have to consider, no doubt, the question of fraud, which is a very important question. But there is this essential distinction at the foot of all these transactions by a married woman. No doubt a married woman may be guilty of a fraud, as an infant may, as was decided in the cause of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen; but you must always consider that the Court of Chancery treats, according to the law of England, the influence of the husband as paramount over the wife. In the case of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen the lady was living alone according to my recollection; she was living as a feme sole, and she undertook as a feme sole, her husband having nothing to do with it, to pay a certain sum of money; that was a charge upon her property. But that is quite different from joining with her husband. So also in the case of Derbishire v. Home; there the representations were made to the trustees, and it is a perfectly different thing where the cestui que trust keeps a thing back from the trustees, and, making them commit a breach of trust, turns round upon them and says, 'You shall be answerable for that breach of trust to me,' and writing a document at the instance of her husband, making no representation to the actual purchaser, but writing a document at the instance of her husband which is to be made use of for the purpose of deceiving the court, and cheating the purchaser. That is what it really amounts to.

"Now just consider the case. There is a husband who wishes to borrow money, and insists upon his wife (I am assuming to be true what my belief is on the subject, namely, that this document was written after the marriage) signing the document. What is the wife to do? Conceive what power the husband has over the wife when he says to her 'Copy that document for me, and sign it; it is true I intend to raise money upon it, but I insist upon your copying that document for me and signing it.' I ask any man who considers the circumstances of the relation between husband and wife, in which a married woman is very properly protected by the English law, what species of defence has she against her husband in such a case, unless it is the defence which the law gives her, and which compels all persons who take advantage of a transaction of that description to pry into it with the most careful scrupulosity?

"Now what is the distinction between this species of fraud, and that species of fraud which a married woman commits, I am sorry to say, constantly at the instance of her husband, when after her marriage she assigns her reversionary interest to a purchaser, gets money upon it, and promises that she will never resist that contract afterwards? Will the court allow such a transaction? It is not as if her husband had rejected her, and that she was living alone as a feme sole, and, from her own motion, had made that representation; for here she was under the influence of her husband, and that species of relation is such that she has not the moral power to resist an influence which the law recognises, and which the court is bound to excuse. That really is the reason why the court does things of that description, or else the same argument would apply in every case. Will the court of equity allow a married woman to dispute her own signature upon every occasion, and say that she may now dispute it? She says, 'What could I do? I was under the influence of my husband, I was obliged to do it; I myself did not get the money.' Can anybody say that the law is wrong when it says there shall be that species of protection about a married woman? Observe what the rule is in cases which occur in court every day, where the separate examination of the married woman is required, to be quite sure that she is away from the influence of her husband. I remember taking the evidence of a married woman who had agreed to join in a settlement with her husband to allow a man to have some money. I believe it was in my own room. She said, 'It is very hard upon me, but I did it, and I do not depart from my promise.' Of course the court cannot deal with such a case. I told her she was not bound by that promise; but she insisted upon keeping it. She told me at the time that she could not resist her husband, and that he compelled her to do it.

"I do not see the distinction between the fact of her copying a document (for I have not the slightest doubt that this was not composed by her) set before her by her husband, and executing a deed in favour of another person. In this state of things, I am of opinion that she is not bound by what she did, and that she has been, in point of fact, one of the victims of the plot that was laid for the purpose of obtaining a decree from the Court of Chancery in order to raise money upon this settlement.

"I agree with Mr. Jessel in thinking it is a case for equitable settlement, but I shall do as I have done on former occasions; I shall give her the dividends on the corpus, and then I shall know hereafter something about the husband; but at present I shall not do anything more. I treat the fund as the reversionary property of a married woman, and her husband having deserted her I give her the interest until further order. I treat it as the property of a married woman which has not been disposed of by her."

The Law Reversionary Society having appealed against this decision, the case was argued by the counsel above stated, and, at the conclusion of the respondent's argument,

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—Mr. Bristowe, I think we need not trouble you to reply in this case. Although I cannot concur in the conclusion at which his Lordship the Master of the Rolls has arrived in this case, I do not think there is any difference of opinion between that learned judge and this court with respect to the law which is applicable to cases of this description; for I observe that in his judgment his Lordship refers with approbation to the decision of Kindersley, V.C. in the case which has been so often referred to of Vaughan v. Vanderstegen. In that case the Vice-Chancellor stated in a very few words a proposition of which, I apprehend, at the present time, no doubt can be entertained, viz., that it is well established that a married woman is capable of committing a fraud, and is liable to be visited with the consequences of the commission of that fraud. Then he refers to the case of Savage v. Foster, which was a case in which the husband and wife concurred in the fraud, and where there was not such an active participation in the fraud as that which we find on the part of the lady in the present case. In Savage v. Foster it was a case of standing by and allowing the purchase to take place in ignorance on the part of the purchaser of the real state of the title, which the husband and wife were aware of. His Lordship also referred to the case of Derbishire v. Home, in which Turner, L. J. says, at p. 113 of 8 De. G. M. & G., "There is, I think, strong ground to contend that, as a court of equity creates and models the separate estate, the estate so created and modelled must be subject to the ordinary rules of the court." Now, there is no doubt that in cases of separate estate, and especially in cases where that separate estate is coupled with the restraint upon anticipation, many questions may arise as to how far the court can, in dealing with cases of fraud on the part of married women, overrule a declaration of the settlor or of the testator in respect to the separate estate and the restraint upon anticipation; and some cases have gone so far as to say that, although it was very greatly for the benefit of the married woman that that restraint should be removed, still, if the settlor or testator has imposed it, the court has no power to take it away, even for the benefit of the married woman herself. But in the present case we are relieved from any consideration of this kind, because in this case we find that this lady was absolutely entitled in her own right to this reversionary interest. That upon her marriage would pass to the husband, subject, of course, only to the rights which she might have in the event of her surviving him, and to her equity to a settlement; and then that equity to a settlement is certainly an interest which this court will control, and one where the court will not allow, as we have had occasion to say in the very recent case of Barnard v. Ford, the equity to a settlement to be made an engine of fraud, or, as was expressed in that case by my learned brother, this court will not allow an equity to a settlement to be enforced where it would be contrary to good conscience to do so. I think, therefore, upon all the authorities the question we have now to consider in this case is, whether under the circumstances proved it would be contrary to good conscience to allow this lady to assert the equity to a settlement.

Now with respect to the facts; in the first place we have a document which is entirely in Mrs. Bowren's own handwriting, the document of the 1st Feb. 1858, which bears date two days before her marriage, which took place on the 3rd Feb. That is a document certainly open to the observations which have been pressed upon us with great force by Sir Richard Baggallay, as being a document of a very unusual character, but at the same time it is one which calls most pointedly the attention of any person who writes such a document as this to the circumstance that it was very material indeed to make out that it had taken place before her marriage. Then the representation which the lady now makes with respect to that is, that, in point of fact, it was not written until the month of April; that she did it then under the influence of her husband and under the influence of a threat that, unless she signed it, her husband's circumstances would compel him to leave her and send her home. She says she did it very reluctantly, and only in consequence of the exercise of that influence, and under the pressure of that threat.

Then the first question is, are we to take it as being established that that document was not in fact written until after the date of the marriage? because I think that, supposing it to have been written before the marriage, it is perfectly clear that it would be sufficient to exclude any equity to a settlement in a transaction of this kind. With respect to that I cannot help saying that I agree in the conclusion which his Lordship, the Master of the Rolls, arrived at as to the date of that document; because, although it is no doubt very dangerous to trust to the unsupported testimony of a person who has been an actor in such a transaction, when she comes to say that a document written by herself and signed by herself in her maiden name, and dated on the 1st Feb. 1858, was actually written by her when that was no longer her name, when she had been married several months, and was consequently unfitted for the purpose (which she must have known), although it is very dangerous to listen to such testimony, still I think that there are corroborative circumstances here which induce one to believe that her representation with respect to that is correct. Beyond that there is this very extraordinary suit, which I think I ought not to pass over without some comment; because I entirely agree with the observations which his Lordship, the Master of the Rolls, has made upon that suit as being a means of making the court an instrument of fraud; a suit having for its only proper and legitimate purpose, that of binding the interest of a married lady, by proving as against her a fact which she denies. The bill is filed on the 7th July; the answer is put in on the 14th; the decree is obtained on the 19th, and upon the face of that decree it appears that that which was the only essential thing in the suit at all, viz., the evidence, was omitted altogether. That being so, I am of opinion that it is sufficiently established that this document of the 1st Feb. 1858 was not written until after the marriage of the lady. But the document itself is most material for the purpose of showing that this lady's attention must, at the time when she wrote it, the whole being in her handwriting, have been most pointedly called to the transaction, and her own statements clearly show that, her husband being in great difficulties, she was aware that attempts were being made to raise money upon the footing of this security.

Then that being so, it brings us down to the date of the suit I have already mentioned, then to the transaction in Oct., when the sale by auction took place. Now with respect to that I cannot entertain any doubt that the purchase was a bonâ fide purchase, made at a price which seems to me to have been a very fair and reasonable price; it was not at all purchased at an undervalue by this society at the sale by auction, and I cannot help expressing my very strong belief that the matter, so far as they were concerned, was entirely bonâ fide, a purchase by auction under ordinary circumstances made by them. Then they proceeded to investigate the title, and although I agree that the document has certain marks of singularity upon it, and although the suit was one of a most singular character, and one which, if the suspicion of the purchasers had been aroused, would have been calculated to increase that suspicion, still I do not think that those circumstances were of such a character as to induce the court to say that the purchasers must have known. I believe they did not know that any fraud or deception had been perpetrated with regard to it. I think that the transaction is very fairly represented in the letter which was written on the 12th Oct. 1858, from Mr. Dalton, writing in the name of his firm to one of the trustees, in which he says, "As we thought it would probably be satisfactory to the trustees to have a letter from Mrs. Bowren, stating the fact of her having made over her interest under Mr. Lush's will prior to her marriage, we required the vendor's solicitor to obtain one, and we now enclose it. Perhaps you will be kind enough to put it away with the papers you have relating to the trust. We have not yet completed the purchase, but expect to do so in the course of the week, when we will send you the usual formal notice." I think that letter correctly represents what really took place, and it is, to my mind, quite conclusive that these purchasers were acting bonâ fide in this matter, and that they required this letter for the purpose of preventing any possibility of doubt as to it.

Now, of course, in all these transactions we must ascertain whether the lady was in truth acting as a free agent, because although a married lady may be, as I have already said, guilty of a fraud, and may consequently be visited with the consequences of that fraud, on the other hand she is entitled to the same protection as any other person, and to say that she is not to be rendered liable for acts which were not done of her own free will, and in respect of which she was acting under such coercion as prevented her from being a free agent. Now in the first place, even assuming that she was acting under some species of coercion in this transaction, still the very fact which she states as to the pressure which was then exercised upon her, must have left an impression upon her mind which would render her exceedingly sensitive with respect to all subsequent transactions relating to the same matter. And then when we find by her own admission that she was aware that money was about to be raised upon the security of the reversionary interest, when she knew that she had written and signed a document which she says herself she wrote and signed with very great reluctance, knowing that it did not express the truth, knowing that it was signed by her in a name which was no longer hers, and that it bore a date which was not the true date, I say that, under these circumstances, an application was made to her to write the other letter, the letter which bears date the 11th Oct. 1858. Now it is true that the body of that letter is not, like the body of the former document, altogether in her own handwriting; but although she originally denied her signature, it is now clearly proved, and in fact is admitted at the bar on her behalf, that that letter was signed by her. At this time she was under no coercion, under no pressure; her husband was in prison, and she was living separate and apart from him, and the question of fact which we have to try —and this is, in truth, the question upon which my opinion differs from that of his Lordship the Master of the Rolls—is whether she was a free agent when she wrote that letter. I say, having regard to the circumstances stated by herself, and to the pointed manner in which her attention must have been directed, so recently as April in the same year, to this transaction, having regard to the fact that she admits that she knew that money was about to be raised upon the security of this reversionary interest, and to the fact that she also admits that she actually herself received some portion of the money which was raised by means of this transaction, I say it is impossible to believe that she could have signed so short a document as that of the 11th Oct. 1858, without being fully cognisant of the contents, meaning and object of that document. Then that being so, what is the representation which she then, four days before the completion of this transaction, makes? It is this: "I beg to inform you that previous to my marriage with Edward Bowren on the 3rd Feb. last, I assigned to the said Edward Bowren all my interest under the will of Chas. Lush, Esq., late of Hoxton, Middlesex." I say that having written that, the parties who were about to advance the money, and who did advance it four days afterwards, were entitled to believe the representations so made by her, and I think she cannot now be heard to say that they ought to have disbelieved those representations, and ought to have said, "We do not believe that you did assign to Edward Bowren, previous to your marriage, all your interest under that will." I think it would be contrary to equity and good conscience to allow a lady who had made under such circumstances a declaration so clear and distinct as that, to set up afterwards a claim to an equity to a settlement so as to defeat the interests of the purchasers who, upon the faith of that representation, have paid the purchase-money in respect of this lady's interest.

Consequently I think that the order made by his Lordship the Master of the Rolls must be reversed, and that there should be an order directing the payment of the costs of the trustees in the usual form both in the court below and here. The remainder of the fund will be paid to the society.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—The propositions of law which are applicable to this case are to my mind very simple, and such as are not disputed, and they are these—viz., that a married woman may by fraud preclude herself from her equity to a settlement, and added to that I have no objection to this, although I do not think it necessary for the decision of this case, that she may also preclude herself by fraud from any right to a reversionary interest falling due after the death of her husband. In fact if that was not so it would be contrary to what has been decided over and over again in this court—viz., that a married woman who chooses to commit a fraud may be held responsible for that fraud.

Then the next question is whether in this case there has been fraud in the statements made by the married lady. Taking all the circumstances into consideration I have no doubt that the document which she represents to have been signed on some day after the marriage in Feb. 1858, was in truth signed on the day which she so represents. With reference to that document what she says is, that her husband threatened to leave her if she did not sign it, and she says in her cross-examination, "I think I must have known that he was trying to borrow money upon my property. My husband told me that if I would sign exhibit 1, he could borrow money upon my property, and I signed it with the intention of enabling him to do so." The whole of that document is written in her hand, it is written in a very plain hand, and in a very firm hand, and I can have no hesitation in saying that a married woman who signs a document of that description under those circumstances, if she turns round afterwards and affects to come to this court, and to say that she is entitled to make a claim as against that document, must be treated as having committed a fraud. In this case there is no evidence of any such pressure or influence as would do away with the effect of that act which she did, and there is a very wide difference indeed between a case where it is a matter of contract and a case where it is a matter such as this—viz., a matter of false representation and fraud.

Then that being so, the next question really is whether the society was cognisant of the fraud. It is quite plain that they were not, because this was a sale by auction; they bought it at the auction in the usual way, and paid a fair consideration for it, and indeed that they were cognisant of the fraud has never been suggested.

Then there is this further question, viz., was there any such negligence on their part as would visit the society with the same consequences as if they had been cognisant of the fraud? I think there was no negligence. I think it would be a monstrous thing where property is put up for sale by public auction, and documents of this description are produced which, on the face of them, would lead any person to believe that they were bonâ fide, in the absence of proof, full and conclusive to the contrary, that they should be bound to make any further inquiry than that which would appear on the face of these documents. This document itself is not an unusual document; it was no improbable document for a married lady to have executed; it is neither more nor less than this—that this lady, being entitled to a certain sum of money expectant on the death of her mother, gives up her right to a settlement to her husband. There would be nothing very extraordinary in that, nor anything very extraordinary in its being done in a document of this description. Then as to the decree also; to that decree all necessary parties are proper parties. It is true that the decree does not recite that there was any evidence, but you cannot impute to persons that, when a decree is brought to them, because it does not recite there is any evidence, therefore it is put upon them to inquire whether there was evidence or not. When such a document as this is presented to the purchaser, and such a decree as that is presented to a purchaser, I cannot hold him liable for negligence because he makes no further inquiry. But here there is an additional fact, that beyond all question this lady must have known perfectly well when her husband was in prison, that Mr. Bowen May, his solicitor, was trying to raise money, and was raising money, upon the footing of the very document which she signed in the month of April. In the course of that transaction, because the trustees had said that they had had no notice, without any suspicion, to my mind, being aroused on the part of the society, a request is made that she would sign a letter stating that she had executed this document antecedently to her marriage. She signs that letter, and although she has forgotten it, I have no hesitation in imputing to her, and in saying that every court must impute to her, a knowledge of the contents of that letter. It would be most monstrous, and in fact the transactions of life could not go on, if, after putting her signature to a document of that description, she could be heard to come into court and assert such a right.

For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that, whether there is an equity to a settlement, or whether it is a reversionary interest, it would be most unjust that this lady should be allowed to come forward, and to assert in this court, contrary to all good conscience, any right of any kind or of any description. I cannot help saying that I think, considering what the acts done were, she ought not to have made this claim in any shape or form, and that it was not an honest thing to do. I quite agree that she is very much to be pitied, because she has contracted a most imprudent marriage, and because she has been deserted by her husband, and because in all probability her husband influenced her more or less; but that is no reason why a married lady, who chooses to commit a fraud, should afterwards come forward and say, notwithstanding that fraud, "I am entitled to property which other persons have been induced to purchase, because I made a misrepresentation, and I made a misrepresentation which I knew at the time I made it to be utterly and wholly untrue."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order below must be discharged, and that the society must have the money.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Ex parte MORRIS; Re THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

Bankruptcy—Adjudication—Parliamentary privilege—Non-trader—4 Geo. 3, c. 33—Bankruptcy Act 1849, ss. 66 and 77—Bankruptcy Act 1861, s. 69.

A non-trader having privilege of Parliament, is liable to be made a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, s. 69.

Accordingly a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against a peer of the realm, not a trader, which had been dismissed by one of the commissioners in bankruptcy, on the ground that such a person was not liable to be made a bankrupt, was remitted to the commissioner to hear and determine upon the evidence whether an act of bankruptcy had been committed.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Commissioner Winslow, dismissing, with costs, a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against his Grace the Duke of Newcastle, upon the ground that a person entitled to privilege of Parliament was not within the operation of sect. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. The judgment of the learned commissioner is reported ante p. 368.

Mr. Morris, the petitioning creditor, appealed from his Honour's decision.

De Gex, Q.C., Sargood, Serjt., and Bagley for the appellant.—We rely on sect. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, which provides that all debtors, whether traders or not, shall be subject to the provisions of that Act. On the other side it is contended that a person having privilege of Parliament cannot be made a bankrupt, unless he is a trader, and that the only act of bankruptcy on which a petition against such a person can be founded is such as is mentioned in sect. 87 of the Bankruptcy Act 1849. We admit we do not found our petition on such an act of bankruptcy. But sect. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 is quite general in its terms, and why should it not apply to a non-trader having privilege of Parliament? The case of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy, 2 Leon. 173, is in our favour, though it is said on the other side to have been overruled by Cassidy v. Steuart, 2 M. & G. 437, which decided that a ca. sa. could be issued against an M.P. in order to found proceedings in outlawry. Then in Ex parte Meymot, 1 Atk. 196, 200, there is a dictum of Lord Hardwicke, that a person who traded could at that time be made a bankrupt. An argument before the commissioner was, that there a bankrupt gets protection of his person as a condition of giving up his property to his creditors, and that this reason could not apply to the case of a person who does not receive protection from arrest. But in truth the remedy against the person in bankruptcy is only for the purpose of reaching the bankrupt's goods; bankruptcy is a statutory execution. The ground, however, of the commissioner's decision was, that, previous to the Act 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, the only act of bankruptcy which a man could be forced to commit was lying in prison, which of course was not applicable to persons having privilege of Parliament, and therefore, by that statute, a method analogous to the present trader-debtor summons was introduced, of compelling a person entitled to privilege of Parliament who was a trader to commit an act of bankruptcy. This provision is continued by sect. 66 of the Act of 1849. The same method was, by sect. 8 of 1 Vict. c. 110, introduced as to ordinary traders as a compensation for the abolition of arrest on mesne process. The stat. 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, it is said, contains a recital that doubts had been entertained, whether a trader having Parliamentary privilege could be made a bankrupt. We say, however, that those doubts were unfounded, and cannot have any weight merely because the Act makes a provision for removing them. This can afford no ground for limiting the construction of the express words of sect. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, that all debtors, whether traders or not, shall be liable to its provisions. The other side wish to read those words as meaning "all debtors not having privilege of Parliament." In the Act of 1849 the words "trader," "debtor," "bankrupt," are used indiscriminately, because trading was then essential to bankruptcy. But that is not so now, and it does not follow that, because you find the word trader in a particular section of the Act of 1849, and that Act, so far as it is unrepealed, is, by sect. 232 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, to be construed with the Act of 1861 as one Act, therefore that particular section of the former Act only applies now to traders. That this must be so, is shown by a consideration of sects. 177 and 178 of the former Act, the one of which provides for proof of a contingent debt, the other for the proof of a contingent liability. In sect. 177 the word "bankrupt" is used, while in sect. 178 the word "trader" is used; but it is clear that now a contingent liability is proveable against a non-trader's estate. The other side rely on the judgment of Lord Cairns in Re Bristow, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 247; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222; but the ground of the decision in that case was, that the power to make a non-trader bankrupt was not ex parte as in the case of a trader. The case of Re Hepburn, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 275; 15 W. R. 1065, is in our favour, for there it was held that a non-trader equally with a trader, is entitled to time to show cause against an adjudication of bankruptcy, though sect. 104 of the Act of 1849, upon which it was founded, refers to proof of trading. What the other side have to do, is to show that there is anything to control the meaning of the words, "all debtors" in sect. 69 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861.

Sir R. Palmer, Q. C. and Ernest Reed, on behalf of the duke.—"Privileges of Parliament," are defined by Blackstone as extending to freedom of speech, person, servants, lands, and goods. Parliamentary privileges have been gradually curtailed by a series of statutes, but if they have not been expressly cut down they remain as they were in ancient times; they cannot be affected by the general words of a statute.

A capias ad respondendum was the only way of compelling the appearance of the defendant to an action, but it could only be issued in cases in which a ca. sa. could be issued. Neither was applicable to persons having privilege of Parliament.

Sir W. Jones's Rep. 154.

The note of Mr. Serjeant Manning in the case of Cassidy v. Stuart, 2 Man. & Gr. 437, gives a full answer to the case of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy, 2 Leon. 173, which is relied on against us. The remedial legislation against the privilege of Parliament is contained in a series of statutes, 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 3; 2 & 3 Ann, c. 18; 11 Geo. 2, c. 24; and 10 Geo. 3, c. 50; but they all save the privilege of freedom from arrest, except in cases of felony. Bankruptcy, as to members of Parliament, was dealt with by the stat. 4 Geo. 3, c. 33. It is, however, limited to the traders mentioned in it, and it provides a new species of act of bankruptcy. The dictum of Lord Hardwicke, in 1 Atk. 200, was not germane to the subject before him, and was entirely extrajudicial. The case of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy (ubi sup.) has never been recognised as settling the law. There is something to show that the Legislature considered persons entitled to privilege of Parliament as being outside the bankruptcy laws. For instance, in 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 4, the power to deal with the body is inseparable from the rest of the Act, and therefore it could not apply to privileged persons. Then come the Acts 13 Eliz. c. 7, 1 Jac. 1, c. 15, to which a similar argument applies. The statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, does not contain any question applying to persons having privilege of Parliament. Then came the statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, already referred to, and the statute 45 Geo. 3, c. 124. It is clear that Parliament thought that specific legislation was requisite to make a trader, having privilege of Parliament, a bankrupt, and it has not thought fit to extend that legislation to non-traders having that privilege. That special mode of procedure was continued by stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, which repealed, but in substance re-enacted, the former Acts, and again by the Act of 1849. We have now, remembering the history of the bankrupt laws, to construe the Acts of 1849 and 1861, on which the question really turns. Sects. 66 and 77 of the Act of 1849 are unrepealed, and are to be construed as part of the Act of 1861. So construing that Act the true conclusion is that, as the sections relating to persons having privilege of Parliament are limited to traders, they alone are included in the Act. If this be not so, there is in the Act no saving from arrest of privileged non-traders, though the object of the Act was in some respects to favour non-traders. In this case non-traders would be in a worse position than traders. The powers of arrest under the Act of 1861 are very extensive—sects. 82, 85, 112, 113, 226. The construction of the Act for which we contend is that which was approved by Lord Cairns in Re Bristow (ubi sup.), and it is not unreasonable, because the object of the Act of 1861 was to blend together the bankruptcy and insolvency laws, and the previous system of insolvency did not apply to privileged persons, for they were not obliged to seek protection as they could not be arrested for debt. It is clear that the words "all debtors" must have some qualification, for they would not include a prince of the blood royal, nor a foreign ambassador. Sects. 161, 165, and others of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, relating to the order of discharge, evidently assume that the bankrupt is a person liable to arrest, and therefore those sections cannot apply to a person having privilege of Parliament.

De Gex, Q. C. in reply.—Serjt. Stone, commenting on the statute of Elizabeth, says that a barony shall not be sold; thereby implying that a peer could be made a bankrupt. In Davis on the Law of Bankrupts, published in 1744, it is said that a commission was executed against John Burridge, an M.P., and it is stated that all persons, even a nobleman, who trade are liable to be made bankrupt. The statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, was passed merely to provide a means of compelling a privileged trader to become bankrupt, which could not be done before. The statutes 52 Hen. 3, c. 23; 13 Edw. 1, c. 11; 25 Edw. 3, c. 171; 19 Hen. 7, c. 9; cited by Serjt. Manning in his note to Cassidy v. Stewart (ubi sup.) do not impugn the case of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy (ubi sup.). The sound rule of construction is that the construction of a statute is to be procured by the preamble. The preamble of the statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, speaks of the honour and dignity of Parliament being concerned, that the law should have its course against insolvent traders though privileged; surely that honour and dignity are equally concerned in making non-traders pay their debts. The distinction which there existed between traders and non-traders arose from totally different causes. The reference in statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 19, to privilege of Parliament is really an argument in my favour. I really do not require sect. 66 in the Act of 1849, for sect. 69 of the Act of 1861 is quite general in its terms. This accords with the well-known principle of construction of Acts of Parliament laid down in Stradling v. Morgan, Plow. 205.

Lord Justice GIFFARD.—The real difficulty is how to reconcile sect. 69 of the Act of 1861 with the privilege of Parliament, looking at the powers of arrest in the Act.

De Gex, Q. C.—The way to meet that is to construe the Act of 1861 as substituting the word "debtor" for the word "trader" in the Act of 1849, except when a contrary intention appears. The proviso at the end of sect. 69 would have no meaning, unless but for its insertion the Act of 1849 would have applied as to acts of bankruptcy to non-traders.

At the conclusion of the arguments judgment was reserved, and was delivered on Nov. 20, when

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The question in this case is whether the Duke of Newcastle is exempt from the operation of the bankruptcy laws now in force, because he is a peer. In the arguments before me, the bankruptcy laws were traced from their commencement up to the Act of 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, and from that period up to the bankruptcy statutes now in force, being those of 1849 and 1861. The privileges of Parliament were also referred to, as asserted from the year 1610 down, and subsequently, to the date of the 10 Geo. 3, c. 50, and the dictum of Lord Hardwicke in Ex parte Meymot, 1 Atk. 201, was quoted, as well as the cases of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy, 2 Leon. 178, and Cassidy v. Stewart, 2 M. & G. 487. Before referring to the statutes of 1849 and 1861, on which, as it seems to me, the question rests and may well be decided, it is in my judgment sufficient to state that antecedently to the 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, no special reference was made in any of the Bankruptcy Acts to persons having privilege of Parliament; that the enactments were general; that there appears no reason to doubt but that in one instance, as stated by Lord Hardwicke, a commission was issued against the Earl of Suffolk, for trading in wines, and that as stated in page 7 of the Laws relating to Bankrupts, by Thomas Davis, dated 1774, a commission was issued against John Burridge, who was a member of Parliament; that it is to be inferred that there was no contest, at all events in any court of law, as to whether these commissions were or were not rightly and lawfully issued; that there then came the Act of 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, which recited the existence of doubts as to whether commissions could be issued against persons having privilege of Parliament, and contained special enactments relating to such persons; that in every Act from that time, down to and including the Act of 1849, either the Act of Geo. 3 has been continued or special clauses have been enacted having special reference to persons having privilege of Parliament; that I do not well see how the case of Harris v. Lord Mountjoy can be reconciled with that of Cassidy v. Stuart; that whatever may have been the real or asserted extent of Parliamentary privilege in times gone by, the goods, lands, and property of a person having privilege of Parliament, subsequently at least to 10 Geo. 3, c. 50, were not, and have not since been, exempt from process; that the dictum of Lord Hardwicke, for it is not a decision, is a direct expression of opinion by him, that "though there may be some particular powers that commissioners of bankruptcy could not exercise against a peer, yet, notwithstanding this, he may be liable to a commission of bankruptcy if he will trade;" that I can see no reason why this opinion should be considered contrary to law or sound reasoning, if at its date the privilege of Parliament did not extend to the goods and property of persons having that privilege; and that in present times at all events Parliamentary privilege does not extend beyond protection of the person. With these observations the material sections of the Acts of 1849 and 1861 may be referred to, bearing in mind first, that it was positively recited in the Act of 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, that that Act was passed to remedy inconveniences, and to support the honour and dignity of Parliament; and, secondly, that not only from the dictum of Lord Hardwicke, but also from the acknowledged canons of construction, the rule to be deduced is that general words will be so construed as to be subject to the exemptions of persons or property specially exempted, and, on the same principle, as subject to the special privileges of persons specially privileged; or, in other words, that they will not be so construed as to destroy special exemptions or special privileges. It is upon these principles we have to deal with the statutes now in force. The first of them, that of 1849, applied, as all previous bankruptcy statutes had, to traders only; and by sect. 65 it enacts "with respect to persons liable as traders to become bankrupt" that "all traders shall be deemed liable to become bankrupt," and by the 66th section, "That if any such trader, having privilege of Parliament, shall commit any act of bankruptcy, he may be dealt with under this Act in like manner as any other trader; but such person shall not be subject to be arrested or imprisoned during the time of such privilege, except in cases made felonies or misdemeanors by this Act." So far the matter is clear, and if the Duke of Newcastle was a trader there would be no question. Then we have the Act of 1861; that Act is entitled "An Act to amend the Law relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency in England." It had for one of its objects that of making all debtors, whether traders or not, subject to the bankruptcy laws. By the 230th section it repealed several sections of the Act of 1849, and enacted in the 232nd section that the Act of 1861 "should be construed together with so much of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849 as remains unrepealed as one Act;" and in the 69th section, "As to the persons subject to this Act: all debtors, whether traders or not, shall be subject to the provisions of this Act." The argument is that the words "all debtors, whether traders or not," do not include persons having privilege of Parliament, because those persons are not specially mentioned. But the Act of 1849 specified as traders who were to be subject to the bankruptcy laws, traders who had not, and traders who had, privilege of Parliament. "Traders," in the 69th section of the Act of 1861 must be as extensive as "traders" in the Act of 1849, and there is no sound reason for holding that debtors having privilege of Parliament should be excluded from the term "all debtors," when they are included in the term "traders" which follows; unless, at all events, there be a context rendering such a construction necessary, and there is no such context. I am of opinion that the words "all debtors" include debtors having privilege of Parliament—first, because the clause, even if taken alone, might well be read and dealt with as being subject, as regards privileged persons, to their privileges, without altogether exempting privileged persons. Secondly, because the term "traders" includes privileged traders, and "all debtors" are substituted for "such traders." Thirdly, having regard to the reference of the one Act to, and the incorporation of the one with, the other, because the word "traders" in the 66th section of the Act of 1849 must be taken as extended by that of 1861 to all debtors having privilege of Parliament. There is at least one other section of the Act of 1849 in which the word "traders" must be taken as extended to all debtors, whether traders or not—that is the 178th; and when the whole of the 69th section is considered, the construction which I have stated to be the true one, is further fortified by this—viz., that where it is intended there should be a difference between traders and non-traders, that difference is specified, for the end of the section is, "but no debtor who is not a trader shall be adjudged bankrupt except in respect of some one of the acts of bankruptcy hereinafter described." True it is, that persons having privilege of Parliament were not within the repealed insolvency laws, but this was because they could not be arrested on ordinary civil process; and the very object of the Act of 1861 was to put traders and non-traders on the same footing as regards bankruptcy, with some specified exceptions, in some matters only; and persons having privilege of Parliament are not among the specified exceptions. If persons having privilege of Parliament are omitted from the Act of 1861 it is from inadvertence and not from intention. They are included, quite as a matter of course, in the Act which is to come into operation after Christmas, and though I cannot supply an inadvertent omission, if omission there be, for it is my duty to administer and not to make laws, I have no hesitation in saying that the intention of the Legislature is expressed, and that the case, though perhaps of some importance, is sufficiently plain, and quite free from any real difficulty. The proper course, therefore, will be to discharge the commissioner's order; to remit the petition back to him for hearing; and to direct that the appellant's costs of this appeal, if there be an adjudication on his petition, be added to the costs of his petition; if there be not, that there shall be no costs of this appeal, and that the deposit be returned. I have only to add that the commissioner was quite right in deciding that further evidence could be admitted on the petitioner's part.

Ernest Reed then asked for leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

Lord Justice GIFFARD directed a notice of motion to be given.

Re THE PROVIDENT CLERKS' MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION: Re MOSELEY'S POLICY.

Practice—Petition—Parties—Costs.

An insurance company received from a firm of solicitors a notice not to pay moneys due on a policy to any claimant, as a suit was about to be instituted for the administration of the estate, of which the policy formed part, and that they (the solicitors) would probably act for the person to be appointed to get in the estate. The company thereupon paid the policy moneys into court. On a petition to get the money out:

Held, that the solicitors were not proper respondents to the petition, and were entitled to the costs of it, which, however, to save the expense of taxation, were limited to 3l.

This was a petition presented by the trustees of the settlement and the widow of Robert Moseley, under these circumstances:

In Dec. 1866, Robert Moseley effected an insurance on his life in the Provident Clerks' Mutual Life Assurance Association. In April 1869, Robert Moseley died, and upon his death the secretary of the association received a letter from Messrs. Le Blanc and Torr, solicitors, to the effect that they were concerned for several creditors of R. Moseley, and were taking the necessary steps to obtain a proper administration of his estate, and as they in all probability would represent the person to be appointed by the court to get in the estate, they had to request that the association would not pay the policy moneys to any claimants.

Upon the receipt of this letter, the association paid the money due on the policy, viz., 589*l.* 6*s.* into court.

The petitioners thereupon presented this petition, making the association and Messrs. Le Blanc and Torr respondents. They alleged that there was no ground for the claim set up by Messrs. Le Blanc and Torr, and they prayed (inter alia), that Messrs. Le Blanc and Torr might be ordered to pay both the costs incurred by the payment of the money into court, and of the petition.

Bristowe, Q. C., and Winterbotham, for the petition.

Dickinson, Q. C., and Gardiner, for Messrs. Le Blanc and Torr.

Villiers for the association.

Roche, for other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the money must be paid to the petitioners. It was a mistake, however, making the solicitors respondents, and they must have their costs, but in order to avoid taxation, he would direct that they should be paid 3*l.* for their costs.

THE LANDED ESTATES COMPANY (LIMITED) v. WEEDING.

Specific performance—Exchange—Infant—Acts of Trustee—Acquiescence.

A company was formed to purchase land for building purposes, and having become possessed of the W. Park estate, which was in the vicinity of a railway station, negotiated with the tenant for life of a portion of the intervening land necessary to form a road to the station, and the Inclosure Commissioners were applied to, and the surveyors of those representing the tenant for life, of the company, and of the commissioners, reported favourably for an exchange of two small pieces of land; and the company took possession and made the road, which was publicly used. The tenant for life died; negotiations were renewed with the guardian of the tenant in tail, but he also died, and the acting trustee of the estate, who had hitherto acquiesced, within two months of the next tenant for life attaining twenty-one, objected. Such tenant for life on coming of age at once repudiated the whole transaction. A bill filed for specific performance, and an injunction, dismissed without costs.

This bill was filed for a declaration that an agreement for exchange of two small pieces of land in the immediate vicinity of Worcester-park estate, near Maldon, Surrey, and the Weeding estate, might be specifically performed; for damages, and an injunction to restrain interference with a certain road. The plaintiff company was incorporated under the Act of 1862, for purchasing real estates, and dividing and selling the same, and in 1864 purchased the Worcester-park estate, consisting of 302 acres, of William Wells. It appeared that to make the estate available for the purposes of the company a road should be made to the adjacent station on the South-Western Railway, called the Worcester-park station, through land belonging to a Mr. Farnell and the Weeding estate.

The company purchased a piece of land of Mr. Farnell for the road, and negotiated for the purchase of another piece of the Weeding estate for the same purpose; and in April 1864 an agreement was come to between Mr. Hook for the company and Mr. Lewin on the other side, that, as soon as circumstances would permit, an exchange should be effected of a piece of land, part of the Weeding estate, for another piece, part of the Worcester-park estate, and that application should be made to the Inclosure Commissioners to carry it out under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118. A correspondence ensued between Mr. Hook and Messrs. Vandercom, Cree, and Law, Solicitors for the Weeding Estate, which was entailed, the tenant for life, Mr. Thomas Weeding being in India, and a draft agreement of exchange was sent by Messrs. Vandercom, Cree, and Law, to Messrs. Thorndike and Smith, the solicitors to the company, and approved of on behalf of the company, and Mr. Wells. It was made between William Wells of the one part, and Thomas Weeding of the other part, and recited the will of Thomas Weeding, deceased, whereby the Weeding Estate was vested in his widow, Mary Weeding, Richard Baggallay, Alfred John Pidgeon, and John Baggallay, upon trust for Mary Weeding for life, with remainder to Thomas Weeding for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with divers remainders over. It also recited that the testator died in 1856, and his widow in Feb. 1860, and the proposal to exchange the lands, to make the road, with certain provisions as to its user, and that the Inclosure Commissioners should be applied to. The company took possession of the land after this was determined upon, and set out the road, and on the faith of having the use of it under the proposed agreement, had done other acts involving an outlay of 100,000*l.* by them and subpurchasers. The Inclosure Commissioners were applied to, and a Mr. Beeston appointed surveyor, who made his report that the proposed exchange would be materially beneficial. Meantime Mr. Thomas Weeding died in India, leaving his wife enceinte, and a posthumous child was born in March 1865, who became tenant in tail of the estate. The matter was then transacted with his mother and guardian, but he died on the 20th Sept. 1866, before anything was formally signed and agreed to, and the defendant, son of Mr. John Baggallay, came into the estate as tenant for life in possession, and was then eighteen years old.

A correspondence then ensued between Messrs. Vandercom and Co. and Messrs. Smith and Gwilt, the company's solicitors, in reference to the mode in which this road had been made, protesting against anything departing from the plan approved by Mr. Lewin, and meetings took place between Mr. Lewin and Mr. Hook. Matters remained until the 2nd May 1868, when Messrs. Vandercom and Co. wrote to say that Mr. John Baggallay had instructed them to say that if the exchange was not completed within a month, he would direct a trench to be cut across the land so as to stop the traffic on the road. Several letters passed, and on the 27th Messrs. Vandercom and Co. wrote to say they had advised John Baggallay that there was no fiscal agreement binding on him or the company, but as he wanted a good approach he was willing to discuss the question at twenty-four hours' notice. Several more letters were written, and a notice board placed on the land to the effect that the road would be closed on the 12th June 1868. This produced a remonstrance, and ten days' undertaking was given not to interfere with the road; but as the board was again put up and the threat of the trench renewed, this bill was filed, the defendant having come of age a few days only previous to such filing. It appeared that counsel for the Weeding family had approved of this draft agreement, adding that he considered it beneficial to all parties; and the bill contained the following charge as the equity upon which it rested.

The plaintiff company charges that there was a valid, effectual, and binding agreement in the lifetime of the said Thomas Weeding, deceased, between him, with the sanction of the trustees of the Weeding estate, on the one hand, and the company on the other, for the exchange of the said piece of land belonging to the Weeding estate for double the quantity of land in the situation hereinbefore mentioned belonging to the Worcester-park estate, and that such agreement was, after the death of the said Thomas Weeding, adopted and confirmed by the said Elizabeth Weeding, as the guardian of the said infant tenant in tail, and by the trustees of the said Weeding estate, and that the same has been since adopted and acted upon by the said Mr. John Baggallay, as the guardian of the defendant Thomas Weeding Baggallay (now Weeding) until he came of age, and also by the said trustees; and moreover, the plaintiff company, under the faith of the said agreement and its validity, expended large sums as hereinbefore mentioned, and has entered into numerous contracts, under which the company is subject to very heavy liabilities, and will be exposed to very serious loss if the defendant is now allowed to repudiate the said agreement, and to proceed, as he threatens and intends to do, to interfere with the said roadway or traffic thereon.

The will of Thomas Weeding contained the following clause: "And I especially direct that it shall be lawful for the trustees for the time being of my will, to enter into and give effect to any agreement which they may think it beneficial to my estate to enter into with the owners of any land lying adjacent to my lands at Kentish Town or elsewhere, to form a road or roads, with the consent and approbation of the leaseholder of the land through which such road or roads shall be made, and to convey or devote a portion of my land for the purpose, the owner or owners of the adjacent land giving up and devoting a commensurate or reasonable portion of his or their property for the same object." It appeared that Mr. John Baggallay acted under a general power of attorney given to him by the testator; and it was alleged by the plaintiffs that Mr. Richard Baggallay (his father) and Mr. Pidgeon (now dead) took little or no part in the trust matters.

The defendant put in his answer which, as far as is material, was to the following effect:—He either expressed ignorance of, or admitted mere facts; but as to the plaintiffs' case, he submitted that he was an infant at the time when the transactions alleged took place, and not bound thereby. That there never was any agent duly authorised of his, although Mr. John Baggallay might have been agent for Thomas Weeding, but admitted that Mr. Hook and Mr. Lewin acted as agents, the latter subject to the approval of Mr. John Baggallay, but having no power to represent the owners of the Weeding estate; there was not, in fact, any negotiation, nor was Mr. Lewin the agent of the Weeding estate, and the defendant, moreover, called in question the ability of Mr. Lewin to act in such capacity; and denying that he acted under Vandercom and Co.; the only agent, if any, being Mr. John Baggallay. That Mr. Hook was aware also that Mr. Lewin had no power to agree. The answer then denied the value of the road, and that the trustees had any power of exchange. The defendant then denied, in particular the part alleged to have been taken by Mr. Lewin as to plans, &c. That Mr. John Baggallay was ignorant until after 1864 of the particulars of the exchange, and was not acting trustee. That the solicitors were not agents for the estate, nor acted as his (the defendant's) solicitors. The answer then alleged ignorance of the plaintiffs' taking possession, but alleged that any person laying out a road did so wrongfully; and expressed ignorance as to the money laid out by the plaintiffs, but that they knew there was no binding agreement, although the road was dedicated to the public, so far as the plaintiffs had power to do so. A Mr. Henry Curry had been consulted as to the propriety of the exchange, and it appeared in evidence that he had given an unfavourable opinion.

Glasse, Q. C. and J. Napier Higgins, appeared for the plaintiffs, and contended that what had occurred constituted an equity which the court would recognise for the purpose of enforcing the contract against the defendant, Mr. Thomas Weeding Weeding, or, if not, that there was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff company to the injunction. The ground of this equity was that Mr. John Baggallay, having power under the will to arrange to make roads, being the natural guardian of the defendant, and acting under the power of attorney, had not only acquiesced in the transaction, but urged its completion up to a recent period, and that the infant, on the eve of his majority, had been not only cognisant of, but had taken part in what was done, and acquiesced in it all until he was twenty-one, and by himself and Mr. John Baggallay must be held bound in equity. That everything having been done to carry out the exchange by survey, &c., the remainder was mere machinery, and the plaintiff company, having laid out very large sums on the faith of the exchange being carried out, that was such a part performance as the court would consider sufficient to make a decree upon. The defendant's conduct was most unworthy, and, at all events, that alone would, in any event, disentitle him to any costs:

Pilling v. Armitage, 12 Ves. 85;
Gregory v. Mighell, 18 Ves. 328;
Kerr on Injunctions, 41.

Cotton, Q. C. and F. H. Law, for the defendant, argued that there was no contract, and that this case was quite distinct from all the authorities, in which the party held to be bound was himself a party to the negotiations, whereas here he was not only no party but under disability. Moreover, Mr. John Baggallay had for a long time acted on the representation of Mr. Hook that there was a concluded agreement binding him hand and foot, and the moment he understood how the matter really was situated he had repudiated it. It was a dry question of law whether there was a contract or not, or something tantamount to it, which bound the defendant, and it was impossible to contend that there was any such thing. It was to be regretted that observations had been made derogatory to the defendant's honour, for there was nothing to compel him, even in honour, to complete what he never agreed to or entertained, and it only prolonged discussion and imported into the case totally irrelevant matter:

Glasse, Q. C. was heard in reply, and referred to Jackson v. Peter, 5 Ves. 689.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts).—The plaintiffs are in possession, as I most unfeignedly hope they will continue to be, and the only question is whether I can decree specific performance. There can be no doubt that the acts of a tenant for life are void against those in remainder; and I am obliged to come to the conclusion that no act of John Baggallay, nor of the Inclosure Commissioners, or the mother of the infant tenant in tail have amounted to a binding contract to bind the estate. Then the only question is, whether that which might have been done under the will has been sufficient to bind it? As to this, after hearing Mr. Cotton's argument, I am of opinion on the evidence of Mr. Lewin, that this road is as advantageous to the Weeding estate as to Worcester Park, and clearly falls within the power in the will. (The Vice-Chancellor read the power.) It was not necessary that a road should be given for a road; and had the parties acted under this power, it could have been done through the Inclosure Commissioners. But there is no evidence that the trustees did so act under the power, although Mr. John Baggallay might have done it, and it might have been adopted by the other two; and therefore I cannot assume it as against the defendant, or hold the estate bound so as to make the decree asked. I am very sorry for this, as all the merits are in the plaintiffs' favour, and I apply the language of Sir William Grant in Blair v. Sutton (sup.), where he says, "I cannot believe that Sir Richard Sutton, when able to judge and act for himself, will think of taking the benefit of the plaintiffs' improvements without making him a compensation for them." Although, therefore, I am obliged, on technical grounds, to dismiss the bill, I do it without costs. After some discussion, the Vice-Chancellor directed the decree not to be drawn up for a fortnight.

HUDSON v. OSBORNE.

Injunction—Sale of goodwill by assignee in bankruptcy.

There is no substantial difference between the sale of the goodwill of a business by a trader himself, and a sale of it by his assignees in bankruptcy.

A man has no right after the sale of the goodwill of his business by his assignees in bankruptcy to represent himself as carrying on or continuing that identical business.

The defendant Osborne had carried on business as a cheesemonger on premises at Ludgate-hill, known as Osborne House.

In May 1867, Osborne was adjudicated bankrupt. On 1st Aug. 1867, the plaintiff purchased from his assignees in bankruptcy, the premises in Ludgate-hill, with the fixtures and trade utensils, and the goodwill of the business.

In May 1869, defendant Osborne obtained his discharge in bankruptcy, and set up in business as a cheesemonger with the defendant Parker (who had formerly been his foreman), in premises in the Old Bailey, only three doors from Ludgate-hill. He called his new place of business Osborne House, and issued advertisements and circulars, which the bill alleged were calculated to induce the public to believe that the business carried on by him in the Old Bailey was identical with, or a continuation of, the business formerly carried on by him at Ludgate-hill.

The plaintiffs filed their bill against Osborne and Parker to restrain the defendants from representing, in the manner alleged in the bill, their business to be that formerly carried on at Ludgate-hill, or a continuation of it.

Amphlett, Q. C. and J. W Chitty, for the plaintiffs, now moved for an injunction as prayed by the bill, and contended that the goodwill was an asset of the bankrupt's estate, and that there was no distinction between the sale of a goodwill by a trader and the sale of it by his assignees in bankruptcy.

Kay, Q. C. and J. N. Higgins, for the defendants, contra.

Kenedy v. Lee, 3 Mer. 452;
Hall v. Burrows, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 561.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without calling for a reply) said that although advertisement was probably the object of the application, yet both the purchaser and the defendant were entitled to their strict legal rights. In substance there was no distinction between the sale of the goodwill of a business by a person in trade and a sale of it by his assignees in bankruptcy. When a person became bankrupt, the goodwill became an asset of the estate, and the assignees had a right to sell everything. It seemed to be settled that if the goodwill of a man's business was sold he had no right to represent himself as carrying on that business which he has sold, nor to use its trade marks, or to represent himself as the continuer of the business. It might be conceded that there was nothing to prevent the defendant from setting up business next door to the plaintiff, or from representing that he had been twenty-two years at Osborne House, or from representing that Parker had been his principal assistant. But the defendant had no right to call his house of business Osborne House, as that was a mode of representing the business to be the same, "Osborne House" being the designation of the business, and that name could only be assumed to make the public believe that it was the same business. The defendant had no right to talk of the old and new firm in such a way as to produce an impression that they were the same business. The advertisements issued by the defendants appeared to be utterly unjustifiable, as they amounted in effect to a statement that the defendants' business was the same as that carried on by the old firm. There would therefore be an injunction restraining the defendants from using bill-heads having such emblems as described in the bill, or from using any such emblems, circulars, and notices as described in the said bill, and from in any manner holding out that the defendants were carrying on business as successors to or in continuation of the business formerly carried on by the defendant Osborne at Ludgate-hill, and from continuing to use the name "Osborne House," or "Osborne's House." The defendants to pay the costs of the suit.

ADAM RIVERS STEELE (app.) v. THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (resps.).

Railway—Entering upon land before compensation made—What is a "wilful" entering within sect. 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

The words "wilfully enter upon and take possession of any lands" in sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 do not apply to a case where the parties have entered under a mistaken belief of their right to enter upon the lands.

A railway company being desirous of entering upon land before an agreement had been come to for compensation pursuant to sect. 85 of the above Act, proceeded under sect. 59 to have a surveyor nominated for determining such compensation. One of the justices who nominated him was a shareholder in the company, but this fact was unknown at the time to the company, and the company thereupon entered upon the land:

Held, that this was not a "wilful" entering within the meaning of the section.

This was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and was as follows:

This case is stated by us, the undersigned, Stephen Ponder Kennard and William Charles Lake Bashford, Esq., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, according to the statute made and passed in the twenty-first year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria (c. 43), to improve the administration of the law so far as respects summary proceedings before justices of the peace.

On the 13th Aug. 1868, the above named Adam Rivers Steele, of Cricklewood, in the parish of Willesden, in the said county of Middlesex, Esq., made complaint, in due form of law, before Patrick Douglas Hadow, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Middlesex, against the above named the Midland Railway Company, for that the said company, being the promoters of a certain undertaking, to wit, the railway between London and Bedford, with the branches therefrom by the Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, authorised to be made at the parish of Hendon, in the county aforesaid, did otherwise than is by The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 in that behalf excepted, unlawfully and wilfully enter upon and take possession of certain land of and in the possession and occupation of the said Adam Rivers Steele there situate, which said land was at the time of the said company so as aforesaid, entering upon and taking possession thereof as aforesaid, required to be purchased and permanently used by the said company for the purposes and under the provisions of the said Act of Parliament, The Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, the same being the special Act within the true intent and meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845—without any such consent as is mentioned or referred to in or by sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and without having made any such payment for the benefit of any parties or party interested in the said land or such deposit by way of security, as are respectively mentioned or referred to in or by the said sect. 89, and without having bonâ fide and without collusion paid any compensation agreed or awarded to be paid in respect of the said land to any person whom the said company reasonably believed to be entitled thereto, and without having deposited the same in the Bank of England or otherwise, for the benefit of the party or parties interested in the said land, or made such deposit by way of security in respect thereof as mentioned or referred to in the said sect. 89, although such person might not legally have been entitled thereto; and that thereby and by reason of such entry and taking possession as aforesaid the said company did damage to the said land to a large amount, to wit, the sum of 5000*l.* contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and that the time when the matter of the said complaint arose and the time of the commission of the said offence were and each was within six calendar months when last past, whereby and by force of the statute in that behalf the said company had forfeited to the said Adam Rivers Steele the sum of 10*l.* and also the sum of 5000*l.*, the amount of the damage which was done to the said land by reason of such entry and taking possession thereof as aforesaid.

On the 2nd Sept. 1868 the said complaint came on to be heard before us the said Stephen Ponder Kennard and William Charles Lake Bashford, as such justices as aforesaid, at the Court House, Edgware, in the said county, when both parties by their counsel appeared before us. The complaint against the said railway company arises under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, sect. 89.

Upon hearing the said complaint as aforesaid, it was proved before us, and we find as follows:

The said company are the Midland Railway Company mentioned and referred to as the Midland Railway Company in the Midland Railway Company (Extension to London) Act 1863, which received the royal assent and was passed on the 22nd June 1863. A copy of this Act accompanies this case, and is to be considered as part of it.

Before and at the respective times of giving the notices hereinafter mentioned, the said Adam Rivers Steele was possessed of a certain house and land at Cricklewood aforesaid, described and delineated in the plan which accompanies this case; this plan and the statements thereon are correct, and are to be taken as part of this case.

The land which was entered upon and taken by the said company, as after mentioned, has been continually since the year 1855, until taken possession of by the said company as herein mentioned, used and occupied by the said Adam Rivers Steele with his house, and was always during that time necessary for the convenience of the said Adam Rivers Steele as occupier of the said house.

In the month of Sept. 1864 the said company, under and by virtue of the said Act of Parliament, gave notice in writing to the said Adam Rivers Steele, dated the 12th of that month, requiring to purchase and take for the purposes of the last-mentioned Act a part containing 1a. 0r. 28p. of his aforesaid land, and which was subject to the enactment contained in sect. 5 of the said Act of Parliament.

The following is a copy of the said notice:

Midland Railway (Extension to London.)

You are requested to take notice that the Midland Railway Company require to purchase and take for the purposes of the Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, and the Midland Railway (New Lines and Additional Powers) Act 1864, or one of them, all that piece or parcel of land containing by admeasurement 1a. 0r. 28p., or thereabouts, which said piece of land so required as aforesaid is situate in the parish of Hendon, in the county of Middlesex, and is parcel of the larger piece of land defined and described in the plans and books of reference of the railways authorised by the said first above-mentioned Act deposited at the office of the clerk of the peace for the said county of Middlesex, with the No. 3 in the said parish of Hendon, or in whatsoever way the same is therein defined and described, and for the better description of the land so required as aforesaid, the same is delineated on a plan attached hereto, and thereon distinguished by a red colour. And the said company are willing to treat and agree with you and every of you for the purchase of the land and hereditament so required as aforesaid, and as to the compensation to be made to you and every of you for the damage that may be sustained by you and every of you by reason of the execution of the works authorised by the said Acts or either of them, and the said company hereby demand from you and each and every of you the particulars of your respective estates and interests in the lands and hereditaments so required as aforesaid, and of the claims made by each of you respectively in respect hereof.

And you are further required to take notice that, if for twenty-one days after the service hereof you shall fail to state the particulars of your respective claims in respect of the land and hereditaments so required as aforesaid, or treat with the said company in respect thereof, or if you or any of you respectively and the said company shall not agree as to the amount of the compensation to be paid by the said company for or in respect of your respective interests in the premises so required, or the interests therein which you respectively are by the said Acts of Parliament or either of them enabled to sell, or for any damage that may be sustained by you respectively by reason of the execution of the works authorised by the said Acts or either of them, the said company will forthwith proceed to require the amount of such compensation to be settled in the manner provided by the said Act for settling cases of disputed compensation.—Dated this 12th Sept. 1864.

GEORGE BROWN, Secretary of the said Company.

To Adam Rivers Steele, Esq., and to all persons having or claiming any estate or interest in the said land and hereditaments.

On the 3rd Oct. 1864 the said Adam Rivers Steele served upon the said company a notice in writing, having reference to the aforesaid notice of Sept. 1864, and the said land mentioned therein, signed by him, which is as follows:

To the Midland Railway Company.

Take notice that I am not willing to sell or convey a part only of my house, of which, by your notice to me dated the 12th Sept. last it is stated that you require to purchase and take part; and further take notice that I am willing and able to sell and convey the whole of my said house. My estate and interest in my said house is the freehold of inheritance thereof in fee simple in possession.

Dated this 3rd Oct. 1864. A. R. STEELE.

Cricklewood, near London.

An Act of Parliament was passed in 1865 relating to the said company and their powers, "videlicet" the Midland Railway (New Lines and Additional Powers) Act 1865, and by sect. 20 thereof it was enacted that the said company might from time to time enter upon, take, and use, and appropriate all or any of the lands therein described, including certain lands in the said parish of Hendon, provided that except in exercise of the powers granted by the Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, the company should not enter upon, take, or use any of the said lands in the said parish of Hendon, except only the sites of certain new roads, without the consent in writing of the respective owners, lessees, and occupiers of the lands and houses called Rockhalls, situate in the said parish of Hendon, on the east side of the Edgware turnpike road, opposite to the aforesaid house of the said Adam Rivers Steele, situate in the said parish of Willesden, and on the west side of the Edgware turnpike road, or at the option of the company until the said company should have purchased under the powers of the Act 1865 those last-mentioned respective lands and houses.

The said Adam Rivers Steele, and the owners, lessees, and occupiers of the said lands, and houses, called Rockhalls, presented a petition to the House of Commons against the Bill for the said Act, the Midland Railway (New Lines and Additional Powers) Act 1865. The said company put in evidence before the committee of that House to whom the said Bill was referred, the aforesaid notice of the said Adam Rivers Steele, of the 3rd Oct. 1864, and by their counsel, Mr. Cripps, cross-examined thereon before the said committee, the said Adam Rivers Steele, who was examined as a witness in support of the said petition, and the following are, among other, questions and answers upon such cross-examination which are taken from a print of the said proceedings before the said committee:

371. When the clause came to be put in operation did you serve a notice on the Midland Company to take the whole of your property?—Last September.

372. Is that your signature (handing a paper to the witness)?—Yes.

373. Do you know that you have power by law, if any part of your property is taken, to compel them under the circumstances to take the whole?—Any part of my house not my property that relates to my house.

374. This is your notice:—"To the Midland Railway Company. Take notice that I am not willing to sell or convey a part only of my house, of which by your notice to me, dated the 12th Sept. last, it is stated that you require to purchase and take part; and further take notice that I am willing and able to sell and convey the whole of my said house. My estate and interest in my said house is a freehold of inheritance thereof in fee-simple in possession. Dated this 3rd Oct. 1864.—A. R. Steele, Cricklewood, near London." That you served on the company?—I sent in that answer to their notice to me that they were going to take part of my property.

375. Was this the plan which accompanied their notice to you of what they required to take?—I have no doubt that it is.

376. That is part of your field?—Yes, which I occupy with my house.

377. When you say it is part of your house, you mean part of a field occupied with the house?—Yes, in law, part of the house.

378. That gave you, strictly speaking, power to compel them to take the whole?—I consider so.

Google

379. 1863 was the Act, and notice was served in 1864?—The 3rd Oct. 1864.

The said Adam Rivers Steele was represented by Rodwell, Q. C. and Stephenson as his counsel on the said petition, but in re-examination, no further questions were put upon this matter.

The said committee afterwards inserted the aforesaid provision in the 20th section, but did not include the said Adam Rivers Steele or his said house therein.

The said Adam Rivers Steele, and the owners, lessees, and occupiers of the said lands and houses, called Rockhalls, afterwards presented a petition to the House of Lords against the said Bill, and the said Adam Rivers Steele proposed to the committee of that House, to whom the said Bill was referred, that words should be added to the aforesaid provision in the said 20th section, extending it to him; the said company then put in evidence before the said committee the said notice of the said Adam Rivers Steele of the 3rd Oct. 1864, and Mr. Cripps, their counsel, then stated to the said committee that it was impossible for the said company to take any part of the land of the said Adam Rivers Steele without taking the whole. The said Adam Rivers Steele was represented by counsel on this occasion also, who had the opportunity of being heard in reply to the said statement of Mr. Cripps. The said committee did not extend the aforesaid provision in the said 20th section to the said Adam Rivers Steele.

On the 8th Nov. 1865 William Bryan, a clerk of Messrs. Beale, Marigold, and Beale, the solicitors of the said company asked Richard Hall the younger, surveyor, to go with him to the justices of the peace sitting at Hampstead, in the said county of Middlesex, for the purpose of being nominated under sect. 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 as an able practical surveyor, to value the plaintiff's land comprised in the said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864, and they then went there together for that purpose, and before James Marshall and Robert Prance, two of Her Majesty's justices for the said county of Middlesex, who were then sitting there as such justices. Mr. Bryan then asked the said justices to appoint a surveyor to value the aforesaid land of the said Adam Rivers Steele, and suggested to them in substance that Mr. Hall should be appointed, who had acted in similar cases for the said company, and the said justices then signed a nomination and appointment of that date of the said Mr. Hall as an able practical surveyor, for determining the value of the estate and interest of the said Adam Rivers Steele in the said land. No notice was given to the said Adam Rivers Steele of the said application, nor was he aware that it would be made, and he had no opportunity of showing cause against such appointment or attending before the said justices thereon.

The said Robert Prance, Esq., one of the justices who signed the nomination and appointment of the said Mr. Hall, was before and at the time he so signed the same a registered shareholder of and in the said company, and had been and was such shareholder continually for twenty-three years then last past.

On the 19th Jan. 1866, the said Adam Rivers Steele had delivered to him by a clerk of Messrs. Beale, Marigold, and Beale, the then solicitors of the said company, a bond, dated the 30th Nov. 1865, of and under the common seal of the said company, and the hands and seals of John Mercer and Josiah Lewis, two of the directors of the said company, as sureties of the said company, for payment to the said Adam Rivers Steele, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of 300*l.*, with a condition thereunder written, reciting that the said company required to purchase and take for the purposes and under the powers of the Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, a piece or parcel of land, being the aforesaid part, containing 1a. 0r. 28p., mentioned in their said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864, of the said land of the said Adam Rivers Steele, and reciting that no agreement had been come to, or award made, or verdict given, for the purchase money or compensation to be paid by the said company to the said Adam Rivers Steele for his estate or interest in the said piece or parcel of land; and that the said company were desirous and proposed, under and subject to the powers and provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to enter upon and use the same for the purposes and under the provisions of the said Act, before any such agreement or verdict should be come to, made, or given, but that the said Adam Rivers Steele did not consent to such entry, and reciting that the said Richard Hall, jun., an able practical surveyor, duly nominated and appointed by James Marshall and Robert Prance, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, in accordance with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, had determined the value of the estate and interest of the said Adam Rivers Steele of and in the said land at the sum of 300*l.*; and that the said company had, in pursuance of the provisions in that behalf contained in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, paid into the Bank of England, in the name and with the privity of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, to be placed to his account there to the credit of the said Adam Rivers Steele, as such deposit by way of security to him as required by the last mentioned Act the sum of 300*l.*, and by which said condition it is provided that if the said company should make such payments unto the said Adam Rivers Steele, or such deposit in the Bank of England, as is therein mentioned, and is required by the statute in that behalf, that then the said bond or obligation should be void, otherwise should remain in full force.

The said Adam Rivers Steele has continually since he gave the said notice of Oct. 1864, insisted that the said company were bound to take the whole of the said property comprised in the said notice of the 3rd Oct. 1864, in compliance therewith, and that part of the said land comprised in the said notice to treat of Sept. 1864, was part of his said house, and he has taken proceedings both in a Court of Chancery and in a court of law for the purpose of trying the question whether he is right in his contention or not. On the 1st Jan. 1868, the said Adam R. Steele brought an action of ejectment to recover possession of the said lands taken possession of by the said company as after mentioned.

During the time while the said proceedings in Chancery were pending, that is to say, on the 1st Feb. 1866, and whilst the said A. R. Steele was in the possession thereof, the said company took possession of the said piece of land comprised in their said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864, and also of 24 perches more of the land of the said A. R. Steele, over which powers were given to them by the aforesaid sect. 5 of the said Act of Parliament of 1863, but the said A. R. Steele was not aware, until Oct. 1867, that the said company had taken possession of such further part of his said land, the said complaint was not made in respect of the said 24 perches.

The land of the said A. R. Steele, of which the said company so as aforesaid took possession, was, at the time such possession was taken, in the possession of the said A. R. Steele, and was his property in fee simple, and was part of a meadow of his which was thereby bisected, leaving the greater part thereof on the East side of the land taken, and the farthest side from the said house of the said A. R.

Steele with and for his convenience as occupier of which he held and occupied the said meadow.

In the month or April 1868, the said A. R. Steele first ascertained that the said R. Prance was such registered shareholder in the said company as aforesaid.

On the 15th June 1868, and thence continually afterwards, the said company had express notice and knowledge that the said Robert Prance, Esq., one of the justices who signed the said nomination and appointment of the said Mr. Hall, was at the time he so signed the same as aforesaid a shareholder in the said company as aforesaid. The said R. Prance had had numerous transactions of buying and selling shares and stock in the said company, principally between the years 1848 and 1860, the said company always took receipts for dividends, and hold many receipts signed by the said R. Prance, and transfers of shares as well signed by him. Mr. James Samuel Beale, one of the firm of Messrs. Beale, Marigold, and Beale, the solicitors of the said company, did not know or had he any reason to suppose when Mr. Prance signed the said appointment that he was a shareholder in the said company, and never heard thereof till the 16th June 1868. John Moore, who is now the acting secretary of the said company, and William Edward Blaxter, a clerk in the secretary's office of the said company, were not aware either on the 6th April 1868, or before that time, or until afterwards informed of the fact by the company's solicitors, that the said Robert Prance, in his capacity of a justice of the peace, or in fact, signed any appointment of a surveyor under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to value any lands belonging to the said A. R. Steele, or any other person; besides the facts herein stated and appearing, the appellant did not give any evidence to prove, nor did the respondents give any evidence to disprove, that any director, officer, or servant of the said company, who knew that the said R. Prance was a shareholder of the said company, was aware that the said R. Prance had in his capacity of a justice of the peace, or, in in fact, signed any appointment of a surveyor under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to value any land belonging to the said A. R. Steele, or any other person, nor that the members of the said firm of Beale, Marigold, and Beale, or any other officer, agent, or servant of the said company who knew that the said R. Prance had, in his capacity of a justice of the peace, or in fact, signed such appointment, knew that the said Mr. Prance was a shareholder in the company, or was in any way interested in the matter.

The railway of the said company from London to Bedford has been made and constructed over the said land of the said A. R. Steele, comprised in the said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864, upon an embankment of 13 feet in height, and has been used by the said company for through goods traffic in and since the month of Sept. 1867, and for local public traffic in goods and coal in and since the month of March 1868. The railway was opened for passenger traffic on the 18th July 1868.

On the 20th June 1868 the said A. R. Steele, he then claiming as of right to do so, entered into and upon that part of the said railway of the said company which had so as aforesaid been made upon and over his said land, and entered into and upon his said land, upon which the said railway and the said embankment have respectively been made as aforesaid, and remained there for ten minutes picking and gathering, and there picked and gathered, certain flowering or seeding, and then took and carried the same away; the said Adam R. Steele gave no notice to the said company of his intention to enter on the said land.

On the 7th July 1868 the said Adam Rivers Steele filed a supplemental bill in Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery against the said company, praying that the said company might be restrained from opening for public traffic their railway over the land of the said A. R. Steele comprised in the said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864, and from using or interfering with the said land, and from continuing in possession thereof; and that, if necessary, it might be declared that the said appointment of a surveyor insisted upon by the said company by their answer in the original suit was void, the said R. Prance not being a justice of the peace within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

On the 9th July 1868 the said A. R. Steele moved for an injunction to restrain the said company from opening the said railway for public traffic, and from using or interfering with the said land, or from continuing in possession thereof. Giffard, V.C., before whom the said motion was made, made no order thereon, except that costs should be costs in the cause. The said A. R. Steele appealed to the Lords Justices from the decision of the said Giffard, V.C. The appeal was heard on the 30th July, and was dismissed with costs. The proceedings in this suit are still pending.

On the 7th July 1868 the said company by the said Messrs. Beale, Marigold, and Beale, their then solicitors, gave notice to the said A. R. Steele that pursuant to the 36th section of the Railway Companies Act 1867 they would, at the expiration of seven days from that date, apply to the Board of Trade to appoint a surveyor pursuant to that section; and should proceed to take all other steps required by that section and the 85th section of the Land Clauses Act; to give to the said A. R. Steele proper security for the completion of the purchase from him of the lands comprised in the said notices of the 12th Sept. 1864 and the 11th June 1866.

The Board of Trade, on the 18th July 1868, in pursuance of an application made to them by the said company after the expiration of the seven days referred to in the last-stated notice, but without the said A. R. Steele having any notice or information as to the time of making the application further or otherwise than as aforesaid, or as to who was proposed to be appointed, appointed Henry Arthur Hunt as an able practical surveyor, to determine the value of the estate and interest of the said A. R. Steele, of and in the land comprised in the said notice of the 12th Sept. 1864; and the said H. A. Hunt did determine the value thereof, including compensation for all damage, as is by the Railway Companies Act 1867 directed to be included therein, at the sum of 750*l.*, and the company paid into the Bank of England as a deposit by way of security as required by the said last-mentioned Act the sum of 750*l.*; and also on the 21st July 1868 gave to the said A. R. Steele a bond dated that day, and under the common seal of the said company, and the hands and seals of William Phillip Price and William Unwin Heygate, Esqrs., two of the directors of the said company, as sureties for the said company for payment to the said A. R. Steele, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of 750*l.*, with a condition thereunder written for making the same void if the said company should make such payment unto the said A. R. Steele or such deposit in the Bank of England as is therein mentioned and required by the statute in that behalf.

The said land of the said A. R. Steele, of which the said company as aforesaid took possession in Feb. 1866, was at the time of the said company so as aforesaid entering upon and taking possession thereof, and has ever since been and still is required to be purchased and permanently used by the said company for the purposes and under the provisions of the said Act of Parliament. The Midland Railway (Extension to London) Act 1863, and the said company did enter upon and take possession as aforesaid of the said land, and from thence until the time of making of the said complaint, with the exception only of the aforesaid entry on the said land by the said A. R. Steele, on the said 20th June 1868, have continued in possession of the said land without any such consent as is mentioned or referred in, or by sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and without having made any such payment for the benefit of any parties or party interested in the said land, or such deposit by way of security as are respectively mentioned or referred to in or by the said sect. 89, and without having bonâ fide and without collusion, paid any compensation agreed or awarded to be paid in respect of the said land to any person whom the said company reasonably believed to be entitled thereto, and without having deposited the same in the Bank of England, or otherwise for the benefit of the parties or party interested in the said land, or made such deposit by way of security in respect thereof as mentioned or referred to in the said sect. 89, although such person may not legally have been entitled thereto, save only and except that the said company on the said 21st July 1868, gave to the said A. R. Steele the bond of that date in paragraph 20 hereinbefore mentioned, and made the payment therein mentioned into the Bank of England.

It was proved by witnesses called on behalf of the said A. R. Steele that to remove the soil and clay which the said company have placed upon the said land of the said A. R. Steele, for the purpose of forming the aforesaid embankment for their said railway over that land, would cost the sum of 2790*l.* 4*s.*, and that such was the damage done to the said land by reason of such entry, and taking possession as aforesaid by the said company.

The said witnesses were not cross-examined on behalf of the said Midland Railway Company, whose counsel stated he did not wish to cross-examine them.

It was contended before us on the said hearing of the said complaint on behalf of the said A. R. Steele, that the entering upon and taking possession by the said company as mentioned in the said complaint of the said land by the said A. R. Steele, was wilful within the meaning of sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. Also that the said company, resuming or continuing in possession of the said land after the said A. R. Steele, had so as aforesaid entered thereon upon the said 20th June 1868, and after the said company had had express notice and knowledge as aforesaid that the said R. Prance, at the time he signed the aforesaid appointment and nomination of the 6th Nov. 1864 of a surveyor, was a shareholder in the said company, was a new and wilful entering upon and taking possession of the said land of the said A. R. Steele by the said company. Also, that the matter of the said complaint arose within six calendar months next before making of the said complaint.

And further, that the said company having continued in possession of the said land of the said A. R. Steele from the time when the said company so as aforesaid first entered upon and took possession thereof, until the time of the making of the said complaint, with the exception of the aforesaid entry on the said land by the said A. R. Steele on the said 20th June 1868, was one continued act and part of the matter of the said complaint, and that the time limited for making the said complaint had not previously to the making of the same commenced to run, or at all events did not so commence until the said 20th June 1868, which was within six calendar months next before the making of the said complaint. And further, that if the time limited for making the said complaint did commence to run on or before the 20th June 1868, then that a new matter of complaint by the said A. R. Steele against the said company, arose upon the said company having entered upon and taken possession of the said land after the said entry thereon of the said A. R. Steele, and within six calendar months next before the making of the said complaint.

It was contended on behalf of the said company that the said entry and taking possession of the said land by the said company was not wilful within the meaning of the said 89th section of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

We, upon hearing of the said complaint, found and decided that the entering upon and taking and retaining possession by the said company, as mentioned in the said complaint, of the land of the said A. R. Steele, although unlawful upon the ground that the said R. Prance was a shareholder in the said company as aforesaid, and therefore incompetent to join in the said appointment of the said Richard Hall the younger as aforesaid was not wilful within the meaning of the said sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, we therefore dismissed the said complaint with costs.

Whereupon the said A. R. Steele did, pursuant to the first-mentioned statute, within three days after the said determination—that is to say, on the 2nd Sept. 1868 duly apply in writing to us, the said justices, to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of our determination, for the opinion of this honourable court, and he having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute without delay such appeal, and to submit to the judgment of this honourable court, and pay such costs as may be awarded by the same, as required by the said statute in that behalf, we the said justices do hereby, in pursuance of the said statute, state and sign the case accordingly.

And it appears to us, and we humbly submit to this honourable court, that the questions of law arising upon the case are—First, whether the said company, in entering upon and taking possession in the month of Feb. 1866, as aforesaid, of the land the said A. R. Steele, or continuing or being in possession thereof as aforesaid, either until or after the said A. R. Steele had so as aforesaid entered thereon upon the said 20th June 1868 was a wilful entering upon and taking possession of the said land within the true intent and meaning of sect. 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845; and, secondly, whether the matter of the said complaint arose within six calendar months next before the making of the said complaint. If the opinion of the court be in the affirmative upon both the said questions, then such order to be made by the said court, under the Act of Parliament in that behalf, as to the said court may see fit; if otherwise, then our said determination is to stand affirmed.

Given under our hands, this April 1869.

By sect. 59 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), it is enacted that on application by the promoters of the undertaking to two justices, and upon proof that any party entitled to compensation is by reason of absence from the kingdom &c., prevented from treating, "such parties shall by writing, under their hands, nominate an able practical surveyor for determining such compensation as aforesaid, and such surveyor shall determine the same accordingly, and shall annex to his valuation a declaration in writing subscribed by him of the correctness thereof."

By sect. 85 it is enacted that if the promoters of the undertaking shall be desirous of entering upon and using any such land before an agreement shall have been come to, or an award made, or verdict given for the purchase-money or compensation to be paid by them in respect of such lands, it shall be lawful for them to deposit in the bank, by way of security, either the amount of purchase-money or compensation claimed by any party interested in or entitled to sell and convey such lands, and who shall not consent to such entry, or such a sum as shall, by a surveyor appointed by two justices in the manner hereinbefore provided in the case of parties who cannot be found, be determined to be the value of such lands, &c.

By sect. 89 it is enacted that,

If the promoters of the undertaking or any of their contractors shall, except as aforesaid, wilfully enter upon and take possession of any lands which shall be required to be purchased or permanently used for the purposes of the Special Act, without such consent as aforesaid, or without having made such payment for the benefit of the parties interested in the lands, or such deposit by way of security as aforesaid, the promoters of the undertaking shall forfeit to the party in possession of such lands the sum of 10*l.* over and above the amount of any damage done to such lands by reason of such entry and taking possession as aforesaid, such penalty and damage respectively to be recovered before two justices, &c.

Prentice, Q. C. (Hawkins, Q. C., Little, and Thesiger with him) appeared for the appellant.—The entry of the respondents on the land was unlawful inasmuch as the surveyor (Mr. Richard Hall) was not duly appointed, one of the justices, Mr. Robert Prance, being a shareholder in the Midland Railway Company. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The complaint is, continuing in possession after notice—a mistake seems to have been of not the slightest importance.] The question is, what is "wilfully entering upon lands?" It was the duty of the company to have procured a proper authority for their surveyor, and although they may not have actually known at the time that Mr. Prance could not legally act in the matter, they were bound by their wrongful act, especially after they had express notice from Mr. Steele. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Can you say that an act is done wilfully wrong if the party really believes he has authority to do it?] He must take care to satisfy himself that he is acting lawfully. Even upon an indictment for a misdemeanor it would be no excuse that he did not act wilfully if he really disobeys the law. This was held in Reg. v. Price, 11 Ad. & Ell. 727, where a party was indicted for a misdemeanor for refusing to register the birth of his child, and in which Lord Denman said, "He is therefore brought within the principle and the very words of the decisions alluded to, having wilfully (though in one sense innocently) refused to do that which he was lawfully required under the Act to do." He referred also to Lloyd, Q. C., for the company was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are against you. I am clearly of opinion that the term "wilfully," as used in the 89th section, means an absence of an honest belief on the part of the company of the existence of the conditions precedent. When they entered upon the land it must be supposed from all the circumstances that they believed they had a right to do so. They were certainly at that time in ignorance that one of the justices who signed the authority to the surveyor was a shareholder; and although they continued in possession after they became acquainted with that fact, that does not make their original entry wilful.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The justices say, "We decided that the entering upon and taking and retaining possession by the said company as mentioned in the said complaint, of the land of the said Adam Rivers Steele, although unlawful upon the ground that the said Robert Prance was a shareholder in the said company as aforesaid, and therefore incompetent to join in the said appointment of the said Richard Hall the younger as aforesaid, was not wilful within the meaning of the said section 89 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845;" and I am of opinion that in coming to that decision they were perfectly right.

MELLOR, J.—The word "wilful" may have a different meaning according to circumstances, as where, without consent or paying money or any supposed authority, a party takes possession. But in the sense in which the word is used in this section, the conduct of the company was not wilful.

GIDEON SMITH (app.) v. EDWARD MACKIE (resp.).

Highway—Scrapings of a road deposited on the sides—Removal of same—Sect. 118 of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126 (the General Turnpike Act).

Upon an information against the appellant for breaking up the soil of certain land or ground within 25 feet from the middle or centre of a turnpike road under sect. 118 of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126 (the General Turnpike Act), it appeared in evidence that the soil in question consisted of a bank covered with turf, of from one foot to eighteen inches higher than the adjoining water table of the road, and that the appellant had caused a portion of such bank to be broken up, and the turf and soil removed. It was contended that the bank was formed by road sand scraped from the road, and spread from time to time on the land by the roadside, and that what had been broken up and taken away did not come within the 118*th section. It was further given in evidence that the bank appeared to have been so formed, but that for a great many years it had been covered with turf. Upon this the justices convicted the appellant:*

Held, that they were right in so doing.

This was an appeal against the decision of the justices of the peace for the county of Surrey upon an information preferred by the respondent—the surveyor of roads for the Croydon highway district—against the appellant, under sect. 118 of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 126 (the General Turnpike Act), for having at Coulsdon in the month of Oct. 1868 broken up the soil of certain land or ground within 25 feet from the middle or centre of the turnpike road leading from Croydon to Reigate. The information was heard before the justices at a petty sessions held at Croydon on the 19th Dec. 1868, and, by adjournment, on the 2nd Jan. 1869, and the justices convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to pay 1*s.* for a fine, and 14*s.* 6*d.* costs. The appellant being dissatisfied with the decision as being erroneous in point of law, gave notice of application for a case under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and he duly entered into a recognisance as required by the Act of Parliament, and the justices accordingly stated and signed the following case:

On the east side of the turnpike road, leading from Croydon to Reigate, there is in the parish of Coulsdon, in the county of Surrey, a stripe of waste land or ground lying between the road and certain cultivated land; part of it was, till broken up by the appellant, covered with turf, and was from a foot to eighteen inches higher than the road, and part of this strip had been formerly excavated as a gravel pit, leaving between the pit and the road a bank covered with turf, and from one foot to eighteen inches higher than the adjoining water table of the said road. It was proved that the defendant had caused a portion of this bank to be broken up and the turf and soil removed, and that the place at which such breaking up took place was within the distance of twenty-five feet from the middle or centre of the said road. But it was contended on his part that the strip of land in question was a bank formed of road sand scraped from the road and spread from time to time on the land by the road-side, and that what had been broken up and taken away did not come within the meaning of the 118th section of the General Turnpike Act, which it was urged had reference only to the natural or original surface of the soil.

The respondent (the surveyor of the road) and a labourer employed on the road, who were witnesses for the prosecution, deposed that the bank appeared to them to have been so formed from the scrapings of the road. It appeared in evidence that the portion of the bank which remained was, after the appellant's removal of the soil in question, reduced to about two feet in breadth, the gravel pit lying open immediately beyond it. That as long as the witnesses could rembember (and one of them remembered the bank for fifty years), the bank in question, both the part taken away and the part left, had been covered with turf, like the part still left. No further evidence was given as to the formation or condition of the bank than as above appears. We were of opinion and found that there was not sufficient evidence to prove that the bank so broken up as above mentioned had been formed by the accumulation of road sand, as alleged for the defence; and that if it had been so formed, the sand so accumulated had become so incorporated with the original surface of the soil, and that the said bank was at the time of committing the alleged offence, soil of land or ground within the distance of 25 feet from the centre or middle of the turnpike road, within the meaning of the section in question, and we accordingly convicted the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the conviction be erroneous in point of law? If so, the conviction to be quashed; if not, to stand.

Given under our hands this 13th March 1869.

T. H. R. EDRIDGE,
JOHN EASTTY,
Justices of the Peace for the County of Surrey.

By sect 118 of the 8 Geo. 4, c. 126 (The General Turnpike Act) it is enacted:

If any person . . . shall make any drain, gutter, sink, or watercourse across or otherwise break up or injure the surface of any turnpike road, or of any part thereof, or shall plough, harrow, or break up the soil of any land or ground, or, in ploughing or harrowing the adjacent lands shall turn his or their plough or harrow in or upon any land or ground within the distance aforesaid from the middle or centre of any turnpike road made or to be made . . . every person so offending shall forfeit for every such offence 40s.

Philbrick appeared for the appellant.—Mr. Smith, the appellant, merely took away the road sand which had been scraped from the road, and no part of the original soil. It is contended that he has not broken up or injured the surface of the road. The provision of the 118th section was intended to prevent the breaking up of the original soil, and not a mere deposit. [BLACKBURN, J.—What difference is there? In fact there is nowadays very little of the natural soil upon the surface of the land. COCKBURN, C. J.—You say that if the soil is artificial it may be removed.] The section does not intend to prevent the owner of the soil from taking away any artificial deposit. It does not say "break up the land," but "the soil of the land." It was in evidence that the bank was formed of the sand from the road. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But it was covered with turf. BLACKBURN, J.—And for fifty years and upwards. Were not the justices justified, even if it had been originally soil from the road, in finding that it had become incorporated with the land? COCKBURN, C. J.—If it were not originally a part of the soil, it certainly had become such.]

Cave, for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are all of opinion that the objection cannot be supported.

Judgment for the respondent.

The declaration was for assault and false imprisonment.

The defendants pleaded a justification under a writ of exigi facias directed to them as sheriffs of the county of Middlesex.

The plaintiff new assigned that before the defendants took the plaintiff into custody as in the said second plea alleged, the plaintiff had made and executed such deed and documents, and had taken such steps and proceedings, that under and by virtue and in pursuance thereof and of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, one J. F. M., then being the chief registrar of Her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy, did duly certify that on the 12th Oct. 1865, a certain deed (here describing the deed as a deed of composition under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861), was, on the 12th Oct. 1865, brought into the office of the said chief registrar, and was duly filed and registered, &c. Averment that the said certificate was given as well under the hand of the said chief registrar as under the seal of the said Court of Bankruptcy, and was afterwards duly issued and delivered by the said chief registrar to the plaintiff, of all which the defendants had due notice. That plaintiff brings this action, not for the trespasses in the said second plea admitted and attempted to be justified, but for that the defendants committed the trespass in the declaration alleged after the said alleged taking and keeping the plaintiff in custody as in the second plea is admitted, and after the plaintiff had duly produced and shown such certificate to the defendants, and after all conditions had been performed, and all things had happened and been done, and all reasonable and other times had elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff as well to have the full benefit and protection of the said certificate, and to be discharged from the said alleged taking and keeping in custody in the said second plea mentioned, as also to maintain this action for the trespasses in the declaration alleged.

To the new assignment the defendants pleaded, secondly, that the plaintiff did not make or enter into any deed or instrument within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 as alleged, nor were any or either of the conditions necessary in that behalf observed or fulfilled, and by reason thereof the said certificate of the chief registrar was invalid and of no force. The defendants also demurred to the new assignment, on the ground that it did not allege facts which entitled the plaintiff to his release by the defendants from their custody as such sheriff, &c.

The plaintiff demurred to the defendants' third plea, on the grounds that, first, it did not allege any facts which justified the defendants in committing the trespasses in the declaration and new assignment alleged; secondly, that the alleged certificate of the chief registrar being existent and in force at the time of the alleged trespasses by the defendants was a statutory protection to the plaintiff against such trespasses until set aside by due course of law; thirdly, that the said plea ought to have alleged which of the said conditions had not been fulfilled; and, fourthly, that the said plea tendered an issue of law to be tried by a jury.

Robinson, Serjt. (Tapping with him) for the plaintiff. The question raised on these pleadings is whether the sheriff is justified in detaining in custody a man who produces the certificate of the chief registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, of his having filed in that court a composition-deed under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. If he is not justified in so detaining him, then this action lies against the sheriff for the detention. That he is not so justified has been abundantly decided by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber) in the case of Lloyd v. Harrison, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 271; and 34 L. J. 97, Q. B., Ex. Ch.: 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 799; 35 L. J. 153, Q. B., and the decision of this court in Ames v. Colnaghi, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 327; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 359; 37 L. J. 159, C. P. In giving the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in Lloyd v. Harrison, Erle, C. J., said: "We are of opinion that the certificate of such a deed is that which is to operate as a valid certificate. We are of opinion that the sheriff is not bound to go and ascertain whether a valid deed exists, and then to act. It is a matter beyond his powers to ascertain that; and we think that the words of the statute are that the certificate of such a deed shall be the matter which the sheriff has to look to. The certificate would be without any operation at all if it did not have the effect that is contended for. The sheriff is to see whether there is a certificate of such a deed. The certificate states the validity of the deed. The deed itself may be an invalid deed; but it is the certificate which was produced. As a protection in bankruptcy we are clearly of opinion that it did not give the debtor mere privilege, but gave him a right to be discharged." And M. Smith, J., at the conclusion of his judgment in Ames v. Colnaghi (ubi sup.), says, "If he (the plaintiff) has a right, the court must give him the corresponding remedy. . . . Our judgment must be for the plaintiff, as the legitimate result of the decision in Lloyd v. Harrison (ubi sup.), viz., that if the sheriff may discharge, he must." For the purposes of the plaintiff's case, it makes no difference whether the composition-deed was good or bad.—[BOVILL, C. J.—We must take it on these pleadings that the deed was bad; in fact, that there was no such deed. What is the value of the certificate if there is no deed? WILLES, J.—The plaintiff himself has created the whole difficulty by making a bad deed, and by misstating facts in his affidavit.] In Tarlton v. Fisher, 2 Doug. 671, the sheriff was held not liable to an action of this kind for imprisoning a man who had taken advantage of 20 Geo. 2, c. 64, s. 2. But the words in that case are not so strong as those of the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. In this case the sheriff has no discretion, but he is absolutely bound to discharge within a reasonable time after notice of the registrar's certificate. This case may also be distinguished from Mangay v. Bart, 5 Q. B. 381, in which the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, held the sheriff not liable to an action of trespass for arresting a man who was summoned to attend the court of review as a witness. The ground on which that judgment proceeded was that "the privilege (p. 393) the breach of which is the subject of complaint, is not to be considered . . . to be the privilege of the person attending the court, but of the court which he attends, and therefore the allowing or not allowing the privilege is discretionary." [BOVILL, C. J.—By the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 the certificate of the registrar gives the same protection as an order of protection in bankruptcy. Is there any clause as to the production of the certificate, or as to the discharge on production of the certificate?] Only the 198th section. A man who has such certificate is entitled, on giving the sheriff notice of it, to be discharged without going to the Court of Bankruptcy or any other court. [BRETT, J.—It was not necessary to raise the present question in Ames v. Colnaghi (ubi sup.). You now say that if a man gets a certificate by fraud, the sheriff, though having notice of the fraud, is bound to discharge him, under pain of an action at the suit of the author of the fraud.] Yes. Lees v. Newton, 35 L. J. 285, C. P. is in favour of the plaintiff. In Moone v. Rose, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 606; 38 L. J. 240, Q. B.; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 486, there was a breach of a statutory duty, and the gaoler was held liable. [WILLES, J. read the 112th and 113th sections of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849. The right to a discharge does not consist in the production of the certificate, but in the language that "no judgment shall be available, &c." It makes no difference, so far as an action of trespass is concerned, whether the sheriff has or has not notice of the certificate. KEATING, J.—You say that an officer is justified, after being told by his prisoner that he has the registrar's certificate, in detaining him until he has a copy of it—is he then, in the mean time, a trespasser?] Possibly not. [KEATING, J.—Does not the 113th section of the Act of 1849 seem to provide a special remedy? BOVILL, C. J.—The certificate of the registrar has, by the statute, the same effect as an order of protection in bankruptcy. Now there must have been hundreds of cases in which debtors, who have obtained such an order of protection, have been arrested by the sheriff. Can you produce any single instance, in which the person so arrested has brought trespass against the sheriff?] No. [BOVILL, C. J.—This seems, then, to be a case of the first impression. It seems to me monstrous that a sheriff should be made a trespasser, if he does not instantly discharge a prisoner who produces a registrar's certificate, even without having time to verify it. The certificate may, for aught he knows, be fraudulent.]

BOVILL, C. J.—It is argued in support of this demurrer, that this court has in the case of Ames v. Colnaghi (ubi sup), decided that the sheriff is bound of his own authority to discharge a man whom he has taken under a capias, on his producing a certificate under the hand of the chief registrar, and the seal of the court, of the filing and registration of a composition-deed, and that the defendant in this case having refused to discharge the plaintiff from his custody on his producing such certificate, an action of trespass will lie against him. But I am of opinion that this first proposition is grounded on a misconception of the decision in Ames v. Colnaghi. The present question was not then before the court, but only the general question whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to his discharge, and the court decided that question in the affirmative. The mode of his discharge was not in question. In the present case, however, the question as to the mode of discharge is expressly raised, and it is contended that the sheriff is bound to discharge on the production of the certificate. It is not even said that any time is to be allowed for the verification of the certificate, or that any judge's order is required; but it is contended that the bare production of the certificate is sufficient. The solution of this question depends on the construction we put upon the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. 134). The section says that "after notice . . . no execution . . . shall be available . . . without leave of the court." We see then that the writ remains in force after the granting of the certificate, but its action is suspended until the leave of the court is given to make it available. The court may grant or refuse leave. The section goes on to say that "a certificate under the hand of the chief registrar and the seal of the court shall be available to the debtor for all purposes as a protection in bankruptcy." The debtor would have the certificate in his possession, and he may make it available to get his discharge just as he could a protection in bankruptcy. In what way is that? When was a sheriff ever made responsible for executing process against a man who has obtained a protection in bankruptcy? No such action has ever been maintained. I could not put it more strongly than it was put in the year 1781 by Buller, J., who, in giving judgment in the case of Tarlton v. Fisher (ubi sup.), says, "In the case of bankrupts or insolvents what is done? Hundreds have been arrested, but there never was an instance of an action against the sheriff or his officers in such cases. The practice in the case of bankrupts is to apply to a judge, and verify the certificate by affidavit: (vide 5 Geo. 2, c. 30, s. 13.) How could the sheriff ascertain that the certificate was signed by the commissioners? He cannot administer an oath." In reality the whole of the Bankruptcy Acts show that no such action will lie, especially as provision is expressly made for a remedy in case a bankrupt be arrested while protected by order of the court: (see sect. 113 of Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106). But the remedy there given is not against the sheriff, but against the officer, and it does not give the bankrupt a claim to general damages, but simply 5*l.* a day. The Legislature has thus made provision for the protection of bankrupts, and has also provided a remedy in case that protection is not observed. The case of Tarlton v. Fisher (ubi sup.) turned on the construction of the following words in the statute 20 Geo. 3, c. 64, s. 2. "And shall not be liable to be arrested by virtue of any civil process out of any court; and in case they have been or shall be so arrested, shall be discharged therefrom." There it was held that a sheriff was not liable in trespass for executing process on the person of a man who had taken advantage of the above statute; but that the man in question, if arrested, must make application to the court for his discharge. In Watson on the Office of Sheriff (2nd edit. pp. 141), it is laid down:—"The sheriff, notwithstanding the defendant claims privilege from arrest by his bankruptcy and certificate, or under a discharge as an insolvent debtor, shall not discharge him without an indemnity, or by order of the court, for otherwise he might be driven to litigate with the plaintiff the question of the defendant's privilege; for the court will not stay proceedings in the event of an action brought against a sheriff for discharging a certificated bankrupt arrested by him, without an order of a judge." We see then that by the 198th section the same force is given to the registrar's certificate as to an order for protection in bankruptcy. In what way then is it to operate? To entitle the holder to get discharged from custody, but not to give him a right of action against the sheriff for the imprisonment. Therefore, in this view of the case, the new assignment is bad, or if it be good, the plea affords a good answer to it.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If it were necessary to deal with the plea I should be prepared to hold that it sufficiently alleges that the plaintiff obtained a registrar's certificate that he was not entitled to. But I do not think that the new assignment discloses any cause of action. What appears from it is that the person of a judgment-debtor was detained by the sheriff after he had taken proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and had procured the proper certificate of the chief registrar as to the due registration of a composition deed under that Act. I pass over the question whether the new assignment sufficiently alleges that the sheriff had notice of this certificate. I do not think that it does. Still for the purposes of this case I am willing to assume that it does, and that the composition-deed to which the plaintiff's certificate related was a good deed. What then does the plaintiff in his new assignment say? He says that he made a composition-deed under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, that he duly obtained the certificate of the registrar of the registration of the deed, and that the sheriff, with full notice of the premises (not such notice as is spoken of in the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, for that refers to notice in the Gazette) continued to hold the plaintiff in his custody under an exigi facias. For this detention the plaintiff brings an action against the sheriff. Can he bring trespass under such circumstances? This question turns on the construction we put upon the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1861. [The learned judge read the section.] The notice referred to in the section I take to mean notice in the Gazette. Our decision would affect an execution levied on the goods as well as one on the body. It thus becomes material to see whether the plaintiff's counsel is right in saying that the construction which he puts on the Act entails no hardship on the sheriff, on the ground that no cause of action exists until after notice of the certificate. But sect. 198 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and sects. 112 and 113 of the Act of 1849 show that this ground is not maintainable. They show that after notice no process shall be available either against the goods or the person of the judgment-debtor. The case of goods in bankruptcy is provided for by vesting them in assignees. There are various clauses which give a certain protection to executions levied before bankruptcy. Where those clauses do not apply, the sheriff is made responsible to the assignees, but not until after a reasonable time, and always with protection to the sheriff, if an adverse claim is set up. The Act of 1849 goes on in the 113th section to speak of the arrest of the body. [The learned judge read the section.] The provision at the end of the section shows how the certificate is to be made available. We must put a construction on the 198th section of the Act of 1861, so as to give it the same application in the case of goods as in the case of the body of the bankrupt. It was never held that the sheriff was bound to read the Gazette. All that the Act of 1861 says is, that, after notice, process shall not be available, &c. In the case of Smith v. Egginton, 7 A. & E. 167; 6 L. J., N. S., 206, Q. B., the Court of Queen's Bench held that the sheriff was not liable to an action of trespass, for the reasons I have mentioned. The question of notice would not affect the question of trespass. Then, again, the case is further illustrated by Moone v. Rose (ubi sup.), where an officer was held liable for detaining a prisoner after that he ought to have brought him up in the Court of Chancery on a habeas corpus, the Act in that case saying that if "the defendant shall not be brought . . . within the time aforesaid, the sheriff, gaoler, &c., in whose custody he shall be, shall thereupon discharge him out of custody," &c., which made it incumbent on the officer to discharge him. So, again, in Tarlton v. Fisher (ubi sup.), an action of trespass was brought against the sheriff under an Act which said that in such case the prisoner "shall not be liable," &c. But the construction put upon those words was that they conferred no right of action on the prisoner, but simply that they entitled him to be discharged. I do not, however, think it necessary to lay great stress on the cases. I think that great confusion has been caused on account of the doctrine laid down in Tarlton v. Fisher, 2 Doug. 671, not being consistently adhered to. There is no one authority for the maintenance of an action under such circumstances as these. With reference to the case of Mangay v. Burt, 5 Q. B. 381, it may seem extraordinary that a man should be entitled to a privilege, and yet that, if he be arrested, he shall have no action for the arrest. But this apparent anomaly disappears when we come to consider the history of our law, and the old doctrines as to suing out a writ of privilege. That was the old form of remedy available to a person who, being privileged from arrest, was nevertheless arrested. This case stands on the same footing, and I think it quite right that it should, for otherwise there would be no end to the actions against the officers who execute the process of the courts. For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the new assignment is bad. The counsel for the plaintiff is only prepared to support it on the authority of Lloyd v. Harrison and Ames v. Colnaghi (ubi sup.), and he has inferred, because the Court of Exchequer Chamber has decided that the sheriff is justified, as against the judgment-creditor, in discharging a prisoner who produces the registrar's certificate, and this court also has said that he is entitled to discharge the prisoner in such a case, that therefore the sheriff is liable in an action of trespass at the suit of the judgment-debtor, if he does not discharge him. But I think that he has misconceived the effect of our judgment in Ames v. Colnaghi. In that case the court only decided that the prisoner was entitled to his discharge. The court therefore said that the sheriff must discharge him, and it is contended that if he does not do so he becomes a trespasser. But what the judges meant was, that the sheriff must discharge him because the court would order it. As the plaintiff can produce no other authority, and this one fails him, I am of opinion that the new assignment fails, and that our judgment must be for the defendants.

BRETT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Even assuming the facts in the new assignment to be true, I cannot see that they disclose a good ground of action. I am led to this conclusion by the reasons given by my brother Willes. It seems to me that his judgment is strongly supported by that of Blackburn, J., in the case of Rossi v. Bailey, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 621. The counsel for the plaintiff is unable to support his argument on the authority of the old cases, but he contends that the maintenance of this action is the logical consequence of our decision in Ames v. Colnaghi (ubi sup.). I, however, think that that case only decides that the effect of the registrar's certificate is to entitle the debtor to his discharge.

BOVILL, C. J.—If any further authority were needed to show that this action cannot be maintained, I should cite the case of Philipps v. Naylor, 3 H. & N. 14. In that case the debtor had an order of protection in bankruptcy and the sheriff had notice of it, yet it was held that an action of trespass could not be maintained.

REG. v. DAVID JONES.

Bigamy—Knowledge of the first wife being alive—Direction to the jury.

In 1863 the prisoner married Mary Anne Richards, lived with her about a week, and then left her. It was not proved that he had since seen her. In 1867 he married Elizabeth Evans, his first wife being then alive. On the trial of an indictment for bigamy, the learned judge told the jury that they must be satisfied that the prisoner knew that his first wife was alive at the time of the second marriage:

Held, that the direction of the judge to the jury was right, and that it was not necessary to prove affirmatively that at the time of the second marriage the prisoner knew that his first wife was alive.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Channell, B.:—

The prisoner David Jones was tried before me at the last assizes for Carmarthenshire.

The indictment charged the prisoner with marrying Mary Anne Richards, and afterwards, and during her life, feloniously marrying one Elizabeth Evans.

The prisoner was convicted, and the conviction is to be taken as correct, subject only to the question hereinafter stated.

The prisoner on the 29th June 1863 married Mary Anne Richards. On the 29th Nov. 1867 he married the said Elizabeth Evans.

Mary Anne Richards was proved to be alive at the time of the trial.

It was proved on cross-examination that the prisoner lived with her for about a week, and then left her. It was not proved that he had since seen her.

For the prisoner it was contended that affirmative proof must be given that at the time of his marriage with Elizabeth Evans, the prisoner actually knew that Mary Anne, his first wife, was alive. The case of Reg. v. Lumley, 38 L. J. 86, M. C., 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 454, was relied on.

I overruled the objection, holding that positive proof on that point was not absolutely necessary.

I left the case to the jury, telling them they must be satisfied that the prisoner knew his first wife was alive at the time of the second marriage.

The question is whether I was at liberty to do so, or whether, upon the authority of the case referred to, I was bound to direct an acquittal. If I ought not to have left the case to the jury, the conviction is to be reversed.

The prisoner is not in custody, but is to be called up for sentence if the conviction is held good.

W. F. Channell.

No counsel appeared on either side to argue the case.

Kelly, C. B.—We need not say more than that the case was properly left to the jury, and that the conviction must be affirmed.

Reg. v. George Thompson.

Housebreaking implements—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 58—Possession.

Where several persons are found out together by night for common purpose of housebreaking, and one only is in possession of the housebreaking implements, all may be found guilty of the misdemeanor of being found by night in possession of implements of housebreaking without lawful excuse (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 58), for the possession of one is in such case the possession of all.

Case reserved for the decision of the court for consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace in and for the county of Surrey, on Thursday, the 29th July 1869, George Thompson and William Jones were charged upon the following indictment:

Surrey. The jurors for our lady the Queen upon their oaths present, that George Thompson and William Jones at about the hour of two of the clock, ante meridiem, of the 22nd July 1869, at the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in the said county of Surrey, were found, they the said George Thompson and William Jones then and there by night, as aforesaid, unlawfully having in their possession without lawful excuse certain implements of housebreaking, that is to say, one crow, one knife, one candle, and twenty lucifer matches, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that before the time of committing the misdemeanor hereinbefore mentioned, the said George Thompson and William Jones were severally convicted of felony, that is to say, the said George Thompson, by the name of John Patterson, at the general session of the peace held at the sessions house on Clerkenwell-green, in and for the county of Middlesex, on Monday, the 4th March 1861, and the said William Jones, by the name of Samuel Lambert, at the adjourned general session of the peace, held at the sessions house, on Clerkenwell-green, in and for the county of Middlesex, on Monday, the 29th May, 1867.

William Jones pleaded guilty; and it was proved that George Thompson was found along with Jones, Jones having on his person the crow and the knife, and George Thompson having on his person the candle and lucifer matches.

It was contended that a candle and lucifer matches were not housebreaking implements within the meaning of the statute, and that Thompson could not be said to be in possession of the crow and the knife found on Jones.

Thereupon the court directed the jury, that if they were of opinion that Thompson was in the company of Jones, with the same object as Jones, and for the purpose of housebreaking, they should find him guilty on the indictment, and that they might take into their consideration the fact of the candle and lucifer matches being found on him as showing the purpose to which the crow and the knife were intended to be applied, but that the candle and lucifer matches alone could not be held to be housebreaking implements within the meaning of the statute.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the court reserved the question for the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, whether the possession of housebreaking implements by one of two persons for a common object is the possession of each.

Judgment on Thompson was respited, and he was committed to the county gaol at Newington until the decision of the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved should be known.

Thos. Tilson, Chairman.

Straight for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. There was no evidence of Thompson's being in possession of housebreaking implements. The indictment is founded on the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 58, "whoever shall be found by night armed with any dangerous or offensive weapon or instrument whatever with intent to break or enter into any dwelling-house or other building whatsoever, and to commit any felony therein, or shall be found by night having in his possession, without lawful excuse (the proof of which excuse shall lie on such person), any picklock key, crow, jack, bit, or other implement of housebreaking, or shall be found by night having his face blackened or otherwise disguised with intent to commit any felony, or shall be found by night in any dwelling-house or other building whatsoever, with intent to commit any felony therein, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The enactment makes the offence an individual and personal one. It cannot be that it intended to cast on another person the obligation of making an excuse for another person who is in possession of housebreaking implements. [Lush, J.—Suppose each of them had hold of a crowbar by the ends, so that neither had exclusive possession, would not the statute apply? Or if a burglar were to hire a little boy to carry his implements, could he not be convicted under it? Blackburn, J.—Or if the implements were in a pannier on an ass's back, could the donkey be said to be in possession of them?] In the statutes relating to coining (24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 1) and forgery (24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 45), criminal possession is defined.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Kelly, C. B.—The possession of one is the possession of all. Under the Game Laws it has been held that where several persons go out poaching in the night time, and one is armed with a gun, all are armed: (See Reg v. Goodfellow and others, 1 Den. C. C. 81.)

County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, ss. 3, 9)—Cause of damage—Costs.

Where a cause of damage was instituted in the Superior Court, the damage done being over 300l., but the owner's liability was subsequently limited below that amount:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to costs in the Superior Court.

This was a cause of damage instituted by the owners of a vessel called the Red Jacket against the owners of a vessel called the Young James. The action was entered on the 4th June, in the sum of 1000*l.*; the damage done to the Young James amounted to 800*l.*, the additional 200*l.* was to cover the costs. On the 27th July the vessel was released, and bail was accepted to the amount of 500*l.* On the 3rd Aug. the plaintiff filed preliminary act. On the 14th Sept. a tender of 258*l.* 2*s.* was filed. On the 29th Oct. that tender was accepted, the question of costs being reserved.

Clarkson, for plaintiffs, moved that the costs be allowed.

E. G. Gibson for defendants.—The plaintiff is deprived of his costs unless judge certifies by County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, s. 9. He claims more than 300*l.*, and sect. 3 limits jurisdiction of County Courts to 300*l.* But whether the action might have been brought in the County Court is to be determined by the sum recovered; it is a legal or just claim which is to be considered, otherwise plaintiff has only to exaggerate his claim to entitle him to bring his action in Superior Courts: Emery v. Binns, 7 Moo. P. C. 195; per judges in Woodham v. Newman, 7 C. B. 654, which was on a similar section in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 129. It was true the plaintiff there was entitled to costs, although he recovered less than 20*l.*, but it was because he proved more than 20*l.* was due to him, and the amount was reduced by a set-off. Here the defendant's legal liability from the moment of collision was fixed at an amount over which the County Court has jurisdiction. He never was liable for more. It is only the practice of the Court of Admiralty which compels the plaintiff to prove the defendant is not entitled to recover more; it is not the proof which reduces the defendant's claim. The court has no power to certify as it has not heard or tried the cause. There are no circumstances to entitle plaintiff to certificate for costs.

Clarkson in reply.—Neither the principle nor the words of the statute are opposed to the claim of my client. In this case the proceedings could not have been taken in the County Court, because the damage done the Red Jacket amounted to 800*l.*, and therefore was beyond the County Court jurisdiction. At common law defendant was liable for the whole of this amount; and it was subsequent to the institution of the suit that the limitation of liability had been claimed, which limitation could not have been in this case claimed in the County Court.

Nov. 9.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE (having gone through the facts).—On behalf of the Red Jacket it has been contended that this suit ought to have been instituted in the County Court, inasmuch as it now appears that the amount claimed was less than 300*l.*, and that having regard to the 3rd and 9th sections of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 (the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act), costs ought not to be allowed in this case. By the 3rd section of this Act the County Court has jurisdiction where the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*; and by the 9th section, "If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England proceedings which he might without agreement have taken in a County Court" (except in certain cases not necessary to be here mentioned), "and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that Admiralty cause is limited by this Act . . . he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty . . . shall certify that it was a proper Admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty o England." These proceedings might, it is argued, "have been taken in a County Court," and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to costs, and is liable to be condemned in costs; and it is further contended that it is not competent to the court to certify for costs in this case, inasmuch as the cause has not been "tried or heard." Upon the first point I was referred to analogous enactment as to costs contained in the 129th section of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, which relates to actions for small debts brought in the Superior Courts; and there the words are "for which a plaint might have been entered," &c.; and for the construction of these words I was referred to two cases (Woodhams v. Newman, 7 C. B. 654, and Emery v. Binns, 7 Moo. P. C. 195) on the interpretation of a similar clause in a Jamaica Act. I entirely assent to the principle of both these decisions, which is in effect that the words "for which a plaint might have been entered" must refer to an amount justly or properly claimed, and that it is not competent to the plaintiff to release himself from the restraint of the Act by entering an exorbitant claim, and so ousting the jurisdiction of the County Court, and then, after the claim has been so ousted, reducing the amount to a sum which if it had been originally claimed, would have brought it within the jurisdiction of the County Court. But it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff by Mr. Clarkson, in a clear and able argument, that neither the words of the statute nor the principle of these cases was hostile to the claim of his client; not the words of the statute, because in this case the proceedings might not have been taken in a County Court, for these reasons. The damage done to the Red Jacket did amount to 800*l.*, and by the common law, the Young James was liable for that sum; the amount of claim therefore exceeded the jurisdiction of the County Court. After the suit was instituted in this court, however, the defendant availed himself of the provision contained in the 54th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 (The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act), and limited his liability to 8*l.* per ton; in order to do which it was necessary, according to the practice of this court, that he should make an affidavit that the damage had occurred without the actual fault or privity of the owner, so as to bring him within the protection of the Act; and it was not till after this limitation of liability had been claimed, which limitation could not in this case have been claimed in the County Court, that the claim was reduced below the amount of 300*l.*; and in fact it is analogous to the case of a demand reduced by a set-off, to which the judges in Woodhams v. Newman held the statute did not apply. In Emery v. Binns, no question of set-off or of limitation of liability subsequent to the institution of the said suit arose. I am of opinion that this cause was properly instituted in this court; it becomes, therefore, unnecessary to consider that part of the argument which relates to my inability to certify for costs, inasmuch as the case has not been "heard or tried" before me. I pronounce for the prayer of the plaintiff in this case, including thereby the condemnation of the defendant in costs.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 16.]

(Before Lord Penzance.)

In the Goods of J. S. Gill.

Will—Memorandum—Incorporation.

A testator left a will revoking all former wills, by which he directed certain articles to be distributed by the executors according to written instructions affixed to his will. No such instructions were found affixed to the will, but a paper was found duly executed according to the Wills Act, which had been referred to in a former will, and which contained instructions to his executor.

The court refused to incorporate it with the existing will, on the ground that it did not correspond to the description therein, and also refused to admit it to probate independently as it had been revoked by the last will.

James Sebastian Gill died at Reading in the county of Berks, leaving a will and codicil duly executed, dated Nov. 2, 1868. The will revoked all former wills, and contained the following clause:

All my books, pictures, sketches, guns, rods, goods, and chattels in and about the rooms I shall occupy at the time of my decease, I wish my executors to dispose of faithfully and conscientiously according to the written directions left by me and affixed to this my will, trusting as I unhesitatingly do in their honour and integrity.

The testator had executed a previous will in Aug. 1866, which contained a similar clause. The existing will was prepared by Mr. Weedon, the testator's solicitor, and remained in his custody until the testator's death. No written directions were affixed to the will, nor could Mr. Weedon remember whether the testator had referred to any such document at the time of executing the will, but on search being made in his depositories, the following paper of written directions was found:

To my executors, the Rev. F. T. Gill and R. Haynes Lovell.—I have written the following directions for your guidance with respect to many things and goods not mentioned in my will, which said will very probably will be found at Wm. Weedon, Esq., Solicitor, Reading. In you, as my executors, I have the greatest faith as regards your honour and integrity, and I feel confident that all my wishes will be carried out faithfully, and that this will form a part of the above-mentioned will.

The paper went on to provide for the distribution of various articles, books, pictures, sketches, folio stand, folio book of engravings, fishing tackle and rods, harmonium, gun, sword, bedstead, washing stand, wearing apparel. And it concluded by forbidding his executors to spend more than 40*l.* on his funeral. The paper was dated Aug. 1866, and was executed according to the provisions of the Wills Act.

C. A. Middleton moved for probate of the will and codicil of Nov. 1868, with the paper of instructions as incorporated by reference. He submitted also that it was entitled to probate as a duly executed testamentary paper. He cited

In the Goods of Mary Sunderland, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 129;

In the Goods of Stewart, 3 S. & T. 122.

Lord Penzance.—I am of opinion that this paper cannot be incorporated with the will. What the testator did was this: In August 1866 he made a will, according to the statement of the attorney, something similar to that now in existance. At the date of the execution he wrote a paper beginning thus: "I have written the following directions for your guidance (that is, his executors,) with respect to many things not contained in the will;" and he went on to provide for the distribution of a great number of articles belonging to him. That was intended to form part of the will of August 1866, and was duly executed as a testamentary document. In 1868 he made a new will, in which he revoked all former wills, and in that will there is a clause which directs "all my books, guns, rods, pictures, and other chattels which may be in and about the rooms I shall occupy," to be disposed of by the executors, "according to written directions left by me and affixed to this my will." Well, the will is found, but nothing is affixed to it, and nothing is discovered corresponding to the directions he has described. The court is then asked to go back to the directions affixed to the former will. I see great difficulty in doing that; in fact, it is impossible. It is extremely probable that the testator made a fresh list, or more than one, and that he afterwards tore them up, as often happens. If, indeed, the existing list had answered the terms of the list described in the will, there might have been something to say; but it does not, for it disposes of many articles which cannot be said to answer the description of articles "in and about my room." I am of opinion, therefore, that the directions cannot form part of the will of 1868. Then, it is said that the directions being well executed, are not revoked, and therefore may be admitted to probate. But it is quite clear that there being language in the will of 1868 revoking all other former wills, if there is not a special reference excepting the directions, they must be revoked too. The motion, therefore must be refused.

Attorney, Pitman.

In the Goods of W. J. Law (deceased),

Codicil wrongly described as codicil to a revoked will—Probate.

A testator died leaving a will revoking all former wills. He subsequently executed a codicil, which by mistake he described as a codicil to a previous will:

The Court, on the authority of In the Goods of Steele, admitted the codicil to probate.

W. J. Law died Oct. 1869, leaving a will and codicil duly executed. In July 1860 he made a will disposing of all his property, a considerable portion of which was in the West Indies, and providing equally for all his children. On Jan. 24, 1866 he made another will, in which he revoked all previous wills, and this he deposited with his banker. Shortly before his death he made a codicil commencing in these words: "I, William J. Law, declare this to be a codicil to my last will and testament, bearing date July 21, 1860." Between the wills of 1860 and 1866 the West India property dealt with in the first will had all been disposed of, and a son of the testator had died. The codicil referred to this latter fact, and provided for his widow and children by placing them in the same position as if their father had survived. There were no words in the codicil to show an intention of revoking the will of 1866, or to revive the will of 1860.

Dr. Middleton now moved for probate of the will of 1866 and the codicil, as together constituting the will of the deceased, on the authority of

In the Goods of Steele, L. Rep. 1 P. & M. 575.

Lord Penzance.—The facts fall within that case and you may take probate as asked.

BECKETT v. HOWE AND ANOTHER.

Will—Acknowledgment—Signature not seen by attesting witnesses—Presumption—Probate granted.

A testator, at the time of the attestation of his will, folded it so that his signature was not seen by either of the attesting witnesses. To one of them he had spoken of witnessing his will, and to both he had talked of the necessity of arranging his affairs:

The court, on the authority of Gwillim v. Gwillim, held the will to be duly executed.

The plaintiff, an executor, propounded the will of H. J. Long, a widower without children, who died March 1869, leaving a will purporting to be executed in July 1868. It was a holograph will, and the attestation clause was in the following form:

In witness whereof we the undersigned have, at the request of the testator, and in the presence of each other, signed our names.
H. PRESTAGE.
J. OAKLEY.

At the time of attestation, the testator folded the will in such a manner that none of the writing could be seen, and neither of the attesting witnesses could say positively whether his signature was on the will or not. The case was tried before Lord Penzance on Nov. 6, and both the attesting witnesses were examined.

Mr. Oakley deposed that two or three days before the execution of the will the testator asked him if he would step across to Mr. Prestage's some evening to sign his will. Accordingly, an appointment was made, and the witness went to the house of the other attesting witness. The testator produced a document from his pocket, which he folded up so that no writing could be seen, and he remarked, alluding, as was supposed, to the recent death of his wife, "You are aware that there has been a change in my circumstances which involves a change in my affairs." The word "will" was not mentioned. The testator then pointed to where the witnesses were to sign, and they signed accordingly, Prestage first and Oakley afterwards. This witness saw no writing on the document at all.

Mr. Prestage gave a similar account of the transaction, except that the testator had not asked him to witness his will, but only to sign a paper for him. He saw no writing on the document. In cross-examination the witness said the testator did not appear to be endeavouring to conceal the contents of the paper. On this evidence,

Dr. Tristram, on behalf of the executor, submitted that the will was duly executed. There was sufficient evidence to presume that the signature was there when the witnesses signed, and that being so what passed was a sufficient acknowledgment of the signature.

Dr. Spinks, contra.—Before the testator could be presumed to have acknowledged his signature it must be shown that it was there. [Lord PENZANCE. —In the Goods of Gwillim, 3 S. & T. 200, the court held that it was not necessary to have evidence that the name was there, but that it was at liberty to draw the inference from the circumstances.] So far from the testator acknowledging it as his will he endeavoured to conceal the fact from them. He cited

Cur adv. vult.

Nov. 16.—LORD PENZANCE.—In this case the court took time to consider the former decisions with the view of seeing, whether any case had already been decided which in any way qualified the doctrine that was laid down by Sir C. Cresswell in Gwillim v. Gwillim. The question is, whether a will has been properly executed, and the facts are that a testator stated to one attesting witness a few days before the date of the execution, that he wished him to come on a particular day to witness his will, and to the other attesting witness he likewise said he wished him to sign a paper, not mentioning what it was, and that he wished him to be present at the same time as the other attesting witness. In accordance with this, a meeting was fixed, and one evening both witnesses arrived. Then the testator produced a paper which he carefully folded up, so that neither could see anything that was on the paper. Having made a remark to them both that owing to the death of his wife it was necessary to alter his affairs, he asked them to sign their names as witnesses. The question is, is that a due execution? The sum and substance of the facts came to this; the witnesses did not see the testator's name, and he never told them that his signature was there. But he did tell one of the witnesses directly, and both indirectly, that it was a will on the occasion when they attended the execution, because he gave them both to understand that the death of his wife had rendered a change of his affairs necessary. The doctrine in Gwillim v. Gwillim is this, that if a man produces a paper to the witnesses, and gives them to understand that it is his will, and then gets them to sign their names to that, both being present at the same time, that is an acknowledgement of his signature; that is always supposing the signature is there at the time. Whether that is right or wrong the court does not stop to inquire. It is founded on two cases decided in the Privy Council, to which Sir Cresswell Cresswell referred. But he arrived at this determination: that provided a man acknowledges a paper to be his will and the signature is there at the time, then that is an acknowledgment of his signature. The facts in this case come up to that requirement. What passed between the testator and the attesting witness was tantamount to saying that it was his will, and I think also that his signature was there at that time. It may be said, what evidence is there that his signature was there at all? Here again, I must refer to Gwillim v. Gwillim. If it were necessary to prove it by direct evidence, I should say there were difficulties; but the court ought to judge from the whole appearance of the document, and from the whole circumstances of the case, whether it is satisfied that the signature was there. I think there is quite as much here as there was in Gwillim v. Gwillim to show that the signature was there. Sir C. Cresswell said: "If it were necessary to have direct evidence that the name of the testator was on the will when he acknowledged it by asking them to witness the will, the proof of the execution would fail; but that certainly is not necessary, for the contrary was decided in Cooper v. Bockett, 4 Moo. P. C. C. 419. The other case in the Judicial Committee, and to which I have alluded, goes a great deal further, because there the only attesting witness denied the existence of the will at the time of the attestation. In the case of Loyd and Hart v. Roberts, one of the attesting witnesses was dead, and there was an imperfect attestation clause." That exactly applies to this case, where there is also an imperfect testimonium clause. Sir C. Cresswell then goes on to say, "The court is therefore at liberty to judge from the circumstances of the case whether the signature was on the will at the time of the attestation or not." These remarks apply exactly to the present case, and therefore I hold the will to be duly executed.

Constable v. Constable.

Alimony pendente lite—Witnesses examined in support of petition—No answer of husband—His right to cross-examine witnesses—Practice.

On a wife's petition for alimony pendente lite, the husband having filed no answer, the court would not allow him to cross-examine the witnesses called to prove his faculties.

This was the wife's suit for a dissolution of marriage, on the ground of cruelty and adultery, and the present application was for alimony pendente lite. The husband had filed no answer to the petition.

Hole, for petitioner, examined her in proof of her husband's faculties; and Bosanquet, for the respondent, proposed to cross-examine her.

Hole objected, and

The court held, that as the husband had filed no answer, he was not entitled to cross-examine witnesses called in support of the petition.

Green v. Green.

Restitution of conjugal rights—Pleading.

In a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights, the husband pleaded that he had been induced to marry her on a false representation that she was pregnant by him; that she had, since their separation, committed adultery; and that he was not able to maintain her:

The Court ordered the first plea to be struck out, and allowed the second to stand. The charge of adultery it directed to be pleaded in the usual manner with particulars.

This was a wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights. In his answer the husband pleaded in the 4th and 6th paragraphs, that his wife was pregnant when he married her, and that he had been induced to marry her by false representation that he had seduced her. In the 7th paragraph he pleaded that he had no home of his own to take her to; and in the 8th paragraph that his wife, since their marriage, had been guilty of adultery.

Dr. Spinks, for the wife, moved that the 4th, 6th, and 7th paragraphs be struck out, and that the respondent be ordered to give particulars of the 8th paragraph.

Staveley Hill opposed the motion.

Lord Penzance, J. O.—The 4th and 6th paragraphs have certainly nothing to do with the question to be decided by the court. The 7th paragraph I shall not order to be struck out at the present stage. The charge of adultery must be pleaded in the usual way, and with as much particularity as possible.

Yeatman v. Yeatman and Rummell.

Dissolution suit—Former suit pleaded in answer.

The husband prayed for a dissolution on the ground of adultery, and the wife, in her answer, pleaded that in his former suit the issue of cruelty had been found in her favour:

The court refused to strike out this plea.

This was a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent denied the charge, and pleaded that she had formerly succeeded in a dissolution suit brought by her husband, and also in a suit for judicial separation brought by herself.

Yeatman moved that these paragraphs be struck out of the respondent's answer. She could not plead the judgments given in her favour, they would only come in as discretionary bars to the judgment of the court after the verdict in this suit had been pronounced.

Lord Penzance, J. O.—You cannot exclude the former suits from the knowledge of the court, and I shall certainly not order the paragraphs to be struck out.

Jayne v. Jayne and Prothero.

Dissolution—Countercharge of cruelty—Pleadings.

In a husband's suit for dissolution, after the pleadings had been completed and issue joined, the court refused to allow the co-respondent to add to his answer a charge of cruelty against the husband.

This was a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent and co-respondent had both pleaded a simple denial, and after the pleadings had been completed and issue joined,

Dr. Tristram, on behalf of the co-respondent, moved for leave to add to his answer a charge of cruelty against the husband.

G. Browne, for the petitioner, contra.

Lord Penzance, J. O.—The court is willing at all times to allow a wife to plead, though she may have allowed the time to go by. But here both parties have filed their answers, and cruelty is not a thing which ought to be allowed to be pleaded at the last moment. I shall certainly not allow the co-respondent to plead cruelty at this stage.

which dissolved the marriage, and left standing that part which condemned the co-respondent in costs.

This was originally a husband's suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery. All the issues were found for the petitioner, and the court pronounced a decree nisi, dissolving the marriage, and condemning the co-respondent in costs. Subsequently the Queen's Proctor obtained leave to intervene, and charged the petitioner with adultery. The case was heard before the Judge Ordinary, and the issues were found for the Queen's Proctor.

Dr. Spinks, on behalf of the petitioner, moved that only so much of the decree nisi as dissolved the marriage should be reversed, and that the other part, condemning the co-respondent in costs, should be allowed to stand.

The Attorney-General, for the Queen's Proctor, submitted that this was an entirely novel proposition. Hitherto it had been the custom to reverse the decree simpliciter. At any rate, the co-respondent ought to be heard.

Dr. Spinks.—He did not appear to the suit, and therefore had no right to be heard.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—The original suit was of such a character that I don't think the co-respondent ought to be released from the payment of costs. At present, therefore, I shall only reverse that part of the decree nisi which dissolves the marriage; but I will hear any application the co-respondent may make on the matter of costs.

DROGHEDA ELECTION PETITION.

Thursday, Jan. 19.

(Before KEOGH, J.)

Intimidation — Inflammatory addresses — Personal responsibility of candidate—Spiritual influence—Violence—Mob riot—Organised system—Majority of good votes—Subsequent intimidation.

An organised system of bribery or treating will avoid an election, although not in any way connected with the candidate or his agents, and though the votes affected thereby might be struck off on a scrutiny.

In order to put intimidation upon a parallel with bribery and treating in this respect, it must prevail to such an extent that the court may be satisfied that freedom of election has ceased to exist in consequence.

It was contended that the respondent having a majority of good votes, it mattered not that after that majority had been obtained voters were intimidated and the freedom of election interfered with. But it was Held, that interference with the freedom of election after the contest was thus virtually decided, voided the return.

Where the law has been violated, and outrage and intimidation have been organised, the onus is upon the respondent to show that that intimidation and that violence have not produced their natural consequences, viz., terrifying the people from the exercise of their legitimate franchise.

Orangemen were expected down from Dublin to aid the side of the petitioner, and a meeting of the supporters of the respondent was held the day before the polling, in which speeches were made by the Catholic clergy and others inciting the people to "hurt the Orangemen into the Boyne," "give them a warm reception," &c. The respondent heard these speeches; and on the following day voters were met at the railway station and treated with violence, in the presence of the respondent and his conducting agent. One voter, who told the respondent that he did not intend to vote for anyone, was carried by force to the tally room. Further, it was necessary that voters should be escorted into the town by constabulary and military, and both these forces were assaulted with bludgeons and missiles.

Held, that the election was void on the ground of intimidation.

On the day of the polling the respondent went to voters who were opposed to him, and offered to give them his escort to protect them to the poll, they being afraid to go, notwithstanding there were military and constabulary in the streets:

Held, that this was conclusive evidence out of the respondent's own mouth to prove that there was not freedom of election in the borough.

If stones are thrown, shots fired, and bottles hurled amongst persons going to register their votes, they are not bound to again risk their lives, but may claim that the election be declared void.

If voters are deterred from voting by a prevailing terror, but without influence being brought to bear upon them personally, the election will be declared void.

The Dungarvon and Roxburgh cases considered.

This was a petition by Sir L. M'Clintock against the return of Mr. Benjamin Whitworth. The petition alleged by its third clause, that upon several days preceding the election, addresses and speeches of an exciting and inflammatory nature were delivered in the public streets of Drogheda, by Mr Whitworth and several other persons, in his presence, and with his knowledge and consent, for the purpose of urging and inciting a number of persons to use force in order to intimidate and prevent the electors from voting for the petitioner. The fourth clause alleged that a large number of men and women were hired by the said Benjamin Whitworth, or with his knowledge and consent, for the purpose of intimidating electors, in order to induce them to vote for the said Benjamin Whitworth, or to refrain from voting for the petitioner or Mr. Brodigan. The fifth clause alleged that several members of the Roman Catholic priesthood improperly exercised their spiritual influence over many of the electors, for the purpose of constraining them to vote for Mr. Whitworth, and to prevent them from voting for the petitioner or for Mr. Brodigan. The seventh that upon the 26th Nov. 1868, being the polling-day, several thousand persons, friends and supporters of the said Benjamin Whitworth, armed, some with firearms, and others with bludgeons and sticks, attacked voters who wished and had promised to vote for the petitioner, and inflicted very severe wounds and other bodily injuries upon them, and forcibly prevented many of them from recording their votes, and also attacked a large escort of cavalry, infantry, and police, who were acting as an escort for the protection of voters, and caused such terror and alarm in the minds of the electors, that many who had promised to vote for Mr. Brodigan, and some who had promised to vote for the petitioner, were induced by intimidation to vote for Mr. Whitworth; and many of the electors who had promised to vote for the petitioner, and had come long distances to do so, and were most anxious to do so if they could, without risk of their lives, were deterred from going to the poll and recording their votes. The eighth, "That the offence of undue influence at the said election was committed by the said Benjamin Whitworth, and a great number of other persons, with his knowledge and consent; and that an organised system of intimidation and violence was established by the said Benjamin Whitworth and his friends and agents, and that thesaid Benjamin Whitworth could at any time have restrained the rioters from acts of violence if he had been willing to do so."

Heron, Q. C. and Palles, Q. C., argued the case for the sitting member.

Plunkett, Q. C. for the petitioner.

The material arguments and evidence appear in the judgment.

KEOGH, J. (after stating the allegations in the petition):—One of the best established rules of freedom of election is, that the electors shall come to the poll perfectly free as they are registered, that they shall not themselves accept bribes, that they shall not be treated, that they shall not be coerced, and that they shall not be intimidated; and if, as regards any single vote, it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that any such voter has been so acted upon, it is the imperative duty of the court to resolve that that is not a good vote. I am taking it now step by step; first, as to the question of avoiding an election. There may be many votes declared to be bad votes; there may be men bribed at an election; there may be men treated at an election; there may be men coerced at an election; but it does not necessarily follow that, because of those circumstances, the election itself is void. But I take it to be well settled law, not only settled by a chain of decisions of Committees of the House of Commons, but decided also collaterally in cases in which such questions were brought before the Superior Courts, that an organised system of bribery, that an organised system of treating, will invalidate an election, and compel the court (whatever it may be) trying the question to declare that to be a void election. Surely it could not be for a moment contended that supposing, in a borough of this description, banks were to open their doors, to let it be understood and known that every man who voted in a particular way would receive a sum of money, that large amounts were deposited for that purpose which you might never be able to trace to the candidate, or to any one of his agents; but yet you would be able to prove that there was an organised and extensive system of bribery carried on in the borough, an election under such circumstances could be allowed to stand. Take, then, the case of an organised system of treating. I am speaking now of cases in which nothing could be traced to the candidate or his agents; but suppose that at the head of every street food and drink were provided in large quantities, and places for eating and places for drinking opened, as to which it was known that every voter who wished to go thither and seek for food or for drink would receive it, provided he was a voter upon the side of a particular candidate, and that that was an organised system for the purpose of debauching the voters of a particular borough, although all the while not traceable to the member or to his agents, so as to disqualify him at future elections, is it to be supposed for a moment that that organised system would not defeat the election? I take it that it is well settled that it would do so, and that there is no possibility of contesting that proposition. Now, I refer to a case in which probably as much indulgence was shown to the sitting member by a committee of the House of Commons as in any case which is to be found within the whole range of the authorities; that is the well-known Dungarvan case, in which the present Sir Joseph Napier, afterwards Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was the chairman of the committee. There the member was declared duly elected; but what does that learned chairman say? "Two great principles," said the learned chairman, "were always sought to be maintained: first, that the election should be free; secondly, that the character of the candidate should be pure in regard to that election. It is very material to distinguish between acts by which an election may be avoided, and the misconduct by which the candidate may be disqualified. It is justly observed by Mr Rogers, in the seventh edition of his work on elections, that there are usually two distinct issues: first, whether the election has been procured by bribery or other undue influence; and, secondly, whether the sitting member has been guilty by himself or his agents? this second issue being subordinate to the first. He states that the second issue is usually entered into with a view to incapacitate the sitting member from becoming a candidate, supposing the election should be declared void. On such an issue it becomes the very essence of the inquiry to show that he was cognisant of the corruption; for the object being to fix upon him a personal incapacity, strict proof may be well demanded to show that he was implicated in the transactions complained of. The avoidance of an election depends upon the effect of all acts done which interfere which the freedom required by law. The disqualification of a candidate arises from his culpability in what he does, or causes to be done, or attempts to do, for the purpose of procuring a return by undue influence. These matters are in their nature distinct, and ought not to be confounded." Now, again, I recur to the words, "The avoidance of an election depends upon the effect of all acts done which interfere with the freedom required by the law;" and, acting upon that well-settled view of the law, Mr Palles yesterday, in his most able and eloquent address, did not seem to me to contend that an election might not be avoided by an organised system of bribery or an organised system of treating, but he most properly said, "You may have a vote struck off the poll, and the voter incapacitated without unseating the sitting member." So, undoubtedly, you may have many voters declared incapacitated and struck off the poll upon a scrutiny, without disqualifying the sitting member, or unseating him. So, in like manner, for treating, you may have many votes similarly dealt with without unseating the sitting member. But again, I say, if the aggregate of those instances amount to what may be called an organised system of bribery, or an organised system of treating, pushed to such extremities as to convince the tribunal which is deciding upon the case that freedom of election has not existed, then that election ought to be and will be avoided, although it may not have the consequence of disqualifying for a future election the sitting member. Mr. Palles, in his very clear and astute argument, assimilated intimidation to bribery and treating; but, at the same time, tried to limit the consequence of acts of intimidation, and he used a very remarkable phrase, that "it must be the communism of intimidation." Now, I adopt that expression, though probably it is not a strictly accurate expression; but to my mind it conveys a great deal; and the way in which I accept it is this, that to put intimidation upon a parallel with bribery and treating, it must be spread over such an extent of ground, it must permeate through the community to such an extent that the tribunal considering the case, and ultimately to decide upon it, is satisfied, if it be so, that freedom of election has ceased to exist in consequence. If that be the case, I, for my part, see no distinction between the law as to an organised system of bribery, an organised system of treating, and an organised system of intimidation. This distinction was taken, before some Committees of the House of Commons constituted as they were, that intimidation, however extensive it might be, unless it had a substantial influence upon the fate of the election, could not result in the election being declared void. And Mr Palles, with the great industry which he always shows, and which assures me that everything that can be said upon his side has been brought forward, mentioned a number of cases, and particularly, I think, referred to the Roxburgh case, which may be considered a leading case upon the subject. This case of the Roxburgh election, reviewing as it did almost all the antecedent decisions, was argued by one of the most eminent Parliamentary lawyers. I allude to Mr. Austin, who was perhaps the most eminent advocate who ever argued before committees of the House of Commons. After reviewing those authorities (I believe it is stated in the notes that these cases had been very carefully examined, so as to insure their accuracy even in the arguments of counsel), Mr. Austin thus sums up the result of all these cases:—"In the Reports of Perry and Knapp are to be found collected cases of riots, beginning with the year 1624, and ending with the Coventry case in 1827. Among them are only two instances in which the election was not set aside. The Pontefract election in 1624 was set aside. The Southwark election in 1702 was set aside, though several witnesses swore that they never knew a quieter election. Three Coventry elections in 1706, 1722, and 1736; two Westminster elections in 1722 and 1741; the Pontefract in 1768; the Morpeth in 1774; the Coventry in 1781; and the Nottingham in 1802, were all set aside on account of riots. The Coventry elections in 1827 and in 1833 are the only instances of petitions not being successful where riots have been proved." And then Mr. Austin goes on to explain why he thinks even that the late Coventry decision is not an authority, because he says, that before the committee came to the conclusion of the inquiry, it appeared that the petitioning candidates, "Mr. Tyler and his colleague, abandoned the contest, and retired without any reference whatever to the riots, and consented to the return of the sitting members without any protest against the validity of the election." But notwithstanding the very able argument of Mr. Austin, Mr. Palles very properly said, and relied upon the fact, that this committee in the Roxburgh case arrived at resolutions, showing that riots had taken place, but still allowing the sitting member to hold his seat. Now it appears upon the resolutions of that committee, "That it appears to this committee, that at the late election for the county of Roxburgh, riotous and tumultuous proceedings took place, in consequence of which, according to the evidence produced before this committee, prosecutions were instituted in the Justiciary Court of Scotland, upon which prosecutions certain of the offenders were convicted. That the committee are of opinion that the riots were not of such a nature, nor of so long a duration, as to prevent the votes of the electors of the same county of Roxburgh being taken in the matter of such election." That was their decision. And the basis of this decision is, that although there were riots, yet they were not of such a nature, or of so long a duration, as to prevent the votes of the electors being taken. But even that resolution was not arrived at unanimously by the committee. On the contrary, the minority of the committee moved that the election should be declared null and void by reason of the adjournment and premature close of the poll at Hawick, whereby the electors of that district were deprived of a portion of the period allowed by law for the exercise of the franchise. And that proposition on a division of the committee was negatived by six to three, the committee consisting of nine members. And the resolution arrived at was only on the ground that the interruption of the poll or "the riots were not of such a nature, nor of so long a duration as to prevent the votes of the electors of the same county of Roxburgh being taken in the matter of such election." Accordingly it was held that the sitting member should retain his seat. The distinction to which I was referring may be illustrated in the following manner:—Let me suppose that fifty men were shot dead (if the argument is worth anything, it must be pressed to that) outside this court-house upon the 21st of last November, every single man of them coming up with Sir Leopold M'Clintock's ticket in his hand, from his tally-room, to register his vote on his behalf, every one of their lives might be taken away and yet that being admitted, and proved, and conceded, the election should still not be declared a void election. That is the proposition, because by the very able argument of Mr Heron, seconded and enforced, and losing nothing of its weight, but as I think gaining as it went along, by the admirable argument of Mr Palles, it is contended that provided the sitting member has, at the close of the poll, a majority of registered electors, be it ever so small (and I lay no stress upon the circumstance that it was here of the very smallest, because in the view I take of this case it is not to be decided by mere numerical calculations), then no matter what happens outside that; no matter how many electors are assaulted; no matter how many are driven from the polling booths; no matter how many men are hunted through the fields, and are obliged to go by devious ways and across paths, in order to get back to their homes, or to the conveyances which are to take them to their homes; no matter how much blood has been shed; no matter how much spiritual intimidation has been brought to bear upon the electors; still if the candidate who is returned upon the day of the polling by the high sheriff is able to take his pen and say, there are 1000 electors on the register for the Borough of Drogheda, my seat cannot be in any way endangered, or the election declared null and void, because I have polled, no matter by what means, 501 electors. To be of any value the argument must be pressed to that, unless (which is an impossibility) the other candidate can show that he, but for the violence which was used, would have had a majority on the day of the poll. I must at once say that that is a proposition from which I wholly and entirely dissent. It is subversive, in my mind, of the whole principle of freedom of election. Again, it is said by both of the counsel for the sitting member, that freedom of election is secured, provided that the majority are shown to have had the power of recording their votes. I deny that altogether. This is not solely a contest between Mr Benjamin Whitworth the sitting member, and Sir Leopold M'Clintock the petitioner. There is another and a greater interest than belongs to either of them; there is the public interest. The liberties of the people of this country are involved in the freedom of election; and I say that the humblest individual, the poorest unit in the whole of the constituency of the county of the town of Drogheda, has as good a right freely, without fear, without favour, without intimidation of any kind or description, to come into this court-house upon the day of the election as the richest man upon the register, and as good a right as the great majority of that constituency. Take it that a candidate has by the most legitimate means, without any injury whatsoever being inflicted upon anyone, without any coercion, without any bribery or treating, obtained the votes of nine-tenths of the constituency in his favour, yet it is of vital importance to the public weal that the remaining tenth should be able to record their votes and to express their opinions. It is alleged that the respondent had the majority of the whole constituency, namely, I think 365. There were some of them who gave evidence, who said that they would have voted otherwise, but for intimidation. Men absolutely came up here, and swore that they had promised their votes to Sir Leopold M'Clintock, and that they would have exercised the franchise in his favour, "If I had been protected," was the expression used by one man; "but he was afraid of his life," was the expression of another. Take away these two or three votes (though I say again I attach no value to the numerical argument, as I call it), and even that sorry argument disappears, namely, as to having a majority of the constituency. Then it is said, how is the party to show that it did not influence the election? The petitioner should prove that it did. First, you are to obtain a majority by violence, by intimidation, and by undue influence; and, having then so got a majority, you are to turn round on the other party, and say, "You are in the minority, and you must show that the mind of each voter that composed that majority, so as to place me ahead of you, has been influenced by this intimidation." In the case of bribery it might be hard, if there was an extensively organised system, to trace it to each individual; and in the case of treating detection would be still more difficult. But even there you have something to lay your hands upon; you have money, you have food, you have drink, but who is there that will venture to gauge the influence of intimidation? Who will say how far that reaches? Who will be able to tell what the effect of intimidation is upon the human mind? It is true that you may prove that a man has been told, standing outside the court-house, "If you go in and vote for Sir Leopold M'Clintock your brains will be dashed out." That will show that that man has been intimidated; but will any man say that if there are half a dozen voters standing by whilst that same observation is made, the influence of that threat, directed specially against him, will not operate upon them? How is the limit to be fixed? How is the influence of intimidation to be traced? I will put a case which I am sorry to say is not an imaginary one. Supposing that a minister of religion were to say to an individual voter, "If you do not vote in a particular way, and if anything should happen to you, between this time and the time at which you should reach your dwellinghouse, your immortal soul, your salvation, will be perilled," who is to say what would be the extent of the influence of that observation, proceeding from the mouth of a minister of religion, upon the whole of his congregation? It is not possible to give evidence in a court of justice which would carry out the proposition which has been laid down by the counsel for the respondents here; and if at all it is to be made a matter of evidence, the onus of proof should be thrown upon them to show that when the law has been violated, when gross outrage and intimidation have been organised, that intimidation and that violence have not produced their natural consequences, namely, terrifying the people from the exercise of their legitimate franchise. Now let us come to the facts of this case. Friday, 13th Nov., was the first day of Sir Leopold M'Clintock's canvass. His first witness, Mr. Cairns, canvassed with him, and says that at first they were well and respectfully received, and that there was no incivility. On the Monday they attempted to canvass, and then, he says, the whole character and appearance of the place was changed, and they were immediately met with insults from the mob. Now, to that I call particular attention; they were immediately met by a violent mob, and that very mob, Mr. Cairns says, closed upon him, and tried to throw him down, very near this court-house; and then there is this remarkable circumstance, which has not been much commented upon, but which I take to be the opening of the whole of this inquiry In that mob were two solicitors, one of them Mr. Clinton, and the other Mr. Verdon. Mr. Clinton, turns out to have been the conducting agent of Mr. Whitworth, and he was in that mob, and, as Mr Cairns says, was countenancing that mob. On the Tuesday, Mr. Cairns says, it became hopeless to canvass, from the state of the town. Wednesday is the day of nomination. On the day before the polling in this place Mr. Whitworth is staying at a particular hotel, which I think is called Simcock's Hotel, and on the evening of this day the people outside are addressed from the window of that hotel. Beyond the possibility of doubt it is established that there were a number of Roman Catholic clergymen in that room upon that evening. The first gentleman who speaks, and who, I think, is the Rev. Mr Murphy, as distinguished from the Rev. Dr. Murphy, said, "He would advise them seriously to be fully prepared, for the Orange party in Drogheda were anxious and panting to crush them. He never wished any man to do wrong; but he must again call on them to be prepared, for the Drogheda Orangemen had secured the assistance of 500 of their brethren in Dublin. Those Catholics who are on the side of the Orangemen must be put down; they must be crushed at any risk. They should therefore be well prepared for them, for it was a terrible crisis:" that is the first speaker; then comes the address of the next gentleman, the Rev. Mr. M'Kee, and he said, "the Orangemen of Dublin were on the next day to come down to Drogheda; if those men should come, let them hurl them into the Boyne. Let the people meet them in the morning at the train, and give them a warm reception." The first gentleman says that "The Catholics who are on the side of the Orangemen must be crushed at any risk," and then the next gentleman says, "Let them hurl the Orangemen into the Boyne; let the people meet them in the morning at the train, and give them a warm reception." Again, this passage occurs: "He advised all who heard him to bring their friends to the poll, to marshal their forces early in the morning, and when they were about to charge, say, 'Friends of freedom, charge them home; foes of freedom faugh-a-ballagh!'" which we all know is "Clear the way." Then again he says: "The would-be Catholic member, Mr. Brodigan, and Orange emissaries from hell, had come among them at this critical juncture; he advised the people to be faithful in following the advice of their clergy." This is another clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Gavin: "Yesterday, in the city of Dublin, some of the friends of ascendancy in this town hired 300 assassins to come down and butcher the Catholics of Drogheda. He asked them would they meet them; he assured them, on the word of a priest, that what he said was a fact, that some party in favour of the Orange candidate here went to Dublin and purchased the tag-rag and bob-tail of Orangedom to come down and butcher them to-morrow, and he did not want the people of Drogheda to treat those hirelings as they deserved." Mr. M'Kee is the first person who called upon them to go to the station to meet these so-called Orangemen at a particular hour in the morning, and to throw them into the Boyne. What takes place? The crowd outside say (and this is admitted), "We will, father, meet them;" it is proved distinctly that they cried this out from the crowd. The next morning, at half-past eight o'clock down came Mr. Hamilton and some two or three voters by the early train, and they wanted to go up the town to vote. There was a resident magistrate there, Mr. Reed, who had with him a number of constabulary and a number of soldiers; and that gentleman tells the gentlemen who had arrived at that early hour of the morning, that they could not with safety go up to the town. He said that he could not escort those voters up, and as a matter of fact they were not escorted up, until the other party had arrived; to what then took place I shall have to refer in more detail in another branch of the case. Mr. Hamilton is with those four men whose names are Semple, McDonald, Usher, and Devine; Semple appears to have been a man of a better class than the rest; probably he felt that he had friends in the bystanders, and that he was known; at all events, he goes up alone and votes for Sir Leopold McClintock, and does so in safety; it is an extraordinary circumstance; McDonald disappears, no one knows how or whither, but he got back home in some way, and did not vote; Usher and Devine remained with Mr. Hamilton; Mr. Hamilton is said to be the agent over the property on which they live. It is said, on the other hand, that there was tyranny established over those voters; that may or may not be, but so far as the evidence is given here, it does not go very far, because the letter by which those voters were canvassed is produced. Mr. Hamilton says: "Sir Leopold McClintock is going up for the borough of Drogheda, and you will oblige me by giving him your vote;" he gives them half a sovereign to go up to Dublin to amuse themselves with, and on the morning of the election they are here with Mr. Hamilton at the station; they being here, Mr. Whitworth arrives on the scene, and so does Mr. Clinton, who, mark, was identified with the very first violent mob that was acting in this town, and who is the conducting agent of Mr. Whitworth: Mr. Whitworth is up with his conducting agent at the station, when it is surrounded and filled by an admittedly most violent mob, because it must have been violent, as it intimidated Mr. Reed, the resident magistrate; they are armed with sticks; they are armed, as one of the clergymen told us, with railway bolts, those joining bolts about a foot long, to which nuts are attached, by which two rails are laid together and joined, and they are flourishing these weapons. Whilst this scene is going on those two voters are appealed to by Mr. Whitworth, and to one of them Mr. Whitworth says, "For whom will you vote?" The crowd being round them in this way, and at the same time two or three iron bolts being held up in his face, Usher says, "I will vote for you," and he has come on the table since and said that he did it to save his life. The moment he says that, Mr. Whitworth says, "Come along here." I do not mean to say with any criminal intent as to coercing this man, but he takes him away, and he is immediately hoisted upon the shoulders of the people, and they carry him off to Mr. Whitworth's tally-rooms; he declares that he went to vote for Mr. Whitworth, but he never voted for Mr. Whitworth; that was a most remarkable circumstance. What takes place with Devine? "For whom do you vote?" he is asked, and he replies, "I will not vote for anyone;" and Mr. Whitworth, according to his own statement, leaves that place; but almost instantaneously, as Mr. Hamilton and Devine describe the scene (and their description of it is entirely uncontradicted), that mob, in which two minutes before Mr. Whitworth and his agent Mr. Clinton, were in close contact, seize this man Devine and drag him away, as he says himself, and put him on a car; six men get up, three on each side, and instead of this man, who we are asked to believe willingly went on the car, being placed on the side of the car, he is thrown on his back on the well cushion; and so carried up to Mr. Whitworth's committee-rooms. The learned judge here reviewed the evidence which showed that voters were assaulted over the bayonets of the soldiery, and that the latter were prepared "literally, as if they were entering an enemy's country." He then referred to the personal action of Mr. Whitworth:—"At one or two o'clock in the day," says Mr. Whitworth, "I myself went wherever I heard there was a voter who was likely to register his vote against me, and I absolutely offered him my protection, with the high sheriff or somebody else, to take him up to the poll." The whole of that evidence had a most powerful effect upon my mind in the opposite direction to that which it was doubtless intended to produce. Did ever anyone hear in a legitimately conducted election, where there was freedom of election, of a man coming and canvassing against himself? Did ever anyone hear of a committee of one candidate going and suggesting to voters in the other interest to come up and poll? "I will give you an escort," says Mr. Whitworth; and can any man say he believes that voters who come from great distances, as one gentleman did, 160 miles at least, from Clew Bay in the west of Ireland to Dublin, and another who came from Waterford to Dublin, whom the Queen's troops, cavalry, infantry, constabulary, magistrates, the whole civil and military power that could be organised in this town, were not able to protect, would be safe in coming up to the poll even with Mr. Whitworth? But if that be so, and if the gentlemen who offered to bring voters up to the poll (Mr. Chadwick was one and Mr. Gradwell was another) had the power of doing what all this military authority could not effect, what is the natural logical conclusion? Why, that the whole of the people of this town were obedient to their nod, and that they could call them off from violence or encourage them on to it at any moment exactly as they thought would best suit the interests of their candidate, and that they only offered this protection when, awaking to a sense of what had been done, they saw that no such election could be declared free, and that every election must be declared void, in which such an intolerable infraction of the liberty of the subject had taken place. To my mind the whole of that shows better than any evidence to what a state this town had been brought, and how the dreadful transactions which had taken place operated upon the minds of the persons who were most anxious for Mr. Whitworth's return, when they absolutely went about the town canvassing every man who was supposed to be in the interest of his opponent to come up and register his vote in order to take out of his mouth afterwards the right to say that he had not an opportunity of doing so. I say, if stones are thrown, and shots fired, and bottles hurled, amongst persons coming up to register their votes, they are not bound again to risk their lives in coming to the poll; and if they do not risk their lives they are not precluded from coming before one of the authorised courts of the country to say, "It was not a free election, in which we could not have registered our votes without imminent peril to our existence." The whole of the doctrine, that freedom of election consists in the freedom of the majority is, I say, subversive of the rights of the electors, is contrary to the laws of the land, and is irreconcilable with common sense. Who knows how many voters were induced by terrorism upon that morning to vote for Mr. Whitworth? How can it be told how many were influenced by seeing that the other party were driven out of the field and had not a chance? Did not Mr. Whitworth himself use that very argument to induce voters to poll for him, namely, that he had a considerable majority over his opponent? I am bound to say that was a void election; I cannot avoid saying there was no freedom of election, and I shal certify to the Speaker of the House of Commons that that election was void, and that Mr. Whitworth was not duly elected; and further, that Mr. Whitworth, within the meaning of the 7th section of the Act of Parliament, has been by himself and his agents, guilty of undue influence. I have arrived at the following resolution: First, that Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., is not duly elected a burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the borough and county of the town of Drogheda; secondly, that the last election for said borough and county of the town of Drogheda is a void election; thirdly, that Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., was, by himself, and by his agents, guilty of undue influence as regards two electors, John Devine and Michael Kelly, at the last election for the said borough and county of the town of Drogheda; fourthly, that a system of intimidation was organised and carried out at the last election for the said borough and county of the town of Drogheda, subversive of the freedom of election, and outrages were committed which were calculated to deter, and did in fact deter, a considerable number of voters from exercising their franchise at such election; fifthly, that the costs of the petition be paid by the respondent.

THE CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA, AND CHINA (apps.) v. EVANS AND ANOTHER (resps.).

China and Japan—Bankruptcy—Money of bankrupt carried to special account at bank—Fraudulent preference.

The respondents, assignees of a bankrupt, brought an action against the appellants' bank to recover a sum belonging to the bankrupt, and alleged to have been in the appellants' hands at the date of adjudication of bankruptcy.

The said sum, in pursuance of an agreement between them and the bankrupt previously to adjudication, had been carried by the appellants to a special account, as security against bills, not yet at maturity, drawn by the bankrupt and discounted by the appellants:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court of China and Japan), that the action failed, since by the contract the sum claimed formed no part of the bankrupt's estate, but was rightly in the hands of the appellants at the time of the action.

Fraudulent preference, under such circumstances, could have no application to the case.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Her Majesty's Supreme Court for China and Japan, pronounced on the 18th Nov. 1867.

The appellants carry on the business of banking, at, among other places, Hankow. The respondents were the creditors' assignees of the estate and effects of John Mackellar and William Grant Gordon, who, under the style of "Mackellar and Co.," carried on business as merchants at Hankow, up to the end of June, 1867. Mackellar and Co. were customers of the appellants.

In July, 1867, the respondents filed a petition against the appellants to the judge of Her Majesty's Court at Hankow, whereby they as such assignees as aforesaid claimed from the appellants, as such bankers, a sum of 12,000 taels belonging to the said firm, alleged to have been in their hands at the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy of the said firm, and to be due and payable to the respondents as such assignees.

In answer to the said petition the appellants alleged that, according to the terms of their retainer as bankers, they were bound to pay any cheque of the said firm which should be duly presented, and which should not exceed in amount the moneys of the said firm in the hands of the appellants, "applicable to the payment thereof at the time of the presentment threreof," and that at the date of the said adjudication in bankruptcy they held the sum of taels 27, 2 mace, and 1 candareen, so applicable; and that the said sum they had been and then were ready and willing to pay.

As to the sum of 10,000 taels parcel of the respondents' claim, the appellants answered as follows: that "The same was not payable to the said John Mackellar and William Grant Gordon, nor to the plaintiffs on demand; but was by special agreement between the defendants (appellants) and the said John Mackellar and William Grant Gordon, made previously to their said adjudication as bankrupts, specially set aside to be retained by the defendants as security for any sum which might subsequently appear due to the defendants from the said John Mackellar and William Grant Gordon, in respect of advances then previously made to them by the defendants; and the said sum of 10,000 taels was, in pursuance of such agreement and with the sanction of the said John Mackellar and William Grant Gordon, carried to a special account with them in the books of the defendants called the 'margin bills account,' that all bills for or in respect of which the said sum of 10,000 taels was so specially set aside, as aforesaid, have not yet arrived at maturity, so that the defendants do not know what sum they are or may be entitled to deduct from the said sum of 10,000 taels; and, therefore, all things have not happened and all times have not elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs (respondents) to have the said sum of 10,000 taels, or any part thereof paid to them."

The facts were as follows:—Mackellar and Co. were in the habit of drawing bills on various persons at Shanghai against tea shipped to Shanghai. The appellants were in the habit of discounting the said bills, the shipping documents for said tea being hypothecated with them by way of security.

On the 25th June 1867, the appellants, there being at that time several of the bills drawn as aforesaid still running, applied to Mackellar and Co. for an additional margin of 15 per cent. on the bills so drawn and running; and on the 27th June Mackellar and Co. paid the appellants the sum of 10,000 taels as such margin. The said sum of taels 10,000 was part of an advance of taels 32,000 made earlier on the same day by the appellants to the said Mackellar and Co. against teas by them shipped to Shanghai.

The respondents gave evidence that the said payment was made voluntarily by the firm of Mackellar and Co., and that it was made by the said firm at a time when they were in contemplation of bankruptcy.

The appellants endeavoured to prove that they were ignorant that Mackellar and Co. were likely to suspend payment, and that they were justified in demanding of and receiving from the said firm the said sum of 10,000 taels, and that the said payment was made under pressure. Mackellar and Co. suspended payment on the 28th June 1867, the day following the making of the payment aforesaid, and on the 1st July 1867 were adjudicated bankrupts.

The suit was heard by the court at Hankow, when judgment was given for the appellants. Against that judgment an appeal was brought to the Supreme Court of China and Japan, the learned judge of which was of opinion, first, that Mackellar and Co. were not, at the time of making the alleged agreement relative to the said margin, indebted to the appellants, and that the appellants were not their "creditors" of the said firm; and, secondly, that the payment of the said sum of 10,000 taels was, under the circumstances, a fraudulent preference, that it was made in immediate contemplation of bankruptcy, and that it was voluntary and unjustifiable. He accordingly gave judgment for the respondents, and the decision of the court at Hankow was ordered to be reversed with costs.

From this judgment and decree the present appeal was brought.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., J. Brown, Q.C., and Cohen were for the appellants.

Field, Q.C., Charles and Myburgh were for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by Lord Justice GIFFARD:—Their Lordships cannot entertain the slightest doubt in this case. As regards the twenty-seven taels, the respondents must have those, but this small sum cannot affect the question of costs, nor does it appear ever to have been a matter in dispute. As regards the case itself, there obviously was but one contract, and one transaction—that is detailed in the letter to which Mr. Field referred. The letter, taken in connection with the evidence, shows distinctly that there was but one contract on the 27th June, and that that contract was an advance of 32,000 taels in this way—22,000 taels were to be advanced and 10,000 taels were to be held as margin to secure certain debts. If those were the terms on which the advance of the 22,000 taels was made, and the 10,000 taels were to be retained, and if the whole was one transaction, as it clearly was, it necessarily follows that the 10,000 taels cannot be recovered so long as the state of circumstances is such as that consistently with the contract, the 10,000 ought to be in the hands of the bank. It is clear that this was the state of things at the time when the judgment was given, and that there was then no ground whatever for proceeding for the recovery of these 10,000 taels. Fraudulent preference, therefore, can have no application whatever, because the 10,000 taels formed no part of the bankrupt's estate, and there was not in any sense a dealing with that which belonged to the bankrupt. Upon these grounds, without going further, their Lordships think it sufficient to say that the judgment of the Supreme Court was wrong, that the judgment of the court of first instance was right, and that the appellants ought to have all their costs before the court of first instance, before the Court of Appeal, and before this court, deducting the twenty-seven taels on the assumption that this sum has not been already paid. With respect to the facts raising the question of fraudulent preference, it is unnecessary for their Lordships to express what their opinion would have been had the dealing been a dealing with the bankrupt's estate; suffice it to say that the learned judge of the Supreme Court has laid down the law more widely than it ought to have been laid down, and in a way to which their Lordships cannot assent. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly report to Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court for China and Japan ought to be reversed with costs, and in lieu thereof that the appeal from the inferior court to the Supreme Court ought to be dismissed with costs, and the judgment of the inferior court confirmed, deducting the twenty-seven taels if the same has not been paid.

Judgment reversed.

ANDERSON AND OTHERS (Directors of the Australian Alliance Assurance Company, apps.) v. THE PACIFIC FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (resps.).

Victoria—Marine insurance—Construction of words "Insured only for 4000l." in proposal for re-insurance.

The respondents, in a proposal for the re-insurance of a ship in appellants' company, stated that she was "insured only for 4000l." This was the amount of the original insurance. The proposal also contained the amounts of insurances effected in other offices, but from this list, an insurance, effected without the respondents' knowledge by a mortgagee, was omitted:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria), that the words "insured only for 4000l." must be construed as stating the amount of the original insurance, and not as a representation of the sum total insured in all offices whatever; the occasion on which, and the purpose for which the words were used, suggesting some limitation on their generality.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria. The respondents brought an action against the appellants, as directors of the Australian Alliance Assurance Company, to recover from them 500*l.*, the amount of a re-insurance effected by the respondents with the appellants' company upon a ship called the Beechworth, employed in the Murray River trade, which was destroyed by fire on the 8th Jan. 1867, fire being one of the perils insured against.

The first count of the declaration stated by way of inducement the terms of an insurance, which certain persons trading under the style of "Smith and Banks" had effected with the respondents, the insurance being for three months from the 24th Oct. 1866, in the sum of 4000*l.*, on the hull, furniture, and machinery of the said ship the Beechworth, valued by agreement between the respondents and the assured in the said insurance at 6000*l.*, being on the terms, among others, that if the assured should have made any other assurance upon the interest therein covered prior in date to that insurance, and in respect whereof the risk should have commenced to run, the respondents should be answerable only for so much as the amount of the prior insurance might be deficient. The count went on to aver the existence and continuance of the interest of Smith and Banks in the ship to the amount of all the money insured by them thereon up to and at the time of the loss, and then in substance alleged that on the 17th Nov. 1866, the respondents caused themselves to be re-insured with and by the appellants' company in the sum of 500*l.* on the said ship, upon and subject to the terms and conditions of the first-mentioned insurance, for the same period, at the same value, and against the same perils as those in the first-mentioned insurance; that the respondents were, up to the time of loss, interested in the ship to the amount of 4000*l.*; that during the continuance of the said insurance and re-insurance the ship was totally lost by fire; and that the respondents had paid to Smith and Banks the sum insured by them.

The second plea to the first count was that the appellants were induced to become insurers by the mis-representation by the respondents to them of a fact material to be known to them, and material to the risk of the re-insurance, that is to say, that the ship which the respondents valued at and represented to the appellants to be of the value of 6000*l.* was insured only for 4000*l.*, and was insured for the said 4000*l.* by the respondents' insurance first men-

The application for re-insurance was by proposal on a printed form furnished by the appellants, specifying heads of particulars, the details of which were filled in by the respondents in writing. This proposal was in the following form:

Insurances in other Offices.

Adelaide	1500
Australasia	500
Netherlands, India	250
P. I. Co.	1250

The words "valued at" were printed; the words and figures "6000*l.* insured only for 4000*l.*" were in writing. The whole of the sentence commencing "being a reinsurance" &c., and the words and figures at foot from "insurance in other offices" to the end were also in writing.

A more formal acceptance, signed on behalf of the appellants, was afterwards given, but no policy was issued.

It appeared at the trial that Smith and Banks, before effecting their insurance with the respondents, had mortgaged the ship to James Lawrence, and that he had effected the insurance with the Victoria Insurance Company for 1500*l.* before Smith and Banks had insured with the respondents.

Mr. O'Grady, one of the appellants and the manager of the appellants' company, was called as a witness, and stated that the directors of that company were induced to enter into the insurance by the statement among others contained in the proposal, "insured only for 4000*l.*," and that if it had been insured for 5500*l.* the risk would not have been accepted by them.

Mr. Halfey, Mr. Macmahon, and Mr. Anderson, all of whom were directors of the appellants' company, and present when the proposal was considered, by the board, also gave evidence to the effect that they were induced to accept the proposal from seeing the margin between the value as stated 6000*l.*, and the amount of insurance 4000*l.* Mr. Strachan, the respondent's agent, stated that when he first applied to the appellants they objected to take any re-insurance on the Murray River trade.

Neither the respondents nor the appellants were, in fact, aware until after the reinsurance was effected that Lawrence had insured the ship in the Victoria, or in any office, or that the ship was insured, except as stated in the proposal.

The jury in answer to the judge found that by the words "only 4000*l.*" in the proposal was meant that that was the only sum for which the vessel was insured in any office.

The appellants insisted that the insurance by Lawrence was a material fact affecting the extent of risk taken by them, inasmuch as the difference between the estimated value and the insured value of the ship would be reduced by reckoning it, and that the words "insured only for 4000*l.*" occurring in the accepted proposal amount to a warranty or a representation by the respondents that there was no other original insurance on the ship but that for 4000*l.* made with the respondents.

The respondents insisted that those words meant no more than that the original insurance made with the respondents was for the sum of 4000*l.* only.

The cause was tried before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Victoria and a jury on Aug. 1, 1867, when a verdict was found for the appellants on the second plea, leave being reserved to the respondents to move to enter the verdict.

The respondents subsequently obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict, on the ground that the representation that 4000*l.* only was insured, did not exclude the insurances by persons other than the respondents, and upon cause being shown against that rule, the court made the rule absolute to set aside the verdict for the appellants, and to enter a verdict for the respondents for 500*l.* and costs.

This decision was the subject of the present appeal.

J. Brown, Q.C. and Lord for the appellants.—The words "insured only for 4000*l.*" were a warranty that the total amount of the original insurance or insurances in any office whatever, and whether effected by the respondents or other persons, did not exceed 4000*l.* If not a warranty, they were a representation, material to the risk and untrue in fact; and since the respondents had the means of ascertaining the truth of the representation before making it, they cannot take advantage of their own neglect after having misled the appellants. The construction contended for is the correct one, according to the rule laid down in Arnould on the Law of Marine Insurance, part 2, c. 1, p. 511, 3rd edit., that "in the construction of representations, the primary rule is to take the words in their plain and obvious meaning, and in that sense in which it is most reasonable to conclude that they were understood by the underwriter:" (see Sibbald v. Hill, 2 Dow. 268.) And there is the further reason for construing the words in the sense in which they were understood by the appellants, that the selection of language was made by the respondents, whose duty it was to communicate all material facts. If the meaning was a question of fact, the jury has found it for the appellants.

Mellish, Q. C. and Murray, for the respondents, were not called on.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JOSEPH NAPIER:—The question turns upon what, in fair construction, is the meaning of the words, "Insured only for 4000*l.*?" Whether it is to be considered as a representation that it was the sum total insured in any one or more of the insurance offices, or whether it related to the insurance in the office of the Australian Alliance Company? It appears to their Lordships that upon the fair construction of these words they refer only to the insurance effected in the office of the Australian Alliance Insurance Company. As between insurer and reinsurer, it being open to the owner to insure in any sum he liked, could it be taken as a representation upon which anyone could have been expected to rely in the unlimited sense contended for? The occasion on which, and the purpose for which, the words were used, suggest that some limitation on their generality is required; and taking them in connection with the words in the memorandum which says, "being a reinsurance of one-eighth of Pacific Fire Company's policy, and subject to its terms, and to that company's settlement in event of loss or arrear," their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right, and ought to be affirmed. Their Lordships will therefore humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment below be affirmed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

Re BATES and REDGATE'S application by Petition for Patent.

Patent—Two provisional specifications—Prior right—Concurrent inventions.

Application by A. and B. to have the great seal affixed to a patent, and to have the patent dated on the 2nd Oct. 1868. The applicants had entered a provisional specification on the 2nd Oct. 1868. On the 2nd Nov. C. entered the provisional specification of a patent of a similar invention, and obtained a patent on the 12th Dec. On the 19th March the present applicants had applied to the commissioners to have the Great Seal affixed to their patent, and now presented a petition for that purpose to the Lord Chancellor.

The effect of a provisional specification is merely to protect the person obtaining it from the consequences of any publication on his part, but does not protect him from an independent inventor.

The existence of a prior provisional specification is not a ground on which the Attorney-General ought to refuse to allow a second provisional specification by another inventor to be filed; and in the event of the later applicant for provisional protection being the first to obtain a grant of letters patent, his patent is a bar to the grant of letters patent for the same invention to the earlier applicant for such provisional protection.

Stephen Bates and William Redgate, of Nottingham, petitioned the Lord Chancellor to affix the great seal of letters patent applied for by them on the 2nd Oct. 1868, for improvements in lace machines, under the following circumstances: The petitioners, in May 1868, claimed to have discovered an improvement in the manufacture of lace, and to have brought their invention into a state fit to be patented on the 5th June 1868. In their provisional specification the invention was styled "an invention for improvements in the manufacture of lace made on bobbin-net or twist-lace machines." On the 2nd Nov. in the same year Joseph Hume Bertie filed a provisional specification for an invention for "improvements in the manufacture of lace and twist-lace machines." This invention was stated by Bertie to have been made about the middle of June 1868, and he was the first to obtain a warrant for affixing the great seal to his patent. His letters patent were sealed on the 12th Jan. 1869, Bates and Redgate having omitted to enter any caveat against their sealing, and on the 26th Feb. he lodged a notice of objection to the grant of letters patent to Bates and Redgate for their invention, on the ground that he had reason to believe their invention to be similar to that for which he had obtained a patent. Bates and Redgate applied for a warrant for affixing the great seal to their patent on the 19th March, and, notwithstanding the resistance of Bertie, the Attorney-General issued his fiat authorising their application to proceed on the 24th March. They then gave notice at the Patent-office of their intention to proceed with their application for letters patent, and Bertie, on his part, gave notice of his intention to oppose the application. Bates and Redgate now petitioned the Lord Chancellor to order the great seal to be affixed to their letters patent, and to have the letters patent dated the 2nd Oct., being the day of the filing of their provisional specification, or some other day prior to the 2nd Nov., when Bertie's provisional specification was filed. There was no question which of the two inventions was in reality the earlier; nor was either charged with being a plagiarism on the other. The petitioners relied chiefly upon the fact that, whereas formerly letters patent were always dated the day when the great seal was affixed to them, the practice since the passing of the Patent Law Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83) had been to date the patent, when eventually granted, on the day of the application for provisional protection.

Webster, Q. C. (of the Common Law Bar) and Everitt, in support of the petition, contended that the prior registration by Bates and Redgate gave those gentlemen a primâ facie prior right to a patent. The Attorney-General, moreover, had consented to the grant of the patent, and his discretion could not be properly interfered with in the absence of any fraud or surprise on the part of the applicants. They had not been guilty of delay in giving notice to seal. Having been the first to obtain provisional protection they could not be expected to anticipate that a second provisional protection for the same invention would be granted. At all events, if Bertie had any valid objection to make to their patent that could be no ground why the Lord Chancellor should refuse to seal their patent, for this would not prevent the objection being hereafter raised at law. They referred to Forsyth v. Revière, 1 Webst. Rep. Pat. 97;

Re Vincent's Patent, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 341;
15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, ss. 10, 19, and 20.

Grove, Q. C. and T. Aston (both of the Common Law Bar) appeared for Bertie, in opposition to the petitioners. They submitted that the patent of Bertie was primâ facie a good patent, and that the Lord Chancellor had no jurisdiction to override a valid patent. The petitioners could not make out a case of hardship. The 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 12, provided means by which a patentee might protect his rights if he would. That section enacted that an application for letters patent must be advertised, and that notice might be lodged of objections to the grant; but the petitioners had neglected to make any such objection for the purpose of protecting the inchoate right which they had acquired by being the first to obtain provisional protection. It was against public policy that the provisional protection should be accepted as tantamount to the sealing of the patent, for the provisional protection did not secure the publication of the invention for the eventual benefit of the public. So far from sect. 10 barring the claim of Bertie, he was himself entitled to rely on that. They cited

Re Griffith's Patent; Re Samuda's Patent, 5 L. T. Rep. 141;
Re Russell's Patent, 2 De G. & J. 130;
Orley v. Holden, 8 C. B., N. S., 666; 30 L. J., N. S., 68, C. P.; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 264.

Webster, Q. C. in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) said:—There was no reasonable doubt on this short point when they examined the legitimate meaning of the two kinds of specification. He was of opinion that an inventor who had filed a provisional specification after another inventor had filed one in reference to the same subject-matter, but who succeeded in procuring his patent to be sealed the first, was in the same position as he would have been before the passing of the statute which provided the machinery of provisional specifications. The benefit which the statute contemplated, that inventors were to derive from provisional specification, was a considerable one. It was, however, not absolute protection against all the world, but only security from the consequences of accidental imprudence on their own part giving opportunities to workmen and others in a position of confidence for betraying their trust. If they desired to obtain fuller protection sect. 9 of the statute afforded it by means of procuring it by filing a complete specification, which would, for a limited time, confer the same rights as letters patent, and would operate as a bar to any other persons who might be seeking a patent for the same invention. The general effect of these two several modes of procedure was made plainer still by sect. 10, which provided against the case of the fraudulent filing of a second specification. The petitioners had not filed such a complete specification, but they now contended that the effect of a provisional specification was to give the person first filing it protection in the mean time against all rival inventors, and that the original wrong was in the Attorney-General suffering a second provisional specification to be filed. His Lordship was, however, of opinion, that the Attorney-General could not reasonably have refused Mr. Bertie's application in the absence of a primc facie case of fraud on the part of that gentleman. There was no power to compel a person who had filed a provisional specification to proceed with his invention; and if the Attorney-General were to reject a second applicant, on the ground of one such specification having been already lodged, the consequence might be the loss to the public for a year or more of the fruits of the ingenuity of many minds which often were working simultaneously in the same track. The right which a provisional specification conferred on him filing it to have his letters patent when granted dated back to the time of the filing of the provisional specification was conditional on no rival inventor intervening or obtaining a patent first. It had been complained, indeed, on behalf of the petitioners that, on Mr. Bertie's contention, an inventor might be left helpless against rivals for six months. But this was not so. A person filing a second specification must advertise, and one who had filed the first provisional specification, ought—as he would have had to do independently of the statute—to keep a watch over the advertisements, and to observe if any invention were advertised of an apparently similar character to his own. In the present case Mr. Bertie's advertisement was just like that of the petitioners. They might therefore have applied to the Attorney-General, entering a caveat, which would have made it incumbent on him to decide which was the first inventor. The petitioners had been negligent, and had only themselves to thank for having lost the opportunity of entering a caveat at the right time. The Lord Chancellor could not protect against the effects of such an omission by now antedating the patent. If there were anything in the petitioners' patent not covered by Mr. Bertie's patent, it was quite right that they should have a patent for that; but it would be improper to seal a patent which would interfere with the patent rights of Mr. Bertie, who had now possession in his favour. As, however, the matter was of first impression, it was not a case for making the petitioners pay costs. They might have their option either to have their petition simply dismissed without costs, or the order might be that there should be no costs of the present hearing, and the petitioners might have leave to apply to the Attorney-General for a patent for any part of their invention not covered by Mr. Bertie's patent. Such patent would be dated the 19th March 1869, being the day when the petitioners bespoke their patent.

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED); FORWOOD'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Secured creditor—Claim to prove—Date of—Gen. Ord. 11 Nov. 1862—Rule 20.

The above-named company wrote a letter of guarantee to F., agreeing, in consideration of F. accepting certain bills, to provide him with funds to meet them seven days before maturity, and upon this they were accepted by F. F. also held a mortgage upon some ships belonging to the drawers to secure him against the liability on the bills. Before the seven days before maturity arrived, the company was ordered to be wound-up, and two days before maturity F. sent a notary to the official liquidator, who, on his behalf, presented the letter of guarantee, and demanded payment. This was refused, and the notary returned the letter to F., who sold the mortgaged ships, which did not produce sufficient to satisfy the charge:

Held (confirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the mere presentation of the letter by the notary was not a sending in of the particulars of F.'s claim under the 20th rule of the Gen. Ord. of the 11th Nov. 1862, and consequently that F. could prove against the estate only for the balance of the amount guaranteed, after deducting the sums realised by the sale of the ships.

This was an appeal by the Messrs. Forwood from an order of the Master of the Rolls, made in the winding-up of the above company, whereby his Lordship disallowed in part the claim of the appellants to prove a debt against its estate.

The case is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256, where all necessary statements will be found.

Jessel, Q. C. and Henming supported the appeal, and contended that the claim had been duly sent in, and that Messrs. Forwood were consequently en-

Re Barned's Banking Company (Limited), Kellock's case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. Ap. 869; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671;

The 20th Order of the 11th Nov. 1862.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidator, appeared to support the decision, but at the conclusion of the opening, Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I do not think I need trouble you, Sir Richard Baggallay, in this case. It is quite clear to my mind, what was decided by Kellock's case. The first point decided, no doubt, was this, that the rule in bankruptcy does does not apply to windings up; but the well-known rule laid down in Mason v. Bogg, and afterwards in the House of Lords, in the Duke of York's Estate, that a creditor holding security might, if he chose, prove for the whole of his debt and retain his security, does apply. That was the first point. Then there came a second point, viz., what was the date at which the creditor might realise his security, and not be bound to give credit for the proceeds of the realisation. The Lord Chancellor, in his judgment, says this: "I think, however, that the true rule is, that the date is to be taken as it stands at the time when the claim is put in." Then what is the meaning in that judgment of putting in the claim? To my mind, it is perfectly clear that the meaning is, that there must be a claim under the orders.

Then the only question that remains is whether that which took place in this case was a claim under the general orders or not. A letter undoubtedly in proper form would be a claim, and there cannot be a more convenient form of claim than a letter, and that disposes of the observations that have been made on Kellock's case. All that was done in this case was not done with the intention of making a claim under the orders, or with any reference to the orders, or with any notion that the official liquidator would be required to record the demand that was made; but a notary was sent, a notary presented a guarantee, and asked for the payment of that guarantee, which was refused, and he took the guarantee away. That, in my opinion, is clearly not a claim within the meaning of the 20th order, because the 20th order is this: "For the purpose of ascertaining the debts and claims due from the company. and of requiring the creditors to come in and prove their debts or claims, an advertisement shall be issued at such time as the judge shall direct, and such advertisement shall fix a time for the creditors to send their names and addresses, and the particulars of their debts or claims, and the names and addresses of their solicitors (if any) to the official liquidator, and appoint a day for adjudication thereon." I certainly should not be at all disposed, if a claim had been made which was intended to be a claim under those orders, to quarrel with any letter upon a mere question of form; but in this case I look upon the matter as a question of substance and not of form. If a mere demand is made, and the document on which the demand rests is immediately taken away and no record is required of it, and nothing in writing is left; if such a demand were to be considered to amount to a claim, we should for ever have contests on affidavits of every kind and every description. The claim in this case must be a claim under the orders, and, in point of fact, that claim when made is equivalent to proof, just as in the case under a testator's estate where the affidavit is made. The only difference is that in this case the affidavit is not required unless the official liquidator asks for it, and therefore the time of making the claim is selected. After that the security may be realised, because the claim, if properly made, is in reality equivalent to proof in bankruptcy, or to proof against a testator's estate.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Re HEYFORD COMPANY (LIMITED);

PELL'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Winding-up—Signing memorandum of association—Allotment of shares to vendor—Paid-up shares—The Companies Act 1862, s. 23.

P. subscribed the memorandum of association of a company for 1350 shares in the ordinary way, there being nothing to show that the shares were to be treated as fully paid-up. In the articles of association subsequently registered an agreement was set forth (and confirmed by them) by which P. was to transfer certain property to the company, and was to accept 1500 fully paid-up shares in part payment of the purchase-money. He transferred the property to the company, and 1350 shares were allotted to him, the remainder of the 1500 being allotted to his nominees, but he made no payment in money upon the shares:

Held (reversing the Master of the Rolls, who was of opinion that P. must be placed on the list of contributories for 1350, but would only have to pay the balance due from him after deducting the value of the property transferred by him to the company), that P.'s shares, so long as the agreement was not impeached, could only be treated as fully paid-up shares.

This was an appeal by Mr. George Pell, from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, which is reported ante, p. 320. The facts are there fully stated, and it is only necessary to say that Mr. Pell subscribed the memorandum of association for 1350 shares in the ordinary way; and that an agreement was entered into between him and the company for the sale by him to the company of certain property in part payment for which the company were to issue to him or his nominees 1500 fully paid-up shares; that this arrangement was set forth in and confirmed by the articles of association, which were afterwards registered; that Mr. Pell transferred the property to the company, and that 1350 shares were allotted to him as fully paid-up, the rest being allotted to his nominees, but that he never paid any money in respect of the shares. The company being afterwards wound-up, the Master of the Rolls held that Mr. Pell must be put on the list of contributories for 1350 shares, but that he would only have to pay the balance due from him, after deducting the value of the property which he had transferred to the company.

From this decision Mr. Pell appealed.

Westlake, for the appellant.—The company cannot go behind their own agreement, and therefore, as between them and Mr. Pell, the shares must be treated as having been fully paid-up. The creditors in the winding-up have in this respect no greater rights than the company had, and indeed they had notice of the agreement between the company and Mr. Pell by reason of its being stated in the articles of association which were registered, and to which all the creditors had access.

Roxburgh, Q. C., for the official liquidator.—The ground of the Master of the Rolls' decision was that in such a case the memorandum of association ought to contain something to identify the particular shares there subscribed for, with the shares which by another perfectly distinct agreement were to be issued by the company as fully paid-up shares. In the present case there was no such identification. The case differed altogether from Drummond's case, because there the prospectus which was issued of the new company, notified to the world that the paid-up shares were the same as those for which the memorandum of association had been subscribed. In the present case the company was incorporated in August, and the shares were not issued to Mr. Pell until December. The transactions were manifestly entirely distinct, and Mr. Pell ought to be made a contributory for the 1350 shares for which he subscribed the memorandum of association.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that, as Mr. Pell signed the memoranduum of association of the company for 1350 shares, he was undoubtedly, by force of sect. 23 of the Companies Act 1862, bound to take that number of shares. But here the articles of association confirmed an agreement between Mr. Pell and the company, by which the company were to issue to him or his nominees 1500 fully paid-up shares, as part of the purchase-money for property which he was to transfer to the company. This property he accordingly transferred to the company, and 1350 shares were issued to him as fully paid up, the remainder of the 1500 being issued to his nominees. His Lordship agreed with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that those 1350 shares must be taken to have been issued in pursuance of the agreement. The Master of the Rolls, however, went on to order Mr. Pell's name to be placed on the list of contributories for the 1350 shares, but directed an inquiry to be made as to what was the money or money's worth which he had given to the company under the agreement. But that agreement had not been impeached, and his Lordship must therefore assume that its validity could not be impeached, and he must consequently take it, just as in Drummond's case, that Mr. Pell agreed to take 1350 shares. but that he had paid them up in full in money's worth. His name could not, therefore, be placed on the list of contributories. He must have his costs in the court below, but there would be no costs of the appeal.

Service on the trustees of a petition for payment out of court of the fund dispensed with, and the matter referred to chambers to inquire who were the persons entitled to the fund.

This was a petition for payment out of court of a fund, which had been paid in in 1857 under the Trustee Relief Act, to persons who had become absolutely entitled on the death of a tenant for life.

The house named by the trustees, in their affidavit on paying the fund into court, as the place at which they might be served, had been pulled down, and the trustees themselves had not been heard of for ten years, and could not be found.

Re SPENCE'S PATENT NON-CONDUCTING COMPOSITION AND CEMENT COMPANY.

Company—Winding-up—Petition—Creditor—Practice.

A shareholders' petition for the compulsory winding-up of a company made out no case for an order. A creditor appeared, without notice to the company, in support of the petition, having the day before the hearing filed an affidavit proving a debt which would have entitled him to a compulsory order if he had presented a petition:

Held, that no order could be made on the petition in favour of the creditor, on the ground that the company had not notice of the fresh case made against them by the creditor, and had no opportunity of meeting it.

This was a petition by three shareholders, holding among them fifty fully paid-up shares in Spence's Patent Non-Conducting Composition and Cement Company, for the compulsory winding-up of the company, on the ground that it had ever since its formation in 1865 carried on business at a loss, and that it was impossible that it could be carried on profitably.

The petition did not allege that the company was actually insolvent, nor was its insolvency actually proved; but evidence was given in support of the petition, which showed that it was very doubtful whether the company could pay its debts.

On the day before the hearing of the petition, a creditor on an unpaid bill of exchange for 50*l*., filed an affidavit proving the debt, but the company had no notice of this affidavit. The creditor had commenced proceedings at law to recover the amount due on the bill.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Bond Coxe appeared in support of the petition.

Napier Higgins, for the creditor, supported the petition and contended that, as it was clear from the evidence that the company was virtually insolvent, his client was entitled to a compulsory order.

Lord ROMILLY said that he was clearly of opinion that the petitioners had made no case for a compulsory winding-up order. It was a very peculiar case where the court allowed persons who held fully paid-up shares, and could not be called on to make any further payment, to have a compulsory winding-up, as for example where the assets were in the hands of third parties, who refused to give them up. It was clear to his Lordship that a compulsory winding-up would leave nothing to distribute amongst the creditors, as the entire assets would be consumed in costs. The only point on which he entertained any doubt was whether he ought not to make a compulsory order and give the carriage of it to Mr. Higgins' client in order to save the expense of a fresh petition by him. His Lordship would hear Sir Richard Baggallay on that point.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. (with him Horton Smith), for the company, said that they were prepared to meet the case made by the petition; but he contended that when a creditor appeared in support of a petition he must support the case made out by the petition, and was not entitled to raise a fresh case without giving any notice to the company, who were consequently unprepared to meet it. He submitted, therefore, that no order could be made on the petition.

Lord ROMILLY said that the creditor stood in a very different position from the petitioners, and that if he had presented a petition he would in all probability have obtained a compulsory order. His Lordship was, however, of opinion that he could not turn a shareholder's petition into a creditor's at such short notice to the company of the case they would have to meet. The petition must therefore be dismissed with costs.

BERRIE v. HOWITT.

Solicitor and client—Charge for costs—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

By virtue of the decree in a suit to set aside an appointment and uphold a settlement, A. became entitled to an estate tail in certain property. A. died (before he had paid his solicitor's costs of the suit), without issue, and without having executed a disentailing deed, and the property devolved on certain prrsons under the settlement:

On a petition by the solicitor that he might be declared entitled to a charge on the property for the amount of his costs:

Held that he was not entitled to any charge on the property, as the interest of his client (on which alone he would have been entitled to a charge) had determined by his death.

By an indenture of release dated the 23rd Dec. 1797, certain lands and hereditaments at Long Eaton and Bingham, were conveyed and assured to the use of William Howitt during his life, with remainder to the use of such one or more of the children of the said William Howitt in such shares or proportions, for such estates and in such manner as the said William Howitt should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of all the children of the said William Howitt, as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders in tail between them.

By his will dated the 4th Nov. 1839, William Howitt, in exercise of the power of appointment given him by the deed of 1797, appointed the settled property to his children for life in certain shares, and made certain limitations subsequent to the life estates of his children. William Howitt died in 1840, leaving four children him surviving, namely, John Howitt, Enoch Dawson Howitt, Sarah Berrie, and William Howitt.

The suit was instituted by the heir-at-law of the testator's daughter, Sarah Berrie, for the purpose of setting aside the limitations of the several shares in the settled property contained in the testator's will subsequent to the limitations to his children for their respective lives on the ground of remoteness.

By the decree made in the cause on the 26th April 1867, it was declared that these subsequent limitations were void; the decree said nothing about costs, it being understood that all parties were to pay their own costs.

By virtue of this decree, George Enoch Howitt became entitled to an estate tail in one undivided fourth part of the settled property. He died in June 1869, without issue, and without having executed a disentailing assurance, and four persons became entitled under the decree as tenants in common in tail of the undivided fourth part to which George Enoch Howitt had been entitled.

The present petition was now presented by the solicitor of George Enoch Howitt in the suit, praying that it might be declared that he was entitled to a charge on the share of George Enoch Howitt in the settled property for 131*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.*, the amount of his bill of costs against George Enoch Howitt, and that the said sum might be declared to be a charge on the said share under and by virtue of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

The 28th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127 is in the following words:

> In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard, or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made, such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon and against, and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter, or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper; and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect against such charge or right; provided always, that no such order shall be made by any such court or judge in any case in which the right to recover payment of such costs, charges, and expenses is barred by any statute of limitations.

Joliffe, in support of the petition, cited:
Scholefield v. Lockwood, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 83;
Bailey v. Birchall, 2 H. & M. 371;
and submitted that this was a case in which property had been preserved within the meaning of the Act, and that the petitioner was entitled to a charge on the property.

Ware, for one of the respondents, contended that the petitioner was not entitled to a charge on the property against the remaindermen, but only on his client's interest in it.

Methold and Rendall appeared for the other respondents.

Joliffe, in reply, argued that the petitioner was entitled to a charge on the property, even in the hands of the remaindermen, as their estate would have been swept away but for the suit, and might therefore be justly said to have been preserved for them by the petitioner.

Lord ROMILLY.—I think there cannot be any charge in the present instance. The Act gives the court power to charge only the property of the person who employs the solicitor. The petitioner was entitled to a charge on the estate tail of his client, but not on the interests of the remaindermen. The interest of his client has, however,

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 15.

THE LONDON AND MEDITERRANEAN BANK (LIMITED) v. STRUTTON.

Jurisdiction—Foreign action—Bill to defeat—Bill dismissed.

B. having entrusted C. with certain bills of exchange for collection in America, they came improperly, as was alleged, into the hands of D., who instituted proceedings upon them in America. Eventually they came into the possession of E., as commissioner in London appointed by the American court to collect evidence as to the pending proceedings, and B. then filed a bill against C. D. (both out of the jurisdiction), and E. praying that they might be ordered to bring the bills into court, and be restrained from negotiating or parting with them:

Held, that B. had failed to establish a sufficient case for the interference of the court.

This suit was instituted by the liquidator of the above bank against Louis Dehayes Strutton, John Morton (both out of the jurisdiction), and Richard Mullens, for the purpose of recovering possession of certain bills of exchange, which had been sent out to America for collection, had been there disposed of, and, after giving rise to certain legal proceedings in that country, were now in the possession of the defendant Mullens, as commissioner appointed by the American court for the purpose of taking evidence in England in reference to those proceedings.

The facts, as stated by the bill, were these:

The bills in question, which were for 16,000*l.*, originally formed part of the assets of the Continental Bank, which had become amalgamated with the London and Mediterranean Bank, and were drawn upon John Gladstone and Co., one by William Moses of New York, and the other by Allan Hay, and had been discounted by the Continental Bank in the ordinary course of business. Subsequently, on being protested for nonpayment, they were intrusted by the Continental Bank to the defendant Strutton, a solicitor practising in New York, but who was then in this country, and who undertook to act as the bank's agent in recovering the amounts due on the bills.

The bill further stated that with the exception of a sum of 500*l.*, which Strutton had forwarded on account of the bills, the bank had been unable to get any information from him in reference to them, and that by a breach of duty he had disposed of them in some manner beyond his authority, which was strictly limited to collecting the amounts due on them. That they were now in this country, in the hands of the defendant Mullens, and that he refused to give any information about them, further than that they had come into his possession, under a commission issued out of one of the American Courts for the purpose of taking evidence in the legal proceedings above referred to, and that he intended to dispose of them without regard to the banks' claims.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be ordered to bring the bills into court; that they might be restrained by injunction from endorsing or parting with them, except under order of the court, and for the necessary accounts.

The bill had been served on the defendants and Strutton and Morton, but as they had not entered an appearance, it had been taken pro confesso against them.

Dickinson, Q. C., and J. Napier Higgins, for the plaintiff, contended that as the bills were now in the hands of a person within the jurisdiction, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to have them placed in safe custody. Admitting that the defendant Mullens was the commissioner of the American court, yet, as the evidence showed that he had been put in motion and supplied with the bills in question by the solicitors of Morton, he must be treated as Morton's agent in this country, and not in his official capacity. It was not the proper duty of a commissioner or special examiner to take charge of the subject-matter of an action or suit, or even of the exhibits in a cause, and the mere fact of his connection with a foreign jurisdiction ought not to be allowed to interfere with the plaintiff's equity. The authorities showed that if the American court had pronounced judgment in favour of the defendants, this court would examine the decree and reject it so far as it was inconsistent with English law, and à fortiori would it interfere, where, as in the present instance, the proceedings were merely preliminary.

Simpson v. Fogo, 1 J. & H. 18; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6; Lord Portarlington v. Soulby, 3 M. & K. 104.

E. K. Karslake, Q. C. and Curry, for the defendant Mullens, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case the court is asked either to make a decree that the bills of exchange in question shall be deposited in the hands of the plaintiff, or to grant a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendant Mullens from parting with them. It appears that legal proceedings are pending for the recovery of the money due on the bills in one of the courts of the United States, and that the bills themselves are now in possession of the defendant Mullens in his capacity of commissioner appointed by that court for the purpose of taking evidence in reference to those proceedings. There has been no suggestion that the American court is not perfectly competent to deal with the question before it; but the foundation of the plaintiff's case is that the bank cannot be made safe on the bills if Morton sues on them, and that Morton has obtained them improperly from Strutton while acting as the bank's agent. But even so, Strutton was the accredited agent of the bank for receiving the money on the bills in America; and if, as their agent, he has there failed in his duties, it is in that country that primâ facie he ought to be called to account. The plaintiff, however, without taking any such steps, has adopted the extraordinary course of filing a bill in this country for the purpose really of defeating the legal proceedings in America. I have read the judgment in Simpson v. Fogo (sup.), and I agree with the principles there laid down, although it is difficult to reconcile them with other decisions, or to follow the distinction drawn between the exercise of the jurisdiction in personam, and in rem. It is well established, however, that this court will never interfere with the administration of justice in another court, except upon a case properly made out, and only then by directing its decree, not against the court itself, but against the litigants, upon whose consciences it is intended to operate, and whom it prevents from making an inequitable use of their legal rights. I consider that the plaintiff has failed to make out a case for the assistance of this court, and that any rights that he may have, must be asserted in America. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

WILSON v. FURNESS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Specific performance—Railway company—Agreement to make and maintain a road and wharf—Demurrer.

Bill for specific performance of an agreement by which the defendants, a railway company, in consideration of the plaintiffs obtaining the waiver of certain works (which by an Act of Parliament the defendants were otherwise bound to execute), and conveying land for a road, and paying 200l. towards the repair of it, agreed to make and maintain a road and wharf, the road and wharf to be completed within a specified time. The plaintiffs obtained the waiver, conveyed the land, and paid the money, but the defendants neglected to complete the road, and make the wharf:

Demurrer, on the ground that the agreement was not one which the court could enforce, overruled.

This was a demurrer.

The bill prayed specific performance of an agreement by the defendants, and stated that by the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1851 the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company was incorporated, with power to construct a railway from Ulverstone to Comforth, and to take and use lands for that purpose, and the Act provided that, subject to any waiver or alteration which might be allowed by the Admiralty, two viaducts should be constructed by the company in man ner therein prescribed, and that "in such part of each of the said viaducts, and in such manner as should be approved and directed by the said Lord High Admiral or the said commissioners by writing under the hand of the Secretary of the Admiralty, and subject to any waiver or alteration to be allowed as therein mentioned, the said company should construct an open swing or drawbridge of not less than 36 feet clear width, and the site of such two viaducts, and the mode of constructing the same, and also the said two several opening swing or drawbridges, should be only in accordance with such approval and direction."

The defendant company was incorporated by the Furness Railway Act 1858. By the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1858, the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company, and the defendant company might enter into and carry into effect any agreement for the leasing for a term of years, and for the selling and transferring to the defendant company of all or any part of any share or interest in the railway works, lands, property, and effects then vested in and belonging to the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway, and which they were, under the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1851, authorised to make, maintain, and reclaim, together with all or any of the rights, powers, privileges, and authority of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company with respect to the same, and for making of the lease or sale either before or after the completion of the railway works and lands respectively, and upon such terms and conditions, and for such consideration, as the two companies should mutually agree upon; but that if any such lease or sale comprised the railway of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Company, it should comprise the whole thereof, and that from and after the transfer the defendant company should, according to the extent of the transfer, be subject to and perform, and be liable to, all contracts, agreements, duties, obligations, debts, charges, claims, and demands whatsoever with respect to the premises transferred, to which the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company, if the transfer had not happened, would be subject or liable, and should indemnify the Ulverstone and Lancaster Company in respect to the same.

By an agreement dated the 25th June 1862, made between the plaintiffs and other landowners of the first part, and the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company of the second part, and under the common seal of the company, after reciting (inter alia) the provisions prescribed by "the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1851," regarding the construction of the opening swing bridge or drawbridge, and that a viaduct had, by the partial exercise by the Admiralty of the powers of waiver vested in them, been constructed without an opening bridge, but with preparations for making the opening at a future time, upon certain notice from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and that the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company were desirous that the Lords Commissioners should thenceforth entirely and for ever waive the construction of and the right to require any opening swing or drawbridge in the viaduct, and that the parties thereto of the first part, on their own behalf, and as representing the inhabitants of places adjoining or near the viaduct, and who were interested in the question, had hitherto objected to the waiver of the opening bridge, and that, in order to obviate all further difficulties, the Ulverston and Lancaster Railway Company and the parties thereto of the first part, on behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants, had agreed together as thereinafter mentioned. It was witnessed that the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company for themselves, their successors and assigns on the one part, and the plaintiffs and other parties of the first part thereto, for themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns on the other part, mutually agreed, each party with the other party, as follows (inter alia):—First, that if the Admiralty should, within twelve months from the date of the agreement, and for ever thereafter, waive their right to require any opening or drawbridge in the viaduct, and if the plaintiff should, without any pecuniary consideration, convey, at the cost of the company, to the company the land required for so much of the road thereinafter agreed to be made as should pass through his estate, and all other persons through whose estates the road would pass would also convey to the company, at the cost of the company, the land which would be required for that part of the road which would pass through their respective estates, the purchase-money for such lands not to exceed in the whole l.; and also, if the sum of 200l. should be paid to the company by the plaintiffs towards the expense of the works thereinafter mentioned, that then the company would, at their own cost, and within six months from the date of the waiver and the delivery to them of the land for the purpose, unless prevented by damage done by the tide to the works, and in that case as soon after such six months as could be, make, upon the land so to be obtained for the purpose, a carriage-road of the width of 16ft. in the direction shown by the plan thereto annexed, and which should not be constructed below a certain level, and which road was to be constructed according to the specification annexed, and be a public road or highway, and would make good the fences, &c., and would yearly, after the completion of the road, pay to the corporation of Kendal, 5*l.*, to be applied in repairing or improving a certain portion of the road; and that the company should also make and maintain a wharf on the sea-shore at the place shown on the plan annexed, of the length and height mentioned in the agreement. And it was also provided that no damage done by the tide to the works in progress should be considered as any reason for the non-completion of the road and wharf, or entitle the company to receive the money before the final and complete execution of the works; secondly, that if within or before the period of one month after the company should, by writing, have informed the parties thereto of the first part, that the road and wharf were completed, any difference should arise between the company and the parties thereto of the first part, whether the road and wharf were sufficient, according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement, the difference should be referred to arbitration, according to the terms of clause 3; but otherwise, the road and wharf should, at the expiration of that time, be deemed to be sufficient, and also, that if after the completion of the road the company should exercise the right given them by the agreement of laying down certain tramways, and within one month after the completion of the same any difference should arise, the same should be referred to arbitration; thirdly, provided for the appointment of arbitrators, &c.; fifthly, that the parties of the first part, on behalf of themselves and the inhabitants, would forthwith, at the expense of the company, join and concur, and use their best endeavours to procure all other necessary parties to join and concur, with the company in making the necessary application to the Admiralty for obtaining such entire and perpetual waiver of the opening or swing drawbridge, and would, at the like expense, use their best endeavours to procure such waiver.

The bill then went on to allege as follows:

Paragraph 6:

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have duly and entirely waived the construction of and the right to require any opening swing or drawbridge in the viaduct according to the terms of the above stated request, and the land required for the purpose of the road agreed to be constructed by the said agreement was duly conveyed according to the terms of such agreement, and such land was duly delivered to the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company, according to the same agreement, and such land was taken possession of by that company, and the same is now vested in and in the possession of the defendant company under the sale and transfer by the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company to the defendant company, stated in the next paragraph.

Paragraph 7:

Under the powers contained in the said Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1858, the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company and the defendant company entered into an agreement for the selling and transferring to the defendant company of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway, and the works, lands, property, and effects vested in or belonging to the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company, or which they were, under the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Act 1851 authorised to make and maintain and reclaim, together with all the rights, powers, privileges, and authorities of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company; and the defendant company accepted a sale for the purpose of carrying out such agreement, and the terms agreed on were duly approved of by the Board of Trade, and the transfer was by the agreement appointed to take effect at a day long since passed, and was evidenced by a deed of transfer dated the 4th Aug. 1863, and duly made between the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company of the one part, and the defendant company of the other part, and the whole of the undertaking, property, and effects of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway Company has become and are now vested in the defendant company.

Paragraph 10:

The defendant company has commenced making the said road mentioned in the said agreement of the 25th June 1862, but they have not made or completed such road according to the terms and provisions of the said agreement, and such road is in a very incomplete condition, and the defendant company has not made or commenced making the wharf mentioned in the said agreement.

Paragraph 11:

The defendant company has from time to time been required by the plaintiffs to perform the said agreement, and to make and complete the said road and wharf according to the terms and provisions thereof; but the defendants, although always admitting their liability to make and complete such road and wharf, and promising so to do, have neglected to make or complete the same.

Paragraph 16:

The defendant company still refuse to perform the said agreement of the 25th June 1862.

Paragraph 17:

The plaintiffs have always been and are ready and willing to perform the said agreement on their part, and to contribute and pay the sum of 200*l.* mentioned therein according to the terms thereof.

The bill prayed—1. That the defendant company may be decreed specifically to perform the said agreement of the 25th June 1862, and to make, construct, and complete the road and wharf specified in that agreement and in the plan annexed thereto, according to the terms and provisions thereof, and to do and perform all works and matters necessary for the completion of the said road and wharf, the plaintiffs being ready and willing duly to perform the said agreement on their part. 2. That damages in respect of the matter aforesaid may be awarded to be paid to the plaintiffs by the defendant company.

Fry, Q.C., and Currey, for the demurrer, contended that the only things to be done by the company were: first, the making the wharf; secondly, the constructing of the road; thirdly, the paying 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and that there was a complete remedy at law for breach of this agreement, and contended that no works of this sort could be enforced by this court. They also contended that it was in reality a representative suit, and the Attorney-General should have been a party to it, to represent the places mentioned in the agreement. They cited

[The VICE-CHANCELLOR referred to Storer v. The Great Western Railway Company, 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 48.]

Kay, Q. C. and Nulder, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said with regard to the main point this case was covered by the decision in Storer v. The Great Western Railway Company 2 Y. & Coll. C. C. 48; indeed this case was a stronger one than that. The construction of a road was a thing of easy performance. The company had had the benefit of the agreement. They had had conveyed to them the land on which the road was to be made, and now they wished to evade their liability to make it. Rather than allow so great an act of dishonesty to go unredressed, the court would struggle to make the company perform their agreement; and if necessary it would permit the plaintiffs themselves to do the work at the expense of the company. It had been suggested that this company had been incorporated for the purpose of making the railroad, and not of making the road. But being bona fide under certain onerous obligations, the company agreed with the plaintiffs to give something else instead more convenient to both parties. There was no principle on which he could hold such an agreement as this to be ultra vires. The length of time which had been suffered to elapse could not affect the plaintiff's rights. The company had been nearly six years in possession of the land, but that was no reason why they should escape from the obligation they had agreed to perform. Then it had been urged that the Attorney-General was a necessary party to this suit, but he did not see the necessity of making him a party. In his opinion an individual entitled to the benefit of the agreement had a right to come to the court to have it enforced. The demurrer must be overruled with costs.

Ex parte FITZGERALD; Re THE BEVERLEY COMMISSIONERS.

Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at election.—Jurisdiction—Power of adjournment—Adjournment made when less than whole number of commissioners present—15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, ss. 1, 4.

15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, after providing for the appointment, under certain circumstances, of commissioners to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at elections for members to serve in Parliament, enacts (sect. 4) that "the commissioners appointed under this Act to make inquiry as aforesaid in relation to any county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards, go to such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, and shall from time to time hold meetings for the purpose of such inquiry, at some convenient place within the same, or within ten miles thereof, and shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county, division of a county, city, borough, university or place, or within ten miles thereof, as to them may seem expedient, and such commissioners shall give notice of their appointment, and of the time and place of holding their first meeting, by publishing the same in some newspaper in general circulation in such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, or the neighbourhood thereof; provided always, that such commissioners shall not adjourn the inquiry for any period exceeding one week, without the consent and approbation of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State."

The power given to the commissioners by this section to "from time to time hold meetings for the purposes of the inquiry," is a power to hold meetings from time to time without formal adjournment; and this power is not cut down by the authority subsequently given "to adjourn such meetings from time to time;" the only limitation being that the inquiry shall not be adjourned for more than a week without the consent and approbation of a principal Secretary of State.

Where three commissioners were appointed under this Act to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at the borough of B., and held various sittings there up to the 25th Sept. 1869, when the inquiry was adjourned to the 27th Sept., on which day only two commissioners being present, the inquiry, after some evidence had been taken, was, with the concurrence of the absent commissioner, adjourned to the 19th Oct., the consent of a principal Secretary of State to this adjournment having previously been obtained; and at one of the meetings subsequent to that held on the 19th Oct., a person who was summoned as a witness, and refused to give evidence, was committed to custody for contempt; on a motion for his discharge on the ground that the jurisdiction of the commissioners had ceased from the day on which the inquiry had been adjourned by two only of their body:

Held, that the jurisdiction of the commissioners had not ceased by the adjournment on the 27th by two only of their body; the general power conferred on the commissioners of holding meetings "from time to time" enabling them to hold meetings on the 19th Oct. and subsequent days, even on the supposition that the proceedings which took place on the 27th Sept. were informal and invalid.

In this case a writ of habeas corpus was granted by Hayes, J. at chambers, returnable in this court on the 2nd day of term, directed to the keeper of the gaol at York, commanding him to produce the body of Charles Edward Fitzgerald, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, &c.

From the return of the gaoler it appeared that the prisoner, Charles Edward Fitzgerald, was imprisoned in York Gaol under the following warrant, under the hands and seals of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at elections for the borough of Beverley.

East Riding of Yorkshire, to wit.

To the superintendent and all other constables of the division of North Hunsley, in the said East Riding, and to the keeper of the castle at York.

At the sittings of the commissioners appointed under the statute of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at the last election for the borough of Beverley, and also at previous elections holden at the Sessions House at Beverley, in the said East Riding of the said county of York, on the 21st Oct. 1869, before Michael O'Brien, serjeant-at-law, Thomas Irwin Barstow, barrister-at-law, and Homersham Cox, barrister-at-law, the commissioners appointed for the purpose aforesaid, by warrant under Her Majesty's sign manual, dated the 23rd June 1869, Charles Edward Fitzgerald, a witness, having been summoned in pursuance of the said Act, and having appeared before the said commissioners, and being required by them to be sworn, or to make affirmation, as a witness in that behalf, refused so to do without offering any just excuse for such refusal, and the said commissioners having adjudged, the said Charles Edward Fitzgerald was bound by law to be sworn or to make affirmation, and having required him to do so, he wilfully and in contempt of the said commissioners and of their office, refused to be sworn or to affirm; and he having wilfully persisted and still persisting in such his refusal, the said commissioners do hereby adjudge that the said Charles Edward Fitzgerald by such his refusal has been and is guilty of contempt of the said commissioners and of their office, and the said commissioners do hereby order and adjudge that the said Charles Edward Fitzgerald be for such his contempt committed, and he is hereby committed to the keeper of Her Majesty's gaol of the castle of York, in and for the said county, to be there detained and kept in safe custody for the term of two calendar months from the day and year first above mentioned.

These, therefore, are to command you, the said constable, to take the said Charles Edward Fitzgerald, and him safely convey to the aforesaid castle of York, and there deliver him to the said keeper thereof, with this our precept, and we the said Michael O'Brien, serjeant-at-law, and Thomas Irwin Barstow, barrister-at-law, and Homersham Cox, barrister-at-law, commissioners aforesaid, do hereby command you, the said keeper of the said castle of York, to receive the said Charles Edward Fitzgerald into your custody in the said castle, and there imprison him for such his contempt for the said term of two calendar months, unless he shall in the mean time consent to be sworn or make affirmations concerning the premises, or otherwise be delivered by due course of law; and for your so doing this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under our hands and seals on the 21st Oct. 1869, at the sessions house aforesaid, in the county aforesaid.

(Signed) MICHAEL O'BRIEN, S. L. (Seal.)
THOS. I. BARSTOW. (Seal.)
HOMERSHAM COX. (Seal.)

From the affidavits used on the motion to discharge the prisoner, it appeared that by a joint address of both Houses of Parliament, it was represented to Her Majesty that Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, had reported to the House of Commons that corrupt practices did prevail, and that there was reason, upon the evidence before them, to believe that they did extensively prevail at the last election for the borough of Beverley, and that both Houses of Parliament had prayed Her Majesty to cause inquiry to be made pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, by the appointment of Michael O'Brien, Serjeant-at-Law, Thomas Irwin Barstow, Esq., barrister-at-law, and Homersham Cox, Esq., barrister-at-law, as commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices; and that Her Majesty did appoint the aforesaid three gentlemen as commissioners "for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices in the said joint address referred to."

The commissioners held their first meeting for the purposes of the inquiry in the town hall at Beverley, on the 24th Aug. 1869, and various meetings were subsequently held. On the 18th Sept. 1869, application to the Home Secretary was made by letter by the secretary to the commissioners for permission to adjourn the inquiry from the following 27th Sept. to Tuesday the 19th Oct.; and the approval of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the adjournment from the 27th Sept. to the 19th Oct., was made known to the commissioners by letter dated the 23rd Sept.

On the 25th Sept. the three commissioners adjourned the meeting to the 27th Sept. On the 27th Sept. only two of the commissioners being present, some evidence was taken, and the meeting was then adjourned to Tuesday the 19th Oct. The three commissioners sat on the 19th Oct., and adjourned to the 20th. The three commissioners again sat on the 20th, and adjourned to the 21st. On the 21st Charles Edward Fitzgerald, having been summoned as a witness, refused to be sworn, on the ground that the commissioners, owing to the informal adjournment by two only of their body on the 27th Sept., had ceased to have any further jurisdiction. For his contempt in refusing to be sworn, Fitzgerald was committed to prison.

Sect. 1 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, enacts that:

Where by a joint address of both Houses of Parliament it shall be represented to Her Majesty that a committee of the House of Commons appointed to try an election petition, or a committee of that House appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices in any election or elections of a member or members to serve in Parliament, have reported to the House that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed in any county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place in the United Kingdom electing, or sharing in the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament at any election or elections of such member or members, and the said Houses shall thereupon pray Her Majesty to cause an inquiry to be made under this Act by persons named in such address, such persons being (where the inquiry to be made relates to a place in England or Ireland) barristers-at-law of not less than seven years' standing, and not being members of Parliament, or holding any office or place of profit under the Crown other than that of a recorder of any city or borough, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by warrant under her royal sign manual, to appoint the said persons to be commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices; and in case any of the commissioners so appointed die, resign, or become incapable to act, it shall be lawful for the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner to act in such inquiry, as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners or a sole commissioner for the purposes of such inquiry, and (as to such sole commissioner) as if this Act had authorised the appointment of a sole commissioner; and all the provisions of this Act concerning the commissioners appointed to make any such inquiry shall be taken to apply to such surviving or continuing commissioner or commissioners.

Sect. 2 provides for the commissioners being sworn; sect. 3 for the appointment of a secretary and clerks.

Sect. 4 enacts that—

The commissioners appointed under this Act to make inquiry as aforesaid in relation to any county, division of a county, city, borough, university or place, shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards, go to such county, division of a county, city, borough, university or place, and shall from time to time hold meetings for the purposes of such inquiry at some convenient place within the same, or within ten miles thereof, and shall have power to adjourn such meeting from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county, division of a county, city, borough, university or place, or within ten miles thereof as to them may seem expedient; and such commissioners shall give notice of their appointment, and of the time and place of holding their first meeting, by publishing the same in some newspaper in general circulation in such county, division of a county, city, borough, university or place, or the neighbourhood thereof; provided always that such commissioners shall not adjourn the inquiry for any period exceeding one week, without the consent and application of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State.

Sect. 5:

Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, with such consent and approbation as aforesaid, to hold meetings of the said commissioners in the cities of London or Westminster, and to adjourn the same from time or time as they may deem fit.

Sect. 8 enacts that—

It shall be lawful for such commissioners, by a summons under their hands and seals, or under the hand and seal of any one of them, to require the attendance before them, at a place and time to be mentioned in the summons, which time shall be a reasonable time from the date of such summons, of any person whomsoever whose evidence, in the judgment of such commissioners or commissioner, may be material to the subject-matter of the inquiry to be made by such commissioners, and to require all persons to bring before them such books, papers, deeds, and writings, as to such commissioners or commissioner appear necessary for arriving at the truth of the things to be inquired into by them under this Act; all which persons shall attend such commissioners, and shall answer all questions put to them by such commissioners touching the matters to be inquired into by them, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds, and writings required of them, and in their custody and under their control, according to the tenor of the summons; provided always, that no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by such commissioners shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal.

Sect. 12 provides that

If any person on whom any summons shall have been served, by the delivery thereof to him or by the receiving thereof at his usual place of abode, fail to appear before the said commissioners at the time and place specified in such summons, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to certify such default under their hands and seals, or under the hand and seal of any one of them, to any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts in England or Ireland, or to the Court of Session in Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary on the bills in the said court, as the case may be; and thereupon such court or judge shall proceed against the person so failing to attend, in the same manner as if the said person had failed to obey any writ of subpœna or any process arising out of the said court; and if any person so summoned to attend as aforesaid, and having appeared before the said commisioners, shall refuse to be sworn, or to make answer to such questions as are put to him touching the matters in question by the said commissioners, or to produce and show to the said commissioners any papers, books, deeds, or writings, being in his possession or under his control, which the commissioners may deem necessary to be produced; or if any person shall be guilty of any contempt of the said commissioners or their office, the said commissioners shall have such and the same powers to be exercised in the same way as any judge of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of England or Ireland, or of the Court of Session in Scotland, sitting under any commission, may now by law exercise in that behalf; and all headboroughs, gaolers, constables, and bailiffs, shall and they are required to give their aid and assistance to the said commissioners in the execution of their office.

By sect. 15 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, the report of an election judge on the trial of an election petition under that Act, that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed in any county or borough at the election to which the petition relates is, for all the purposes of the Act 15 & 16 Vict.

c. 57, to have the same effect, and may be dealt with in the same manner as if it were a report of a committee of the House of Commons appointed to try an election petition, and the expenses of any commission of inquiry which may be issued in accordance with the provisions of the said Act, shall be defrayed as if they were expenses incurred in the registration of voters for such county or borough.

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C., Sleigh, Serjt., and Morgan Howard, in support of the motion to discharge the prisoner.—The commissioners, by holding a meeting on the 27th Sept., when only two of their body were present, and adjourning to the 19th Oct. extinguished their powers, and all subsequent proceedings were invalid; an adjournment could only be made by all the commissioners acting together. It is the object of the Act to ensure the inquiry being carried out as speedily as possible; and this would be frustrated by holding that the commissioners, having held one meeting, might postpone the holding of the next to whatever time they liked. Their powers are strictly circumscribed by the Act. They must, by sect. 4, "upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards," go to the place appointed for the inquiry, and hold meetings "at some convenient place within the same or within ten miles thereof." The words giving them power to adjourn—"and shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county, &c., as unto them may seem expedient"—show that a judicial discretion is to be exercised as to the time and place to which an adjournment is made; and they are disabled from adjourning the inquiry "for any period exceeding one week, without the consent and approbation of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretartes of State." [COCKBURN, C. J.—The question really is, whether the word "adjourn" in this section means a formal adjournment, or whether we are not, looking at the whole context, to construe it in its popular sense.] It is submitted that it was intended to mean a formal adjournment. Formal notice of holding the first meeting must be given in a newspaper; why is not such a notice required as to subsequent meetings? Because such subsequent meetings can only be held by formal adjournment from previous meetings; the formal adjournment answers the purposes of a public notice, and that formal Act must be done by the entire body. [LUSH, J.—Suppose the word were not "adjourn," but "postpone," would the argument be the same.] The word used is "adjourn," a word of well-known and definite signification, and common in Acts of Parliament. In the case of the Borough of Lisburn, Wolf. & Brist. Elect. Cas. 234, the sitting of the committee of the House of Commons was suspended during an adjournment of the House, by the sudden indisposition of one of its members, and the committee in consequence adjourned till the day after the day appointed for the meeting of the House, and having met on that day, they held, after an argument on the subject, that they were not competent to continue the inquiry, as sect. 73 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 98, enacted that every select committee should "sit from day to day, Sunday, Christmas Day, and Good Friday, only excepted, and shall never adjourn for a longer time than twenty-four hours, unless a Sunday, Christmas Day, or Good Friday intervene, and in such case not for more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of such Sunday, Christmas Day, or Good Friday, without leave first obtained from the House, upon motion and special cause assigned for a longer adjournment." [MELLOR, J.—In that case strong negative words are contained in the same section which gives the committee power to sit. COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose one of the commissioners had been incapable of acting on a particular day of meeting, could not the other two adjourn the meeting?] The 1st section of the Act provides for such a case, enacting that "in case any of the commissioners so appointed die, resign, or become incapable to act, it shall be lawful for the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner to act in such inquiry as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners or a sole commissioner for the purposes of such inquiry, and (as to such sole commissioner) as if this Act had authorised the appointment of a sole commissioner," &c. [COCKBURN, C. J.—That section contemplates the case of a commissioner being rendered permanently incapable; but suppose another case not of that character, a temporary indisposition of one of the commissioners, would an adjournment made in his absence vitiate the whole proceedings?] It is submitted that it would; everything to be done by the commissioners is to be done by the whole of them unless the Act of Parliament makes special exceptions; and special sections, the 8th and 11th, provide for what one commissioner may do; he may sign and seal a summons to a witness, and he may administer an oath or affirmation; but no such power is given to a single commissioner in the case of adjournment. Adjournment is a formal act, and to be decided on by the commissioners in the exercise of a judicial discretion. In the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) it was thought necessary to give express power to adjourn quarter sessions in the absence of the recorder and deputy-recorder: (See sect. 106.) In Reg. v. The Coroner of Dover, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 488, where a coroner holding an inquisition adjourned the court to a certain day, but the court was not held on that day, it was held that the proceedings could not be resumed, Shee, J. observing, "The forms of adjournment are requisite to secure the re-attendance of the jurors after an adjournment, at the time and place appointed, and to preserve the continuity of the proceedings from the first meeting of the inquest until its completion by the signing of the inquisition. If the coroner had taken the trouble, as it was his duty to do, of holding the court on the 8th Aug., and had then again adjourned the inquest to a day certain, all would have been right; but not having done so, the final and important proceeding of adopting and signing the inquisition did not take place under the original precept, and was coram non judice." Nor can one of the commissioners act as the agent of another for the purpose of adjourning; if otherwise, they might send down any person to give notice of adjournment, without any of their own body being present, whereas the words "as to them may seem expedient" point to an exercise of the discretion of the whole body, with reference to the circumstances of time and place. [COCKBURN, C. J.—So that if any mere accident, or vis major should prevent one of the commissioners from being present, and an adjournment takes place without him, the whole thing comes to an end.] Such is the case with regard to quarter sessions, and the same reason exists in the present case as with reference to them. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But the justices at quarter sessions have not power given them, as the commissioners have, to hold "meetings" and to adjourn them "from time to time." In the case of quarter sessions it is but one meeting. We must give the Act of Parliament a reasonable construction, and not be subtle to give it a construction which would render the whole proceedings of the commissioners informal owing to a mere accident.] As to quarter sessions, the law is thus stated in 5 Burn's Justice of the Peace (29th edit.), 947, "the sessions cannot be held without the presence of two justices: (1 Bla. Com. 354 n.) And so strict is this law, that if there be not enough justices to hold a sessions, they cannot adjourn it to hold same legally." So Archbold's Quarter Sessions (edit. 1869), p. 38, "If the sessions last more than one day, they must be adjourned to another, and so on until the business is finished; if there be no adjournment, the sessions are at an end, and the justices cannot afterwards legally proceed with the business." "If there are not justices enough to hold a sessions, there are not enough to adjourn it legally, and every act done after such an adjournment is void:" (R. v. Westrington, 2 Bott. 733). Where an appeal was made to the quarter sessions at Suffolk, held on the 7th April 1746, and the sessions were adjourned to 9th April at Woodbridge, where for want of a sufficient number of justices nothing was done, and another sessions was held on the 11th April, and adjourned to the 14th, when the appeal was allowed, the order of sessions was quashed, "for the words in 2 Hen. 5, c. 4, 'and more often if need be,' were never considered as giving more than one original sessions in a quarter, but only empowering adjournments: (R. v. Polstead, 2 Strange, 1263") R. v. The Justices of Middlesex, 5 B. & Ad. 1113, was also referred to, and 6 Car. & Payne, 90, where a special commission was issued to try over again certain prisoners who had been tried at a sessions which had been adjourned from a former sessions by the crier of the court whilst none of the justices were present. Even in the case of directors of a railway company, it has been held that in exercising the powers conferred on them by the Companies Clauses Act 1845, they must act together and as a board; and where the prescribed quorum of directors being three, the secretary affixed the seal of the company to a bond, after having obtained the written authority of two directors at a private interview, and at another private interview the verbal promise of a third to sign the authority, it was held that the seal of the company was affixed without lawful authority, and that the company were not liable on the bond: (D'Arcy v. The Tamar, &c. Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 158; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 626.) The argument is à fortiori from this, that no such formal Act as adjournment can be done by any less number of commissioners than three. Is there anything here to show that the adjournment by the two commissioners was with the concurrence of the third commissisioner? [The Attorney-General produced the affidavits of Mr. Homersham Cox, and Mr. Secker, the secretary to the commissioners, from which it appeared that it had been arranged with Mr. Barstow, on the 25th Sept., that there should be an adjournment, and a further adjournment on the 27th Sept. The affidavit of the secretary would also show that the consent of the Secretary of State had been obtained to the adjournment of the 19th Oct.] The letter of the secretary of the commisioners to the Secretary of State ought to be produced, in order that the reasons for the adjournment may be seen. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The Act of Parliament only makes it necessary that the consent of the Secretary of State should be given; it says nothing as to the ground on which he may give it. All we have to see is that his consent has been obtained.] The consent of the Secretary of State is to an adjournment from the 27th Sept. to the 19th Oct., and not to an adjournment from the 25th Sept., the day when the last legal meeting of the commissioners was held. The tribunal of the commissioners is a new one, inquisitorial in its nature, with great powers, and, consequently, the authority of the commissioners, when the liberty of the subject is involved, should not in any way be extended beyond the limits expressly assigned by the Act of Parliament. [MELLOR, J.—On the construction contended for, what force can be given to the words "from time to time"?] Words which are merely surplusage are frequently found in Acts of Parliament; and it is one of the first principles of law that where a new power like this is given, it is to be strictly confined within the limits prescribed. [MELLOR, J., observed that there was nothing in the Act to make the proceedings an open court, and the contempt was the contempt of the commissioners, and not of the court.]

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier) and Archibald, contra.—The argument on the other side is founded upon a misconception of the functions of the commissioners, and on the false analogy of quarter sessions and other such courts. The commissioners do not constitute a court for the purpose of exercising judicial functions; they are appointed simply for the purpose of instituting inquiries; and they have got power to adjourn their meetings "from time to time." The general power of adjournment which is implied in the power to hold "meetings," and in the words "from time to time," cannot be restricted by any power to adjourn subsequently given; if this is to have any force it must be taken to give an additional power, not to cut down the general power already given. The court of quarter sessions is considered as held on one day, and a formal adjournment is necessary to keep alive its jurisdiction; but the commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at elections do not in any way exercise judicial functions. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The inquiry is, however, analogous to a judicial inquiry, seeing it is an inquiry into the propriety of disfranchising a particular borough or county.] But in the main it is an inquisitorial and not a judicial commission. In Reg. v. Leverson, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 485 it was held, with reference to the Central Criminal Court, that it was not necessary for the same judges to be present on each day of the trial of a particular prisoner. If a formal adjournment of the meetings held at Beverley was necessary, a formal adjournment of the meetings which sect. 5 enables the commissioners to hold in London, would also be necessary, as power "to adjourn the same from time to time as they may deem fit" is also given to them by that section; yet it would be absurd to hold that a formal adjournment is requisite where the commissioners meet in London to settle amongst themselves the report which they are to make. The case of the Borough of Lisburn, referred to, is quite distinguishable from the present case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—We think you need not discuss that case, as we are of opinion that it does not apply to the present case. If the commissioners in the present case had adjourned for more than a week without the consent of the Secretary of State, there might be some analogy between the two cases.] It is not necessary that all the commissioners should assent to every act done. In Grindley v. Barker, 1 Bos. & Pul. 229, it was laid down that if a power of a public nature be committed to several, who are met for the purpose of executing it, the act of the majority will bind the minority; and it was held that a condemnation by four out of the six triers of leather appointed under 1 Jac. 1, c. 22 (the whole number being met for the purpose of trying) must be considered as the condemnation of all six. There is nothing in the Act to prevent the commissioners separately instituting inquiries in different places.

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C. in reply.—The decision in Reg. v. Leverson, does not apply to the present case, an ancient usage being there prayed in aid of the interpretation of a peculiar Act of Parliament No authority has been adduced to show that adjournment is not a material proceeding; and that the functions of the commissioners are not merely inquisitorial, but to a considerable extent judicial, is shown by sect. 6 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, which enacts that they "shall report, with respect to such election, the names of all persons whom they find to have been guilty of corrupt practices at such election, and as well of those who have given bribes for the purchase or for the purpose of purchasing the votes of others as of those who have themselves received money or any other valuable consideration for having given, or having refrained from giving, or for the purpose of inducing them to give or to refrain from giving their votes at such election, and also the names of all persons whom they find to have given to others, or to have received themselves, payments by way of head money, or as a reward for giving or refraining from giving their votes at such election."

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the return is a good return, and that the application to discharge the prisoner from custody must be refused. The prisoner has been, according to the return, committed for contempt of the commissioners at a meeting held on the 21st Oct. of this year, and the question which we have to decide is, whether this was a good and valid meeting, or whether the powers of the commissioners were at that time extinguished by what had previously taken place? Now it is admitted that the meeting of the 25th Sept., held by the commissioners, was a valid and legal meeting. It is a fact before us upon the affidavits, that upon the 25th, or before the 25th of Sept., the three commissioners had concurred in an application to the Secretary of State, as required by Act of Parliament, for the purpose of enabling them to adjourn the next meeting, which was to take place on the 27th Sept., until the 19th Oct. They having made that application, the application was acceded to by the Secretary of State, and then, although upon the 27th Sept. two commissioners only were present, it is upon this state of facts clear that the three commissioners concurred in an adjournment from the 27th Sept. until the 19th Oct. It is said that the whole proceeding of the meeting of the 27th Sept., and the meetings which followed were illegal and void. I, for my own part, think it unnecessary to decide the question, though I am very far indeed, as at present advised, from concurring in the suggestion of the Attorney-General, that it is competent to the commissioners under the Act of Parliament to exercise (except in case of incapacity as pointed out by the Act of Parliament) in any other number than the full number of commissioners, the powers vested in them. It is quite unnecessary to decide that question. I may assume for the present purpose that the proceedings at the meeting of the 27th Sept. were void, in consequence of the absence, otherwise than from incapacity, of one of the commissioners. I will assume with Sir John Karslake that the adjournment to the 19th Oct.—inasmuch as if an adjournment is required by the 4th section of the Act the adjournment must be the act of the court, and the court must consist of the full number of the commissioners, and it did not consist of that number of commissioners upon that day—I will assume, therefore, for the purpose of my judgment, that the adjournment was invalid. If it was necessary in my view of this case to decide whether an act of adjournment, in which the three commissioners concurred might not be performed by two, I should most undoubtedly require a good deal more than I have heard to satisfy me that such an act done by two commissioners would not be valid. I do not think it necessary, however, to rest my decision upon that ground; I place my judgment upon the broad proposition that an adjournment was not necessary, and I say so with reference to the particular language and provisions of this Act of Parliament. We are not dealing with a court of justice; we are not dealing with any powers to be exercised upon a specified and particular day, in which case, therefore, an adjournment is necessary if the powers are to be exercised beyond the day upon which they are appointed to be exercised. No doubt as regards courts of justice where the judicial duty is to be performed upon a fixed and given day, although there is a power of prolonging the judicial functions in a judicial inquiry from the particular day to the next day or the day following, that or so long as is necessary for the purposes of the court, that power of adjournment must be exercised accordingly to certain well-known and established forms; and if we were dealing with such a court there could be no doubt if the adjournment had not been made according to those well-established and legal forms, then the judicial functions of the court would be gone. Sir John Karslake produced abundant authority to that effect. If this were the case of a court of justice, and assuming that what was done here by the two commissioners can only be done by three, those authorities would be sufficient to show that the adjournment which took place was not a valid adjournment, and, therefore, that the court had ceased to exist. But in this case we are not bound to consider that, because the tribunal here is of another character, the adjournment here was an adjournment by commissioners not constituting a court of justice, but exercising their functions under the particular terms of an Act of Parliament; and I can only look to the terms of that Act of Parliament to see in what way these functions are to be exercised, and what are the limitations to the powers of exercising those functions. Those commissioners are authorised and empowered to hold meetings from time to time. It is not one meeting on a fixed and particular day which requires an adjournment in order to enable the persons intrusted with the powers to exercise them; but they are to hold meetings from time to time, and I apprehend if nothing further had been said about adjournment, it would be too clear to admit of argument to the contrary that they might have held a meeting to-day, passed over to-morrow, and held a meeting on the third day, and so on without any adjournment at all; and they might have done that which propriety and common justice would have suggested and prescribed, not as a matter of legal obligation but as a matter of moral right. But the difficulty is, there has been introduced after the power of holding meetings from time to time the power of adjournment. In my opinion the introduction of the power of adjournment was merely superfluous and unnecessary, and the power was involved by implication in that of holding meetings from time to time. It seems to have got in in this way, that whereas in the ordinary course such an inquiry is held, and it was the intention of the Legislature that it should be held, at the particular place where the matter arose, there may be exceptional cases, and therefore the provision is introduced giving the commissioners power to hold the inquiry at the particular borough or place which is the subject-matter of inquiry; or they may, if necessary, adjourn it from one place to another within a limited and prescribed distance. But because there has been introduced such a provision it does not, as I have already said, cut down the power of holding meetings for the inquiry from time to time as expediency and convenience may suggest. Then comes the further provision, which seems to meet all the objections which Sir John Karslake suggests as liable to arise from an unlimited power of holding meetings without any limitation whatever as to time; and that provision is to this effect: though you may hold meetings from time to time, yet you shall not allow any interval between the one time and the other to elapse beyond a certain specified period, unless you get the sanction of the Secretary of State. You must give notice of your first meeting, of the time and the place at which you are about to hold it, and you may hold meetings from time to time, says the Legislature. We give you credit for thinking that you will not commit such a gross outrage upon all propriety in such a matter as to deceive and mislead the persons interested in the inquiry as to the time and place at which you will hold it, and the only limitation we put in the Act of Parliament is that you shall not allow a greater interval than one week to elapse, except by the authority of the Secretary of State, and that is put in as a protection against undue delay, and keeping the inquiry hanging over the heads of the persons interested in the result beyond a certain reasonable time. That, it seems to me, is the true construction of the Act of Parliament, and, therefore, though it should turn out that Sir John Karslake's argument is well founded when he says that the proceedings of the 27th were irregular, contrary to the powers of the statute, and in consequence void, and that whatever happened on that day must be considered as invalid; yet, as the meeting was held within the time to which the Secretary of State had given his official and formal assent, it was competent to the commissioners (even if they had hesitated upon the assumption that their former adjournment was void and illegal) to start afresh and hold their meeting on the 19th Oct., to which day they had adjourned. If, in consequence of an invalid adjournment or in consequence of a sufficient notice not having been given of the holding of the meetings which followed the 19th Oct., at one of which this contempt was committed, the witness whose presence had been required, had been deceived as to the time or place of holding the meeting, that would have been a strong reason why a valid contempt should not be held to have been committed, and why therefore the commissioners ought not to have proceeded to have committed the witness to prison. But the simple question is, whether the meeting of the 19th Oct., and the meetings which followed it by regular adjournments, and the validity of which therefore depend upon the validity of the meeting of the 19th Oct., were valid. In my opinion they were, and inasmuch as it was at one of those meetings that the contempt was committed by this prisoner, and inasmuch as it was within the competence of the commissioners to commit for contempt so committed, I think that the prisoner before us should be remitted to custody.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I cannot imagine a case more calling for the exercise of the powers of the commissioners; for the conduct of the prisoner appears to have been pursued without any scruple of any kind. He refused to be examined; he did so contumaciously most undoubtedly; and having been guilty of that sort of contumacious conduct, and having refused to give evidence, the commissioners committed him for that contempt. Now, whether or not they had the power of doing that, depends upon the construction of the Act of Parliament, and I think, when we construe an Act which creates a new state of circumstances for special purposes, we cannot try the case by analogy to regular courts of justice, but we must look at the powers committed to the commissioners. Now, if we look at the beginning of the 1st section, it says, that Her Majesty is empowered to appoint persons of certain standing as commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry as to the existence of corrupt practices. That is the object of the appointment, and that is the scope of the inquiry. In the 4th section it says this: "The commissioners appointed under this Act to make inquiry as aforesaid in relation to any county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards, go to such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, and shall from time to time hold meetings." They are to hold meetings in the place indicated by the section, that is to say, at some convenient place within the borough, or within ten miles thereof. Suppose the section had stopped there, it is perfectly clear that the most complete authority is given to the said commissioners to hold meetings from time to time. If it had stopped there, there could be no doubt about it. The words that follow are not intended to restrain their power; they are intended to enlarge it rather than to restrain it. They are quite unnecessary, as it appears to me, but it is quite clear that it was not intended by them to restrain the power previously given to the commissioners to hold meetings from time to time. The section goes on thus: "And shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, or within ten miles thereof, as to them may seem expedient." The word "adjourn" must be construed with reference to the context, and with reference to the object of the inquiry. That which in certain Acts of Parliament might require a technical interpretation, in reference to cases where adjournments are well understood, as, for instance, cases of courts of justice, does not apply to inquiries of this nature. Inquiries of the present kind cannot be carried on without holding meetings from time to time, and I think when the power of holding these meetings is given the word "adjourn" is used only in its popular sense, as when it is said, "We will adjourn the discussion to a future day." Judging from the context, it appears to me that it means merely a postponement, and that it has not the technical meaning sought to be given to it. The only restriction to the power given to the commissioners that I can find is this: "Provided always that such commissioners shall not adjourn the inquiry for any period exceeding one week without the consent and approbation of one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State;" that is to say, the inquiry shall not hang over the borough for an indefinite period, but if the commissioners want to adjourn the inquiry for a longer period than a week, they must get the consent of the Secretary of State. Construing the word "adjourn" in its popular sense, it seems to me that there was no necessity for any formal adjournment of the proceedings. It is immaterial, therefore, to inquire whether on the 27th Sept. the act done by the commissioners was a valid act or not; and I abstain from going into any further definition, or any other expression of opinion as to the powers of the commissioners. I am, however, inclined to think, as at present advised, that when the object of the inquiry is carried into effect by the examination of witnesses, the two commissioners may with propriety have done what they did. The question may arise on some occasion hereafter as to the powers of the commissioners, and whether they have the larger authority contended for by the Attorney-General. There is certainly strong colour given to that contention by the 6th section of the Act. It says, "such commissioners shall, by all such lawful means as to them appear best with a view to a discovery of the truth, inquire into the manner in which the election in relation to which such committee as aforesaid may have reported to the House of Commons, &c. has been conducted." This seems to give a considerable discretion to the commissioners as to the mode in which they will conduct the inquiry; but whether it is sufficient to enable them to act as contended for by the Attorney General, I do not express an opinion, because it is unnecessary to do so. I am perfectly satisfied to rest my decision upon the grounds already stated by the Lord Chief Justice, in which I entirely agree. I think, therefore, that the prisoner must be remitted to custody.

LUSH, J.—I am quite of the same opinion. It is clear that the postponement from the 27th Sept. to the 19th Oct. was the joint act of all the commissioners, and that that act was sanctioned by the Secretary of State. I therefore do not think it necessary to express an opinion whether, if that had been the act of two only, the commission would or would not have expired. The question does not arise, and the argument is therefore reduced to one of a purely technical character founded upon the language of the section. Numerous cases have been cited with reference to courts of quarter sessions and other courts of justice, to which the technical meaning of the word "adjourn" has been held to apply. I am of opinion that there is no analogy between the two cases; that the word "adjourn" is not here used in its technical sense, as when it is applied to proceedings of courts of justice, where the authority is to hold a meeting on a given day. But where the law implies an authority to create, as it were, a special extension of that period, when it is needful for the purpose of completing the business for which the meeting is held—in such a case the whole period is regarded as one day, and the meetings or sittings as one meeting. If in such a case the day has been suffered to expire without adjournment, then nothing has been done to keep alive the functions of the body; and its authority necessarily expires. But here there is no need and no reason, as it seems to me, for the application of the technical sense of the word "adjourn" to the words of this statute. The statute says the commissioners shall go to the place in relation to which they are to make inquiry, "and shall from time to time hold meetings for the purposes of such inquiry." If the clause had ended there, how could it be contended that the commission would have expired if at the end of the first day the commissioners had concluded the meeting, and had said nothing about meeting the next day? Their power to sit is created by the Act, and the Act says they are to hold meetings "from time to time." It is not the case of a court such as in the cases referred to, where the authority is kept alive by an act of the court. Here the authority is given by the words of the statute, and it is continued in existence until the inquiry is brought to a termination. If the clause had ended there, I apprehend there could not be any question raised. Then comes the express power to adjourn, and it is upon these words that the argument has turned: "And shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, or within ten miles thereof, as to them may seem expedient." It must be contended, in order to support the argument raised, that the express power to adjourn as given there must be read as a limitation on the power under the former part of the clause, and making, as it were, the continuance of their powers conditional upon the formality of the adjournment. It seems to me that to hold that would be to defeat the object of the statute; and that to hold that, because the meeting was not adjourned in a formal way, no further proceedings were to be taken, would be something which the Act did not contemplate. The object of the enactment was to give power to the commissioners to move from one place to another, which probably they would not have had under the previous clause. Probably it was meant to express this: You shall not be bound to go on from day to day, but you shall have power to postpone the inquiry over any given number of days, with a proviso—You shall not adjourn over any period exceeding one week, without the consent of the Secretary of State. The plain meaning of the whole appears to me to be this—You shall go on from time to time holding meetings; you shall not be bound to hold them de die in diem; you may adjourn as you find it expedient; you may adjourn from one place to another, as you find it expedient; provided you do not postpone the inquiry for more than a week without the consent of the Secretary of State. That appears to me to give sense and meaning to the whole of the enactment, and to leave no room for the technical argument turning upon the meaning of the word "adjourn," which is applied to a different state of things altogether. I agree, therefore, with the rest of the court in thinking that the commissioners had power to issue their warrant, and that the prisoner must be remitted to custody.

HANNEN, J.—The argument of Sir John Karslake amounts, in point of fact, to this: that the commissioners, in the exercise of their functions, are bound to adjourn in the strict technical sense of that word. I think, however, upon consideration of the section, it is clear that the word "adjourn" was used in its generally received sense, as meaning postponing or suspending. I am led to the conclusion that the Act does not merely authorise the commissioners to meet and adjourn, or to hold a meeting to be adjourned from time to time, but to hold meetings. This also appears to me to point to the possibility of one meeting being had on one occasion, and another being had afterwards, but that always subject to the proviso of the 4th section, that the inquiry, whether held at several meetings or at several stages of one meeting, shall not be adjourned for more than a week without the authority of the Secretary of State. But, whatever meaning you put on the word "adjourn," I think an adjournment must be the act of all the commissioners. I do not think it need be done in any formal manner. I think all that is requisite is that the three commissioners shall agree in the doing of it. For instance, they might agree to sit for six consecutive days, and it would not be necessary to adjourn the inquiry at the end of each day. Here the three commissioners have agreed to sit on the 27th Sept. and on the 19th Oct. It seems they did not sit on the 27th Sept. because all were not present on that day, but they did sit on the 19th Oct. as agreed upon between them all; and as that was done with the consent of the Secretary of State, it was rendered as valid as if it had taken place within the period of a week. For these reasons I concur with the rest of the members of the court.

The prisoner was accordingly remitted to custody.

KENT (app.) v. ASHLEY (resp.)

Factory Acts—"Factory"—"Manufacturing process."

An open quarry in which slate is obtained and shaped so as to be saleable, is not a "factory" within the meaning of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 103, s. 3, sub-section 7. Nor is such work so performed upon the slate a "manufacturing process" within such statute.

Case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 by three of seven justices for the county of Carnarvon, who adjudicated upon the hearing of the summonses hereafter mentioned, one of such seven justices having died since the adjudication.

The following is a copy of the case as stated on the application of the appellant, the three justices who signed the case having declined to adopt certain alterations therein which the respondent's solicitors were advised should be introduced in order that all the points which were raised at the hearing of the summonses should be fully before the Court of Queen's Bench.

At a petty sessions, holden at the county hall in Carnarvon, in the said county, on the 26th Sept. 1868, two summonses which had been issued by Samuel Saville Kent, sub-inspector of factories (hereinafter called the appellant), against John Newdigate Francis Astley, of the parishes of Llanberis and Llanddeiniolen, in the said county, slate and flag quarry proprietor (hereinafter called the respondent), were heard before us.

The first complaint was against the respondent for that he the said respondent then and there being the occupier of a certain factory within the said parishes and county, the same being a factory within the true intent and meaning of the Factory Acts, in such factory as aforesaid in, on, and within the precincts of which said factory fifty and more persons were employed in a certain manufacturing process, namely, in altering, repairing, ornamenting, finishing, and otherwise adapting slates and flags for sale, did unlawfully employ, keep, and allow to remain in the said factory a young person requiring a surgical certificate of age, named Richard Griffith Davies, without the certificate of age required by the said Acts, whereby the said respondent had forfeited for the said offence a penalty of not less than 2*l.*, nor more than 5*l.*

The second charge against the respondent was, for that he the said respondent, then and there being &c., &c., did unlawfully employ, keep, and allow to remain in the said factory a young person requiring a surgical certificate, named Richard Griffith Davies, without having duly registered the name of the said young person, and the date of his first employment, or re-employment, in the form and according to the directions given in the schedule B to the Act 7 Vict. c. 15, whereby the said respondent had forfeited for the said offence a penalty of not less than 2*l.*, nor more than 5*l.* This slate quarry is a large open place, extending over about 400 acres, in which there are also covered sheds or huts where the splitters work, over which hundreds of men and very young boys are employed in getting large blocks of slate, which blocks or raw material are drawn when got to other parts of the same quarry, and split with hammers and chisels used as wedges in laminæ or slates. These laminæ or slates are then edged square with an iron knife by hand into separate slates or articles, and divided into quantities for sale. They are sent away in thousands from the quarries to the markets. These slates are also sold by retail, either separately or in quantity, by the buyers of them. In these quarries also tombstones, gate posts, chimney pieces, tanks, and slabs of every size are made out of these blocks of slate, and ornamented when need be according to order.

The evidence on the part of the appellant consisted of his own testimony, and that of Dr. Maughan, the examining surgeon, and Owen Parry, the agent of the respondent's quarry, a copy of which is now given.

William Maughan:

I am a surgeon in Carnarvon, appointed by inspector of factories to certify ages of children employed in factories. I have been to Dinmore quarries; last time on July 23. I found a young person named Richard Griffith Davies. I have acted under that appointment. I had not certified Davies's age. I did not see any register there. Davies was employed in the shaping of slates. He was using his hands; he had an instrument which was used for preparing the slates for sale, to cleave and cut the sides. I had a conversation with the boy.

Cross-examined:

I was there July 23. I was in the quarry. He was working in a small shed on an open bank. The quarries embrace a large quantity of land; quarries extend to the mountain by working; there is a levelling there; it is difficult at times to pass from one part of the quarry to the others. My surgery is between seven and eight miles from the quarry. Davies appears to be a healthy boy.

Re-examined:

I found Davies in the shed; other boys in the shed. About 2000 or more working in the quarry; admitted that more than fifty are employed.

Samuel Savile Kent:

I am sub-inspector of factories for this district. I produce my appointment. I have inspected the Dinmore quarry. I have seen young persons there. I was there on the 23rd July. I saw Davies employed in the quarry, in one of the sheds, adapting the slate for sale. The shed was in the precincts of the quarry. Davies had an implement in his hand. He was not registered.

Cross-examined:

There are quarries in my neighbourhood, near Llangollen, where the Factories Acts have been carried out for about six months. About three hundred people there. Surgeon Davies Hughes is the surgeon at Llangollen. In Llangollen quarries flags are planed by machinery in an inclosed workshop, a part like a regular slated roofing.

Owen Parry:

I am agent at Dinmore Quarry. Slates and flags manufactured for sale at the quarry; and the process is, first of all, they are blasted out of the rock; then reduced into smaller blocks by pilloring and cross-cutting implements, being hammers and chisels, worked solely by the hand; then they are cleaned and dressed, all done by implements, a thin chisel and mallet for cross-cutting, a longer chisel and mallet for cleaving, afterwards dressed with a knife by hand. This operation in done in small huts about the quarry; they are ready then for the market. Flags for pavements and cisterns manufactured there. The paper put in my hands is the list of prices of slates of our quarry. We manufacture chimney pieces; chimney pieces finished by hand. The sawing is done by machinery; machinery worked by steam power. We have more than fifty persons employed in the quarry. Davies is fourteen years of age; has been employed in our quarry; he has not been certified by Dr. Maughan, and not registered.

Cross-examined:

Quarry is worked opencast. There is no boundary between quarry and mountains. There is no place that can be called an entrance into the quarry. The people enter the quarry through different scores of places. Seven persons are employed in making the chimney-pieces, thirty-three employed in any building within the quarry; the ages of the thirty-three would be about 20, there might be one 19. One of the places where the slabs are made is near a mile from the quarry, in the parish of Llanddeiniolen. There are fields between that place and the quarry. In summer, time for working in quarry six till six, in winter as long as it is light. We are not particular about boys coming punctually. Many boys come there to assist their fathers; they work for their fathers. There are many boys, sons of widows, at the request of their mothers.

Re-examined:

Where the flags are and the quarry is one trade establishment. The fields are in different occupations, but the same proprietors. A quarrier does now and then dress. The stone is brought in a rough state and taken in for dressing. There are more than fifty persons employed in making roofing slates, thirty-three in flags and chimney-pieces, several hundreds in working roofing slates.

These cases were heard and determined by us, and upon such hearing we decided to dismiss them, because we considered that in the quarries there was no possibility of such a thing as a clock being visible or capable of being heard by all persons employed in the quarry, which the Act appears to contemplate, and that scarcely any blame could be applied to quarries. The inside walls of the factories were to be limewashed, but that would be difficult and absurd as to a quarry; then the definition of a factory was not applicable to a quarry, being described as a place wherein machinery was used in manufacturing hemp, flax, and such like materials; and we could not bring ourselves to believe that the Legislature ever contemplated that quarries should be included under the Factory Acts. And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said summons, hath applied to us to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court.

Now, therefore, we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the foregoing case.

The question for the consideration of the court is, Is the quarry and premises before described within the operation of the Factory Acts? If the court should be of opinion that it is, then the case is to be remitted to us.

By the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 103, sect. 3, sub-section 7, it is enacted that for the purposes of the Act the word "Factory" shall mean, "Any premises whether adjoining or separate, in the same occupation, situate in the same city, town, parish, or place, and constituting one trade establishment in, on, or within the precincts of which fifty or more persons are employed in any manufacturing process," and by the same section "Manufacturing process" is to mean, "Any manual labour exercised by way of trade, or for the purposes of gain in, or incidental to, the making any article, or part of an article, or in or incidental to the altering, repairing, ornamenting, finishing, or otherwise adapting for sale any article."

The previous Factory Acts, with certain exceptions, are incorporated, and by the 7 Vict. c. 15, provisions are enacted for limewashing the inside of the walls, &c., of every factory, the providing of a public clock, open to public view to regulate the time of working at the said factory, and the production of surgical certificates.

The Solicitor-General (Archibald with him), appeared for the appellant, who was the sub-inspector of factories in the district. The policy of the Legislature lately, has been to bring within the operation of the Factory Acts a variety of establishments not originally contemplated, and so, many of the provisions in the earlier Acts do not apply to establishments subsequently erected. It is not necessary that the premises should be all together, since some portions of them might really be miles away: (Palmer's Shipbuilding Company v. Chaytor, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 209), parts of the factory may, indeed, be altogether separated from each other, if they constitute one trading establishment. [HANNEN, J.—But it must be a trade that is carried on. What would you say to a farm, or a coal-pit, or a brick-field?] A brick-field, I should say, would come within the definition of a factory. [COCKBURN, C. J.—There must be fifty persons. I do not find from the case that this number is engaged in any department of the business.] There is nothing in the Act to show that fifty persons are to be working in one place; it is enough if they are within the precincts. In a factory you may have fifty persons engaged in one process, and all the others be engaged in distinct processes. [HANNEN, J.—My difficulty is in seeing that this is a trade establishment. In Sutton v. Wheeley, 7 East, 442, it was held that a devisee of an estate, part of which was a brick-ground, making bricks there for sale generally with a view to profit, is not a trader within the bankrupt laws, though he purchased the coals and some of the wood used in burning the bricks, and had occupied the same ground as a brickmaker for general sale before the estate came to him by devise, for this is but a more beneficial mode of enjoying his own estate, by carrying the soil to market in an ameliorated state, and is not a buying of any commodity to sell it again.] That which might be a very good argument, with reference to a statute having one object in view, may not be such with reference to a statute having another object in view. The object of the Factory Acts is to protect people who cannot protect themselves. [MELLOR, J.—They are found, no doubt, to be very beneficial. HANNEN, J.—Yes; and they are in contemplation to be extended to agricultural labourers, but they are not extended to them yet. COCKBURN, C. J.—A man who grows hemp may have a rope walk, and in that case he would carry on a business quite independent of his agricultural pursuits, and that might be a factory.] Suppose a person buys the lump slate and takes it far away, and shapes it into an article of commerce, is not he a manufacturer? And, if so, why is he the less such because he carries on the business upon his own quarry?

Milward, Q. C. (with him Hance), for the respondent.—This is really nothing more than a quarry, and the slate is cleansed and shaped to render it saleable. These premises are not of the nature of a factory, and very few of the factory regulations could be applied to them. [COCKBURN, C. J.—No doubt when the original Factory Acts passed, the Legislature did not contemplate so wide an extension; but still by degrees various other classes of premises have been included.] None of the Factory Acts are at all applicable to such a case. The case is certainly not within the mischief of the Factory Acts, the workpeople work in the open air, and are not confined to working in a limited space as in an ordinary factory.

The Solicitor-General was heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.— I am of opinion that the decision of the justices ought not to be reversed. I believe that the process in this case was a manufacturing process, and I entirely agree that if the proprietor of the soil uses the produce as I illustrated in the case of a rope walk, that is, if he uses the produce by working it up for the purposes of commerce, otherwise than for the mere purpose of making it saleable, it would be considered as a manufacturing process within the Act. I think, however, that what takes place in the present case is merely a matter incidental to the working of the quarry. I take it, that the object in view is to convert the soil which is quarried into a shape that shall make it saleable, and I cannot think that that is what the Legislature intended by the words "manufacturing process." I look upon the sheds as mere accessories to the quarry, and used for quarry purposes, and I cannot imagine that the Legislature in these enactments had any intention to include them in the terms it has used. The Legislature has not yet declared that open processes are to be within the enactments. The Solicitor-General has admitted that in the first instance, when the legislation was commenced with reference to factories, the Legislature had in view the cases of persons shut up in buildings where the air might be impure, and where young children and girls would be subject to great restrictions. By degrees, no doubt, this legislation has been extended to purposes and to include pursuits not originally intended. But the legislature has not yet included open air processes, except in certain exceptional cases, in which special legislation has taken place; and although I agree that we ought not to be too astute in such cases as this, yet we ought not to outstrip the Legislature in applying remedies for suggested defects; and I may say that I cannot think that the ordinary purposes of quarrying were intended to be included in these enactments. When the Solicitor-General suggests that such a case as this is within the evil proper to be remedied, I answer that it may be so, but that certainly it is not within the evils originally contemplated. Here we have the processes carried on in the open air, and consequently the evil of working in a confined atmosphere does not arise, nor does the evil exist of the mingling of the sexes, or the collecting together of a great number of very young persons, and although they may not have the advantage of the provisions for education, this is no more than we find in other pursuits to which the Factory Acts do not apply. Although possibly it might be advantageous to include such a case as this in the Factory Acts, yet it must be for the Legislature to interfere when it thinks the proper time for so doing has arrived. At present, looking to the circumstances of this case, and considering that the work is done in a quarry in the open air, and that really few of the evils contemplated by the Factory Acts arise, we should be misinterpreting the law if we put upon it the construction which is desired by the appellant.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. At a certain period of the argument my mind certainly fluctuated upon the subject, but I am now quite satisfied that the Factory Acts do not apply to such a case as this. The question has always been dealt with by the Legislature as one of public policy, and if we extended the Factory Acts so as to include quarries, we should do so upon a mere surmise of our own, and I cannot help thinking that if the Legislature intended that these Acts should apply, it would have mentioned slate quarries and stone quarries in terms. I therefore perfectly concur in the views expressed by my Lord.

HANNEN, J.—I also am of the same opinion. I concur with the Solicitor-General in opinion as to the desirability of powers being conferred to bring such a case as this within some of the regulations of the Factory Acts; but I think that the Legislature by what it has enacted could never have intended that such an employment should be subject to such Acts. I cannot certainly come to the conclusion that it was the intention of the Legislature that such a case should be included within the operation of these Acts. I cannot but think that as so many occupations have been mentioned in various Acts, quarries would have been included in express terms if intended. I agree with my Lord that such premises are not included in the Factory Acts; but if I were sitting alone to decide this case, I should decide it upon somewhat narrower grounds, as not in fact being a process by way of trade. I agree that the question of trading as illustrated by the modern bankrupt laws is not conclusive; but I think when a person is using his own land he cannot be said to be carrying on a trade. In Wells v. Parker, 1 T. R. 36, Lord Mansfield thus expresses himself, "As to the first, brickmaking for sale, abstractly considered, is in fact carrying on a trade and seeking to live by the profits. Many things are necessary to be bought which can only be paid for by the sale of the bricks. The credit is given to no visible fund, but merely on the speculation of the profits expected to arise from the sale of the bricks. But the objection is that William Berand rented the brick ground, and consequently that the bricks were the produce of his own land. From the authorities that have been cited, and the reason of the thing, I take the true distinction to be this: If a man exercise a manufacture from the produce of his own land, as a necessary or usual mode of reaping or enjoying that produce, and bring it advantageously to market, he shall not be considered as a trader, though he buy the necessary ingredients and materials to fit it for market, as in the case of a farmer who makes cheese on his own land, and who buys runnet and salt; or as in a case mentioned at the bar, where a man makes his own apples into cider, though there be an expense attending the operation. and though many things are to be bought, and some mixture, yet he is no trader, for it is the usual mode of enjoying the land in the cider counties. So in the alum works, as determined, where the operation was proved to be the necessary and constant mode practised by the proprietors of alum works. Or like the case of the coal mines, where raising them out of the pit is as necessary to the enjoyment of the land as threshing corn," &c. There here follows the qualification which is suggested as applicable to the present case: "But where the produce of the land is merely the raw material of a manufacture, and used as such, and not as the mode of enjoying the produce of the land; in short, where the produce of the land is an insignificant article in comparison with the whole expense of the manufacture, there he ought to be considered as a trader." Well, then, applying that case to the present. Where a large landed proprietor who is possessed of a mountain, which he finds convenient to turn into slate; can he by so doing be said to be carrying on a trade? I should say not. The ordinary use of the slate is for roofing purposes, and it must be observed that it is only with reference to that that as many as fifty persons are employed. Upon these grounds I agree that our judgment should be for the respondent.

BRISTOWE v. BOOTH.

Trustee Act 1850, ss. 28, 32, 34—Trustee Act 1852, sect. 9—Lord of manor—Copyholds, new trustee of—Admittance—Double fine.

P., a trustee of copyholds, devised them to S., who was not his customary heir, and died. S. having disclaimed the devise, and P. J., the customary heir of P., being beyond the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, the court, upon the petition of the cestuis que trust, made an order appointing A. B. trustee of the said lands in place of P., and vesting in him all the estate of P. in the said lands. The lords of the manor did not consent to the said order:

Held, that the lords of the manor were not entitled, by either common law or statute, to demand a double fine from A. B. on admission.

Special case stated by consent.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 266*l.* for fines claimed to be payable by the defendant as customary tenant of certain copyholds or customary tenements of the manor of Woodford, to the plaintiffs, as lords of the said manor of Woodford.

The plaintiffs are lords of the said manor of Woodford in Essex.

On the 12th April 1817 Peter Paterson was, on the surrender of Sir Edwin Boynton Sandys, admitted tenant of the said copyholds or customary tenements of the said manor.

The custom of the said manor as to descent is borough English, and extends to collaterals.

The said Peter Paterson died on the 26th Oct. 1860, and by his will duly executed, dated the 1st April 1857, he gave and devised all his copyhold and customary hereditaments whatsoever and wheresoever, unto his son Peter Paterson, his heirs and assigns, according to the custom of the said manor, whereof the same were held upon the trusts, nevertheless and subject to the powers, provisions, and declarations thereinafter declared and contained of and concerning the same.

The said will was duly proved on the 12th Dec. 1860, in Her Majesty's Court of Probate by Sophia Paterson, Peter Paterson the son, and John White, the executors, power being reserved to Mary Paterson for her also to prove.

On the 24th Oct. 1861, the said Peter Paterson, the son, was, at a court held for the said manor, admitted tenant to the lord of the said manor of the said copyholds or customary tenements, whereof the said Peter Paterson, the father, died so seised, and which were, by his will, so devised to the said Peter Paterson, the son, to have and to hold the same, with the appurtenances, unto the said Peter Paterson, the son, his heirs, and assigns, according to the tenor and effect of the said will, and according to the custom of the said manor, to hold of the lord by the rod, by copy of court roll, at the will of the lord, according to the custom of the said manor, by fealty, and the rents, fines, suits, duties, customs, and services theretofore due, and of right accustomed to be paid, done, and performed for the same.

The custom of the said manor of Woodford does not recognise or take any notice of trusts, and the custom of the manor makes no difference in respect of the fines and fees, whether the tenant is admitted as trustee or in his own beneficial right.

The said Peter Paterson, the son, died on the 20th June, 1864, without issue, having first duly made and published his last will and testament in writing, of which the following is a copy:

This is the last will and testament of me, Peter Paterson, of No. 7, Park-road, Holloway, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman. I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate and effects, of whatever nature or kind soever, unto my dear wife, Sarah Paterson, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the respective nature and qualities thereof, for his and their own use and benefit absolutely; and I appoint my said wife Sarah Paterson sole executrix of this my last will, hereby revoking all wills by me at any time heretofore made, and do declare this alone to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof I, the said testator, Peter Paterson, have hereunto set my hand, this 3rd March, 1862.

The will of Peter Paterson, the son, was proved on the 14th July 1864, in the principal registry of Her Majesty's Court of Probate, by Sarah Paterson, the widow and sole executrix, and the said Sarah Paterson as such devisee as aforesaid was, according to the custom of the said manor, the proper person to be admitted tenant on the court rolls of the said manor of the said copyholds or customary tenements and hereditaments of the said manor whereof the said Peter Paterson the son died seised or possessed as trustee under the will of his father, Peter Paterson the elder.

The said Sarah Paterson was never admitted tenant, by the lord or lords of the said manor, of the said copyhold or customary hereditaments hereinbefore mentioned, or any of them, and on the 10th May 1865 she duly made and signed a deed of disclaimer, a copy of which was as follows: [The case here set out the deed of disclaimer.]

At the date and execution of the said deed of disclaimer, the defendant admits that one Peter James Paterson was the nephew and customary heir-at-law of the said Peter Paterson the younger, according to the custom of the said manor of Woodford, and that the said Peter James Paterson was then, and is now, living out of the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's courts of law and equity, and the said Sarah Paterson has not at any time made any claim for freebench in respect of the said copyhold or customary hereditaments.

The plaintiffs contend that on the execution of the said deed of disclaimer by the said Sarah Paterson, the copyhold or customary hereditaments of which the said Peter Paterson the younger died seised or possessed as devisee and trustee under the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, descended to and became vested in the said Peter James Paterson as the customary heir-at-law of the said Peter Paterson the younger, and on such descent the plaintiffs, as lords of the manor of Woodford, claim to be entitled to a fine.

On the 30th May 1865 the said Sarah Paterson, in conjunction with William Paterson and his infant children Jane Sophia Paterson, William Wadbrook Paterson, Francis Mary Paterson, Alfred White Paterson, and Walter Saunders Paterson, by him as their father and next friend, and Sophia Paterson and John White (all the parties except the said Sarah Paterson being plaintiffs and defendants in a suit then pending in Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery), presented their petition to the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls, which, after stating the will and codicil of the said Peter Paterson the elder, the trusts thereby declared of his real and copyhold, or customary hereditaments, his death, proof of his will and codicils, the admission of the said Peter Paterson the younger to the copyhold or customary hereditaments, a suit instituted in 1860 in the High Court of Chancery for administration of the estate of the said Peter Paterson the elder, the proceedings which had taken place in the suit, the will of the said Peter Paterson the younger, his death, proof of his will, and the deed of disclaimer of the said Sarah Paterson, then stated that it had become necessary to appoint a new trustee of the said copyhold or customary hereditaments, in substitution for the said Peter Paterson the younger; and it was impossible so to do without the assistance of the Court of Chancery, and that Abraham Booth (the defendant in this action) was a fit and proper person to be appointed trustee of the said copyhold or customary hereditaments, and was willing to accept the office of such trustee. The petition then prayed (amongst other things), that the defendant, Abraham Booth, might be appointed such trustee, and that all the estate and interest in the said copyhold or customary hereditaments, which would have vested in the said Sarah Paterson, if she had accepted the devise of the said hereditaments in the said will of the said Peter Paterson the younger contained, might vest in the said Abraham Booth, upon the trusts by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder declared concerning the same, or such of them as were then subsisting or capable of taking effect.

On the 3rd June 1865 the said petition was heard before the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls, and his Honour, by an order of that date, did (amongst other things) order that the said Abraham Booth, the defendant in this action, be appointed a trustee of the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, so far as it related to the copyhold or customary hereditaments devised thereby in substitution for the said Peter Paterson the younger, deceased; and his Honour did also order that all the estate and interest in the said copyhold or customary hereditaments devised by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, which would have vested in the said Sarah Paterson if she had accepted the devise of the said hereditaments in the said will of the said Peterson the younger contained, should vest in the said Abraham Booth. Upon the trusts by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder declared concerning the same or such of them as were then subsisting or capable of taking effect.

The lords and stewards of the said manor of Woodford were not, nor were nor was any or either of them, parties or party to the said petition of the said Sarah Paterson, nor to the other proceedings on which the said order of the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls of the 3rd June 1865 was founded, nor had the said lords and stewards, or any or either of them, any opportunity whatever of being heard, either by counsel or otherwise, against the making of the said order; and the said lords and stewards, or any or either of them, did not consent to the making of the said order of the 3rd June 1865.

On the 23rd Jan. 1866, the plaintiffs, as lords of the manor of Woodford, before John Coverdale, their steward, held a general court baron and customary court of the said manor, at which the defendant appeared, and by virtue of the said order of the said 3rd June 1865 claimed to be admitted as a tenant of the manor, in respect of the copyhold and customary hereditaments devised by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, under the said order, and offered to pay one fine on being admitted; and the said John Coverdale, as such steward, offered to admit him as such tenant, on payment of two fines, but he refused to pay two fines on the admission, and the said steward refused to admit him, and, subsequently, at the said court, a proclamation was made according to the custom of the said manor, for the heir of the said Peter Paterson the younger to come into court and take admittance to the said copyhold or customary hereditaments, otherwise the same would be seized into the hands of the lords of the manor for want of a tenant, and the said Peter James Paterson, the nephew and customary heir-at-law of the said Peter Paterson the younger, did not appear and apply to be admitted, and has never since appeared, and has not, in fact, been admitted a tenant of the said manor according to the custom thereof, in respect of the copyhold or customary hereditaments devised by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder.

On the 16th April 1866 the plaintiffs, as lords of the manor of Woodford, presented their petition in the before-mentioned suit in the High Court of Chancery, to the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls, and after the statements and allegations therein contained, which are unnecessary to be stated in this case, prayed his Honour (amongst other things) that the before-stated order, dated the 3rd June 1865, might be discharged or reversed, and that, if necessary, the petition upon which such order was made might be re-heard before his Honour.

On the 24th April 1866, the said petition came on to be heard before his Honour the Master of the Rolls, and on such hearing his Honour dismissed the petition with costs to be paid by the petitioners.

On the 30th April 1866, the plaintiffs as lords of the manor of Woodford presented their petition of appeal to the Right Honourable the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, and after the statements and allegations therein contained, which are unnecessary to be set out in this case, prayed his Lordship (amongst other things) that the before mentioned petition of Sarah Paterson, and the plaintiffs and defendants in the suit in the High Court of Chancery might be reheard before his Lordship, and that the before stated orders of his Honour the Master of the Rolls of the 3rd June 1865, and the 24th April 1866, might be discharged or varied, and that an order might be made as prayed by the petition presented by the petitioners (the plaintiffs) as aforesaid, or that his Lordship would be pleased to make such further or other order on the premises as to his Lordship should seem fit.

On the 30th May 1866 the last-mentioned petition of the plaintiffs came on to be heard before the Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and on that day the Lords Justices did (amongst other things) which are unnecessary to be set out in this case, order that the orders of the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls, dated respectively the 3rd June 1865, and the 24th April 1866, so far as they related to the copyhold premises held of the manor of Woodford, should be varied, and should be as follows, that is to say:

Their Lordships do order that the said Abraham Booth be appointed a trustee of the will of Peter Paterson the elder in substitution for Peter Paterson, the younger, deceased. And the petitioners, as the lords of the manor of Woodford, by their counsel consenting, and the said Abraham Booth, by his undertaking to admit in any action at law, to be brought by the said lords for their fine or fines that he has been admitted to the copyhold and customary hereditaments hereinafter mentioned, it is ordered that without prejudice to any question what fine or fines is or are payable to the lords of the said manor in respect of the said hereditaments, the copyhold or customary hereditaments devised by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, and held at the said manor of Woodford, do vest in the said Abraham Booth for the estate of the said Peter Paterson the younger therein, to be held by the said Abraham Booth upon the existing trusts of the said will. And it is ordered that the costs of the petition presented to the Master of the Rolls on the 16th April 1866, and of the appeal petition and of the mandamus in the petition mentioned, and any other costs be reserved until after the action by the petitioners for the said fine or fines shall have been disposed of.

The defendant, for the purposes of this case, admits that he was duly admitted tenant of the said copyhold or customary tenement to the plaintiffs, as lords of the said manor, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to one fine, payable by the defendant, for such his admission, and that the said hereditaments are worth about 75*l.* a year. And the plaintiffs, for the purposes of this case, admit that the defendant was willing, and offered to pay, one fine for admission, and that the plaintiffs refused to accept such one fine, and claimed to have two fines paid upon such admission.

By the custom of the manor a fine is payable upon the descent of the copyhold to the customary heir; and there is evidence that if the customary heir has not been admitted, the person who next claims to be admitted has never been admitted except upon payment of two fines and sets of fees, which payment has been invariably enforced in such cases; but in all cases of persons claiming to be admitted after a descent to the customary heir, where the customary heir has not been admitted, the person so claiming to be admitted has claimed through the heir.

The defendant contends that the custom of payment of two fines and sets of fees is not applicable to him under the circumstances stated in this case.

No admission fees or fines have been paid in respect of the said hereditaments to the lords and stewards of the said manor, or either of them, since the death of Peter Paterson, the younger; and the question between the parties is, whether two fines and sets of fees are payable, or only one.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Are the plaintiffs, as lords of the said manor, on the admittance of the said Abraham Booth, as tenant of the said copyhold and customary hereditaments, under the facts before mentioned, entitled to one fine or two fines, or to a double fine? The plaintiff's costs of the action and the defendant's costs of defence are left to the decision of the court, if they so please to make such order, or orders as to the same, as they may consider fit.

Archibald (Cowie with him) for the plaintiffs.—The present question turns on the construction we put upon the Trustee Acts of 1850 and 1852 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), and the view to be taken of the order of the Lords Justices set out in the case. The 32nd section of the Act of 1850 shows that the effect of the order was to substitute the defendant for the person who at the date of the order was the trustee of these lands. That person was Peter James Paterson, in whom, after the disclaimer by the widow of Peter Paterson the younger, the legal estate was vested, and who clearly was, in contemplation of law, the trustee of these lands. Here the 28th section of the Act of 1850 comes into operation, the effect of which is to carefully guard the rights of lords of manors, where a substitution of trustees is made in the case of copyhold lands. [BOVILL, C. J.—The latter part of the section seems to contemplate only a case where the court directs another person to execute "such acts or instruments"] The section applies to an order appointing a trustee. Now Peter James Paterson was never admitted on the rolls of this manor, and as the defendant was appointed trustee in substitution of him, and must deduce his title through him, he must pay a fine both for Peter James Paterson and himself on his admission. The Legislature was careful in framing this 28th section, that, though they might dispense with certain formal acts, they should not curtail the rights of the lords of manors to their payments. On the disclaimer by the widow, the state of things was just as though Peter Paterson the younger had died intestate, and the lords of the manor were then entitled to require the customary heir to come in and be admitted: (Shelford on Copyholds, 167.) The heir might alienate without admission, but in that case the alienee would have to pay two fines. Without the aid of the statute, nobody but Peter James Paterson could possibly get on the roll of this manor as tenant of these lands without paying two fines, and the statute, so far from infringing or curtailing the rights of the lords, carefully guards them. Before 1815, a copyholder wishing to devise his lands, had to make a surrender of them to the uses of his will. It was the object of 55 Geo. 3, c. 192, to render this formality unnecessary, but the statute carefully guarded the right of the lord to a double fine in such a case. Then, again, let us take the case of the first Bankruptcy Act (13 Eliz. c. 7). In the case of Drury v. Man, 1 Atk. 94, Lord Hardwicke shows that, when a bankrupt's estate is by force of the Act vested in his assignees, if these assignees subsequently sell, the vendee has to pay two fines, one for the admission of the assignees and one for his own. Lord Hardwicke accordingly recommends that, to obviate this difficulty, "commissioners of bankrupts shall for the future except copyholds out of the deed of assignment of the bankrupt's estate, because it would save the expense of two fines." Lord Hardwicke also recommended that, in future legislation, it would be very proper to remedy this inconvenience with respect to copyholds. This recommendation was followed in the Bankruptcy Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 16), by sect. 64 of which the commissioners are to convey all lands except copyhold and customary lands to the assignees. As to the copyhold lands of the bankrupt, it is provided (sect. 68) that the commissioners shall have power to sell these, and care is taken that they shall not vest in the assignees. By this means this difficulty as to a double fine, which existed in Lord Hardwicke's time, is avoided. Sect. 114 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict., c. 134) provides against any intermediate vesting of the copyhold lands. As to two fines being payable on a double devolution, he cited

Lord Londesborough v. Foster, 3 B. & S. 805;
Morse v. Faulkner, 1 Anstr. Ex. R. 11.

Joshua Williams Q.C. (J. O. Griffits with him) for the defendant.—The order of the Lords Justices vested all the estate of the late P. Paterson, Jun., in these lands in the defendant. The defendant has nothing to do with the heir-at-law. The order has just the same effect as if Peter Paterson the younger had surrendered these lands to the defendant. "Should the surrenderor die in the interim, i.e., between the surrender and admission . . . yet . . . though the heir would take by descent and his widow be entitled to dower, on the admission of the surrenderee, such estate would be defeated, and of consequence the descent and title to dower would be defeated also:" (1 Watkins on Copyhold, p. 128, edit. by Coventry.) The Act of 1850 gave the Court of Chancery power to make an order, which was to have the same effect as if the last trustee had in his lifetime made surrender. The court has power to make an order (sect. 9 of Act of 1852), though there be no existing trustee. There was thus only one devolution of the property from Peter Paterson the younger to the defendant. Circumstances might have arisen, under which the customary heir might have been regarded as the trustee; but in such a case the order would have recited such fact, and would have vested in A. Booth the estate of Peter James Paterson, and not that of Peter Paterson the younger. Our title relates back to the death of Peter Paterson, Jun.: (Holdfast on dem.of Woollams v. Clapham, 1 T. R. 600.) The order was made under sect. 32 of the Act of 1850. The 9th sect. of the Act of 1852 gives the court power to make such an order, whether there be at the time any existing trustee or not. At the date of the order, Peter James Paterson was not such a trustee as was contemplated by the Act. The defendant relies on the 34th section of the Act of 1850. The plaintiff, in order to succeed, must contend that the order was wrong, and that it ought to have said that the defendant should take all the estate of Peter James Paterson, instead of that of Peter Paterson the younger. (He read the judgment of Lord Romilly, M.R., in Paterson v. Paterson, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 35, and 14 L. T. Rep. N.S. 320)

Archibald in reply.

BOVILL, C. J.—The right of the lord in this case must depend either on the custom of the manor, or on statute. If it rests on custom, it is a custom contrary to the ordinary provisions of the common law. But the facts do not bring this case within the custom. According to strict custom, the lord has no right to two fines on the admission of a tenant; but he has a right to one fine. In some cases, where the claimant has to make out his title through some person who has not been admitted, the rights of the lord are preserved; but two admissions are dispensed with. But here the lord cannot claim the second fine by custom. The defendant does not deduce his title from Peter James Paterson, as his name does not appear in the order of the Court of Chancery. It is on this order and the provisions of the Act of Parliament, that the defendant rests his claim. This order substitutes the defendant as trustee in the place of Peter Paterson the younger, the deceased trustee of the last person who had been admitted on the rolls. The power of the Court of Chancery to appoint trustees is extensive. It is conferred on the court by the two Trustee Acts of 1850 and 1852 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55). The 9th section of the last-mentioned Act provides that, where it may appear expedient the court shall have power to make an order, appointing a trustee, whether there be an existing trustee at the time or not. The second Act is incorporated with the first, and the two together are to be considered as one act. The effect of the order is described in the 34th section of the first Act. (The learned judge read the section). Taking these two sections (the 9th of the Act of 1850 and the 34th of the Act of 1852) together, the effect of the order, which was made under them, was to vest the whole estate of the late Peter Paterson the younger, in the present defendant. There has been a great deal of argument in the course of this case as to the effect of these sections. But they plainly apply to those various cases in which inconveniences may have arisen. The 5th section of the Act of 1852 provides for the case of a lunatic trustee; the 9th, for that of a trustee out of the jurisdiction of the court; the 16th, for the case of a trustee dying intestate without an heir. So far as the conveyance of copyholds is concerned, it is plain that, without any admission at all by the manor court, the property would vest in the trustee appointed by the court by force of the order. A difficulty, however, arises in consequence of the 28th section of the Act of 1850, as to whether in such a case it is not necessary for the trustee appointed to be admitted by the lord of the manor. The section seems to imply that, where the lord does not consent to the appointment by the court of the trustee, his admission on the rolls becomes necessary. The latter end of the section, however, which relates to this question, says nothing about fees, but leaves that to the operation of the ordinary law. This is the utmost extent to which the lord can be shown to be entitled to the fees. But when the person appointed by the court is admitted, the lord is entitled by the ordinary custom to a fine. The tenant in such a case pays one fine; but I cannot see that the lord has any right to demand a second. Mr Archibald has referred us to the provision at the latter end of the 28th section of the Act of 1850, which provides that every lord of the manor shall, "subject to the customs of the manor and the usual payments," be bound and compellable to make admittances to such lands. But these words clearly apply to the case where the court makes an order directing another person to convey. This is, however, not the case here, so that that part of the section has no application. But even under that provision, I should not say that two fines would be payable, though I express no decided opinion on this point. Mr Archibald asks us to imply that two fines are payable, in a case where the order does not direct another person to convey, but where a vesting order has been made. This estate vests in the defendant by force of the statute in precisely the same way as it would on a conveyance by the person in whose place he was appointed, viz, Peter Paterson the younger. The case is not brought within the custom of the manor, and so no double fine becomes payable. There is nothing in the Acts expressly reserving the lord's fine, except the latter part of the section I have quoted; that part, however, does not apply here. There are various Acts of Parliament which dispense with formal proceedings in the manor court, as for instance, that which renders it unnecessary for a tenant to surrender to the uses of his will. Those Acts make express reservation of the lord's fine. Then again, as to the effect of the various Bankruptcy Acts which Mr Archibald has cited, it is quite true that, by the operation of the first Bankruptcy Act, a double fine became payable; but Lord Hardwicke, in the case referred to, pointed out a mode by which this difficulty might be avoided, and this mode has been substantially followed in the later Acts. I may mention also a common practice among conveyancers to give to trustees a bare power to sell in the case of copyholds, without giving them any estate in them. In such cases only one fine is payable. So in the same way in the later Bankruptcy Acts the power of disposition of his copyholds is taken from the bankrupt and given to the commissioners or assignees, as the case may be, and by this means only one fine becomes payable. In these cases a statutory transfer is made; but only one fine is payable, and that by the alienee, the commissioners or assignees paying none. But, independently of this general view of the Act, I am of opinion that the order substantially disposes of the question, although the parties are not bound by its terms. In my judgment, the Lords Justices were quite right as to the shape given by them to the order. The only party on the rolls as trustee was the late Peter Paterson the younger. Peter James Paterson, though undoubtedly the customary heir of this Peter Paterson, was never on the rolls of the manor, and was never tenant of these lands. Peter Paterson the younger, having been admitted, the Court of Chancery was quite right in saying that they appointed the defendant in substitution of Peter Paterson, the younger, and in placing him in precisely the same position, as if Peter Paterson had surrendered the lands to him in his lifetime, and died before the surrender was complete. In such a case, it is conceded that only one fine would have been payable. The principle that would have applied to such a case must apply here. On these grounds, I am of opinion that only one fine was payable by the defendant, and consequently that our judgment must be for the defendant.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Peter Paterson the younger, in whom the estate was last vested, died. The effect of his will was, that his widow might have claimed to be admitted as tenant of these copyhold lands, if she had chosen, to hold them as trustee. She, however, disclaimed this devise, and her disclaimer, though she took other property under the will, was effectual. Then, I take it, that, on her disclaimer, Peter James Paterson, in the absence of any interference on the part of the Court of Chancery, would have had a right to be admitted on the roll of this manor, as customary heir to Peter Paterson, Jun.; and he would in this case have had to pay a fine to the lord. I must observe that I further take it, that Peter James Paterson never interfered in the trusts, and never took them upon him, and that, except for the circumstance that he was heir to the person who last had them, he was never properly trustee. He certainly, however, had the legal estate, and that stamped with the trust. It is true that in one sense he may be considered to have been a trustee, but, as he never interfered in the matter, he never was, pratically speaking, a trustee at all. It was no doubt, then, expedient, under the circumstances, that the Court of Chancery should exercise its power of appointing a trustee, and also that the trustee so appointed should be in the place of Peter James Paterson. There were then in this case none of the circumstances that arose in the case of in Re Blanchard, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426; 30 L J. 516, Ch., where the rights of existing trustees had to be considered. I cannot doubt then, that, under the circumstances, the Lords Justices had power, under the 32nd section of the Trustees Act 1850, to make the order that they made, and, as Mr Joshua Williams has pointed out, that order was founded on the 32nd section of the Act of 1850 and the 9th section of the Act of 1852. I do not criticise the terms of this order, but I take it as plain that the Lords Justices had power to make this order vesting these lands in the defendant, and vesting them in him as in continuance of the estate of Peter Paterson, Jun. It is, however, not necessary to go into this question, so I say nothing further on the point. But the result of the order was to substitute a new trustee for the existing trustee. You may either take it, according to my notion, that the order was founded on the 9th section of the Act of 1852 (which provides for the case where there is no trustee), so that it created a continuous chain from Peter Paterson the younger to Mr Booth, or that it was founded on the 32nd section of the Act of 1850, in which case it may be said that Mr Booth was appointed in substitution of the person, who might technically be called, but never in reality was, the trustee. If you take the order in the former sense, then Mr Booth was substituted for the devisee and put in her place. The Act deals with two cases—the one, in which the trustee is lunatic or otherwise impracticable; the other, in which no trustee at all exists. Now supposing a case of the latter kind to arise where copyhold lands are concerned. There being no heir and no devisee of the last trustee, the court steps in and appoints a trustee. It is absurd to suppose that, in such a case, more than one fine would be payable. With respect to the section affecting copyhold lands (28th section of the Act of 1850), it does not appear to me to advance the plaintiff's case. I am quite aware that questions have arisen as to the construction of this section, amongst others the question whether the lord is before the court when an order to appoint new trustees of copyhold property is made. It is, however, quite sufficient to say that the order is not made in this case with the consent of the lord. The Act says that when the lord consents to the appointment of the new trustee no admission shall be necessary. The present case, however, is excluded from that provision. The subsequent part of the 28th section reserves the right of the lord to the usual payments, according to the custom of the manor. What then was the custom of this manor? That the heir should pay a fine on admission; but if the heir, without being admitted himself, surrendered to another, the surrenderee would have to pay the heir's fine, and his own too, before admission. But that custom does not extend to the case of a person put in the place of a devisee under the statute. The effect of the statute is, not to create a transfer from the heir or devisee, but to put the person designated in the same position as the heir or devisee. On these grounds, I am of opinion that only one fine was payable, and consequently that our judgment must be for the defendant.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that there can be no doubt that the Lords Justices had power under the statute to make the order they made. That order, if they had jurisdiction to make it, directs in express terms the substitution of the defendant for Peter Paterson the younger. The counsel for the plaintiffs contend that, upon a proper construction of these Acts, Mr. Booth ought not to be said to take from Peter Paterson the younger, but from Peter James Paterson, his customary heir. This Peter James Paterson was certainly the customary heir, but he never interfered in the trusts, and never, properly speaking, became a trustee. Why then should the plaintiffs claim a second fine? Mr. Archibald says, because the defendant must deduce his title from Peter James Paterson. But I do not think that it is the intention of these Acts that we should so regard him. The Acts give to the Court of Chancery a power of substituting one trustee for another, and the order made by the Lords Justices gives the defendant the same right to be admitted as if the last tenant, viz., Peter Paterson, Jun., had surrendered to him. I am unable to see then that the plaintiffs have made out their title to a second or double fine, and therefore give my judgment for the defendant.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr Archibald is quite right in admitting that the Lords Justices had the power under the 32nd section of the Trustee Act 1850, and the 9th section of the Act of 1852, to make the order that they made. If so, the order expressly says that A. Booth is to "be appointed a trustee of the will of Peter Paterson the elder, in substitution for Peter Paterson the younger, deceased. . . . And it is ordered that . . . the copyhold or customary hereditaments devised by the will of the said Peter Paterson the elder, and held of the said manor of Woodford, do vest in the said Abraham Booth for the estate of the said Peter Paterson the younger therein." That being so, the claim of the lord to two fines, or a double fine on the admission of the defendant, is not brought within the custom of this manor. The defendant does not derive his title from the customary heir, but from the Court of Chancery. To be effectual at all the arguments used on behalf of the plaintiffs must go a deal further, and it must be contended that custom gives a different effect to the order to that conveyed by the ordinary terms. But there is no ground for our giving to the terms of this order any but the ordinary signification. On these grounds, I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defendant.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, April 30.

STREET v. MORGAN.

Stock Exchange—Sale of shares—Purchase by country broker of London broker for an undiscovered principal—Failure of principal—Authority to London broker to "do what he thinks best"—Duty of London broker thereupon—Name of country broker given by London broker as the ultimate purchaser—Liability of country broker thereunder—Action against for calls.

The plaintiff, through his London broker, sold, on the 11th May 1866, eleven Overend and Gurney shares for the account day, on 15th May, to P. and Co., brokers on the Stock Exchange, who had previously, on the 27th April, been instructed by M., the defendant, a country broker, to purchase for him 1000 O. and G. shares for the same account day, of which 1000 shares the eleven shares in question formed part. O. and G. having stopped payment on the 10th May, M., the defendant, who had purchased the above 1000 shares for S., a customer, finding that S. was insolvent, and could and would pay nothing, wrote as follows to his brokers, P. and Co., "Our client cannot meet his engagements as regards the 1000 Overends, and we, unfortunately, cannot meet them; therefore we authorise you to do whatever you think best;" and at a personal interview on the same day M. prohibited P. and Co. from using or in any way recognising the name of S. in the transaction. On the name day, the 14th May, P. and Co. accordingly gave to the plaintiff's broker the name of the defendant M. as the ultimate purchaser and transferee, which was accepted, and the transfer to him was duly prepared and executed. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant upon a contract of indemnity against future calls on the said eleven shares, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Bramwell, and Cleasby, BB.), that the defendant's letter to P. and Co. gave them a general and unlimited authority to exercise their discretion in the matter, and that inasmuch as, if any name were given at all, it must be either their own name or that of M., they were warranted by the terms of their authority in passing the name of the defendant.

And per Kelly, C. B.—Within the authority to purchase the 1000 shares given by the defendant to P. and Co., on the 27th April, was included and implied an authority, whenever the name day should arrive, to give the name of the defendant as the ultimate purchaser, unless upon or before that day the defendant should have furnished them with another name which he had required them to give, a point which I think is settled by the principle of the decisions in Grissell v. Bristowe, in the Exchequer Chamber, and Coles v. Bristowe in the Court of Chancery.

This was an action which was brought by the plaintiff, as the seller of eleven shares in the Overend and Gurney Company (Limited), against the defendant, as the transferee or ultimate purchaser of the said shares, on an agreement to indemnify the plaintiff against calls made upon the shares subsequently to the said sale. The action was tried before Kelly, C. B., at Guildhall, in February last, when the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—

The plaintiff was a gentleman who, on the 11th May 1866, subsequently to the failure and stoppage of the Overend and Gurney Company on the previous day, the 10th May, but before the alarm and consternation thereby created had become general, gave instructions to his brokers in London to sell eleven shares belonging to him in the said company for the next account day, the 15th May. On the same 11th May his brokers accordingly sold them to a jobber, who re-sold them on the same day to Messrs. Pater and Co., stockbrokers, of the London Stock Exchange, who purchased them for the defendant, a stockbroker at Norwich. The sold note, bearing date the 11th May 1866, was as follows: "Sold, on account, of — Street, Esq., eleven Overend and Gurney shares, 12 discount, for the 15th inst."

It appeared that the defendant Morgan had, as early as the 27th of the previous month of April, instructed his London brokers, Pater and Co., to purchase 1000 Overend and Gurney shares for the account day of the 15th May, which they accordingly did, the eleven shares, the subject of the present action, being a part of such 1000 shares so purchased by Pater and Co. for Morgan. The purchase was made by Morgan for a customer of the name of Smith, but that fact was not known to Pater and Co. at the time of the purchase, though it was known to them before the name day on the 14th May.

The stoppage of Overend and Gurney occurring on the 10th, became known to the public on the 11th May, and on that day the defendant, finding that his employer Smith, who at the time he gave the order was believed to be a rich man, was totally unable, and, in fact, declined to pay for the shares, or any part of them, sent a telegram to his London brokers, Pater and Co., informing them thereof. Thereupon a Mr. Brown, Pater and Co.'s managing clerk, went to Norwich on the 12th May, and had an interview with the defendant, who delivered to him a letter for his principals, Pater and Co., which letter was delivered by Brown to Pater and Co. on his return to town on the 14th, and was in the following terms:

Messrs. Pater and Co.

Dear Sirs,—Our client cannot meet his engagements as regards the 1000 shares, and we unfortunately cannot meet them, therefore we authorise you to do whatever you think best.

Pater and Co. were also then informed by Brown of the result of his interview with Morgan, the defendant, namely, that Morgan had bought the shares for Smith, but that he (Morgan) could not allow Pater and Co. to recognise Smith, or in any way use his name as that of the purchaser. There was some slight conflict in the evidence as to this part of the transaction, the witness Brown, on the part of the plaintiff, stating positively that the above was what occurred, whilst the defendant Morgan, who was called as a witness for himself, though he did not deny having made that statement to Brown, said he had no recollection of having told Brown that the name of Smith was not to be used, but he added that he was at the time "under much mental pressure and anxiety."

In consequence of the letter and message from the defendant, Pater and Co., on the 14th May, the name day, when it was absolutely necessary for them to give in the name of the ultimate purchaser, passed Morgan's name as the buyer to the plaintiff's (the seller's) brokers, by whom the transfer to the defendant was accordingly made out; and being executed, the defendant's brokers (Pater and Co.) took it and paid for the shares. The defence at the trial was that Pater and Co. had no authority to pass Morgan's name as the transferee or ultimate buyer, he having bought them as a broker only on behalf of another person.

The above facts being proved, the learned Lord Chief Baron directed the jury to find a verdict for the plaintiff, giving leave to the defendant to move to set it aside and enter it for himself on any points which could be fairly raised upon the facts disclosed in the evidence, or upon any inferences which the court were empowered to draw from the facts adduced upon the argument of the rule. Accordingly Keane, Q. C., in Easter Term last (April 19), moved for and obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the defendant upon the grouud that Pater and Co., the London brokers of the defendant, had no authority to give his name; and also on the ground that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant; and against that rule.

Powell, Q. C. and Philbrick, for the plaintiff, now showed cause. The first question is, was there any authority to the broker to insert the defendant's name in the note; and, secondly, whether there was any privity of contract. [BRAMWELL, B.—In my opinion it is not a Stock Exchange question at all.] As to the first question, whether Pater had authority to give Morgan's name, Brown, Pater's managing clerk, positively swore that the defendant refused to allow him to use Smith's name, and Morgan's evidence does not in fact contradict that. [BRAMWELL, B.—According to my impression of the evidence, Morgan's name was correctly inserted, and there was authority to do it. I do not think the Stock Exchange cases apply here; the doubt is, not whether Morgan gave authority to have his name used, but whether Pater and Co. ought not to have let the shares be sold against them, and have had their remedy against Morgan.] Conceding that the Stock Exchange cases do not apply, yet, if Morgan's name got into the contract by his authority he would be liable and be bound. His name was given according to the practice. [BRAMWELL, B.—What practice? Not of the Stock Exchange, for Morgan was not a member of it. The question of practice, if there is any such question, is, what is the practice as between a town and country broker.] The generality of the authority, "Do whatever you think best," included the authority to pass the defendant's name, and the defendant is liable, his name having been passed under such authority.

Keane Q. C. and Lanyon, for the defendant, contra, supported the rule. The authority is in effect this, "I can do nothing; do you, therefore, do the best you can,—that is, sell, or carry over, or what you like, but all on the understanding that I can do nothing." To make the defendant liable to this extreme extent could not therefore be doing the best for him. [KELLY, C.B.—You must take this as the basis of the matter; that Pater and Co. could only have given one of two names without commiting a fraud—namely, their own or Morgan's. If they gave their own, they were ruined men; and from the beginning to the end the defendant Morgan never gave them any other name than his own.] According to the decision in Maxsted v. Paine in this court (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; 38 L. J. 41, Ex., L. Rep. 4 Ex. 81), it might be contended that the jobber of whom Pater and Co. bought the shares was liable because he did not give the name of a bonâ fide purchaser. If Smith's name was known, as it was, before the name day, it should have been passed, or no name should have been given, and the shares have been sold over in accordance with rules 85, 96, 97, and 98, of the printed rules of the Exchange, or the whole matter have been passed over to the next account day. It was contrary to the rule of the Stock Exchange for one broker to make another broker a principal in any transaction between them.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The contract or rather the contracts, in this case, were originally made between different parties, and pursuant to and upon the basis of the usage and customs of the Stock Exchange. Notwithstanding the late important decisions upon that subject in the cases of Grissell v. Bristowe (in error from the Court of Common Pleas), 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 36; 38 L. J. 10, C. P., and Coles v. Bristowe (in Chancery), 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 3; 38 L. J. 81, Ch., some difference of opinion may still be entertained as to the operation of that usage upon contracts entered into for the purchase and sale of shares upon the Stock Exchange. But under the circumstances of this case it is unnecessary to deal with any of the points upon which it is possible that any such difference of opinion should arise. The plaintiff in the present case, in the month of May, became the seller of these shares in the Overend and Gurney Company (Limited). He sold them through brokers, and they were purchased by a jobber, and the day when the contract was to be performed, the account day, when the transfer was to be made, and whoever might then turn out, pursuant to the usage of the Stock Exchange, to be the ultimate purchaser who was to accept the transfer, was the 15th of the same month of May. It appears that before that day, as early indeed as the 27th April, the defendant Morgan had by a telegram, of which no copy has been furnished to the court, directed Pater and Co., the brokers, to purchase 1000 shares in Overend and Gurney. The purchase having been made by Pater and Co. on behalf of Morgan, and the 1000 shares ultimately including the eleven shares in question, nothing material appears to have taken place between the parties, until shortly after the 10th May, on which day, most unfortunately for all parties interested, the Overend and Gurney Company stopped payment. In consequence of that stoppage, Pater and Co.—who had purchased these shares, and who, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange, and indeed, according to the direct and necessary legal effect of the contract to purchase which they had entered into, had become personally liable to be treated as the purchasers, and to pay the amount of the purchase-money, and to become the owners of the shares, and liable also to all future calls upon them, unless they should, in the mean time give the name of an ultimate purchaser who should be accepted by the seller, who, in this case, with regard to these eleven shares, was the plaintiff—as early as the evening of the 10th May itself, wrote to the defendant, informing him of the stoppage of Overend and Gurney and requesting to be informed what course they were to take. The defendant makes no answer to that letter on that day or the next, but on the 12th May, having first sent a telegram, to which I need not more particularly refer, he writes to Pater and Co. in relation to the purchase and the disposition of the shares, and the failure of the Overend and Gurney Company, in these terms: "Messrs. Pater and Co. Dear Sirs,—Our client cannot meet his engagement as regards the 1000 Overends, and we unfortunately cannot meet them; therefore we authorise you to do whatever you think best." Now, it is said by the learned counsel for the defendant that four courses of action were open to Pater and Co. upon this emergency. They might, as it is said, and I shall not stop to consider whether the statement is perfectly accurate or not in relation to the usages of the Stock Exchange, have carried over the transaction from the 15th to the 30th May, which was the next account day; or they might have declined to give any name at all, or to complete the contract, and so have left it to the seller or his broker or jobber, or the jobber with whom they themselves had dealt, to sell against them, and then to call upon them for the difference; or thirdly, it is said they might have given the name of Morgan, as the ultimate purchaser and transferee; or they might have given no name at all, but have themselves become the purchasers and transferees of the shares. It has also been said that there was a fifth course which might and ought to have been taken, namely, that inasmuch as they had been apprised by the telegram instructing them to make the purchase of the 1000 shares, that Morgan, on behalf of whom the shares were to be made, was himself but the agent of a third person, whose name was not mentioned or made known to them by the defendant until a subsequent period of the transactions between them, when it was made known by Morgan to Brown the clerk of Pater and Co., and so to Pater and Co. themselves; therefore they might have given in the name of Smith. No doubt they might if they had thought fit to do so, but it is enough to say upon that subject that we have the evidence before us, which we are called upon to deal with, that when Pater and Co. had communicated to Morgan the defendant the failure of Overend and Gurney, and had sent down their confidential clerk Brown to communicate further with the defendant upon the subject, the defendant upon that occasion told Brown, and so, in effect, told Pater and Co. themselves, that he had indeed bought the shares for Dr. Smith, but that he could not allow Pater and Co. to recognise Smith in the transaction in any way. Now, supposing that any question is raised upon this evidence, quite independently of the letter of the 12th May to Pater, which followed; supposing that it had become the duty, or that it was one of the alternatives which was left to Pater and Co., to give the name of Smith as the ultimate purchaser, it appears to me, and I believe also to the rest of this court, dealing with this evidence, that there is no reason to doubt the testimony of Brown upon this occasion. He was the witness indeed for the plaintiff, but he had been the confidential clerk of Pater and Co. He had no interest whatever, therefore, to tell an untruth, or to misrepresent the case against Pater and Co., and in favour of the plaintiff. There was no reason, therefore, that I can see, to doubt the accuracy of Brown's testimony, more particularly when Morgan himself was called, who, if he could have done so, would have shown that he had said nothing of the kind to

Brown. He did not deny having made that statement. What he did say—and it is perfectly reasonable to believe it, because it is an extremely probable statement—was this: "I have no recollection of having said to Brown that they were not to use the name of Smith," and then he added, "I was under much mental pressure and anxiety at the time." No doubt his memory was disturbed and troubled, and though he did not recollect what was said, there is not the slightest reason to doubt that he did say this to Brown, more particularly as we find by a letter written by his (Morgan's) attorney that he had for some reason or other forbidden or disapproved the use of Smith's name. But supposing any doubt to exist upon the testimony of Brown on this point, it really seems to become immaterial when we come to the letter of the 12th May, two days before the 14th, when the name had to be given in, and when some decisive steps must be taken to bring this unfortunate matter to a conclusion. We find by this letter that he addressed Pater and Co. in the terms which I have already referred to. Now the simple question, and it was really the only point that was made on the part of the defendant, for the opinion of the court is, whether the effect of this letter was not really to leave it in the hands of Pater and Co. to do what upon the whole they might think was just and expedient as between all the parties concerned. Now what was Pater and Co.'s condition? With regard to their carrying over to the next account day, or with regard to their allowing the shares to be sold against them, it is quite enough to say that they were men of knowledge and experience upon the Stock Exchange, well acquainted with business, capable of forming, at least, as correct an opinion as anybody else could have formed at that time, of the probabilities of the future recovery, or of the ultimate failure and ruin of Overend and Gurney, and it was left to them to do whatever they thought best. It appears they thought it was not best for whoever might be the party ultimately to become the purchaser, whether themselves, or Morgan, or Smith, or anybody else, either to allow the shares to be sold against them, or to carry over the transaction to the next account day. The only two alternatives therefore left to them were, either to give the name of Morgan, or to leave their own names as the ultimate transferees and purchasers, and they determined to give the name of Morgan. The question is, whether that was within the authority given to them by Morgan? I am very far indeed from holding that Morgan would have any right or power or authority in himself to forbid, or, at least, to effectually forbid, Pater and Co. to give in his name; but whether he had or not, that is not the question we are now called upon to decide. When Morgan well knew that, if a name was given at all it must be either his own name or the name of Pater and Co., if he had meant to intimate to Pater and Co. that they were not to give in his name, that they might give their own name, or adopt either of the other courses which have been referred to in the arguments, he might have said so plainly and distinctly in his letter, and he ought not to have left an uncontrolled and unlimited discretion in Pater and Co. to do the best they could under all the circumstances. Instead of doing that, however, he writes, "We authorise you to do whatever you think best." I am of opinion, and in that opinion my learned brethren concur, that that gave to Pater and Co. the authority to exercise their own discretion as to the mode in which this unfortunate transaction was to be brought to a conclusion; and one of these modes was to give in the name of Morgan as the ultimate purchaser. That name was accordingly given in, and was accepted by the seller, who thereupon executed the proper transfer within due time, according to the usage of the Stock Exchange and the terms of the contract. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the defendant is liable, notwithstanding this objection, and the only one that has been made, to make good the contract which had been entered into, and consequently that he is liable to this action, and that the verdict for the plaintiff ought not to be disturbed.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. There is only one question which has been reserved and which has been raised in this argument. In giving Morgan's name, was Pater acting within the authority conferred upon him? If other objections had been made, other questions might have arisen which might or might not have been met by argument. But that is the only question we have now to deal with. Now, unquestionably the position of a broker, or any agent like Morgan, is in general this. He is not a person expected to pay for the shares, or to become the principal. In fact, a broker could not carry on his business unless he had a capital beyond all calculation, if he were expected to do that, because he has to live on the commission which he makes, which is a small one upon very large transactions indeed; and, therefore, unquestionably his position is that of being responsible only for the differences, which might be a very trifling matter in comparison, and which his capital may enable him to do. I mention this, that it may be seen that I have thoroughly appreciated Mr. Lanyon's argument on this part of the case. In ordinary transactions the broker is not intended to be the principal to pay for the shares, or to incur any of the liability of a principal, and that is confirmed in this case by the letter, which gives as a reason for giving the name, that there was some difficulty connected with the selling note. However, that is the position of the broker. Here we have this very exceptional state of things to deal with—the purchase was on the 27th April, the stoppage of Overend and Gurney on the 10th May; then all this consternation, the going down to Norwich, the having that conversation, and great difficulties on both sides, and it ends in a letter, which it is impossible to say is inconsistent with the statement of Brown, the witness, but which letter is, in my opinion, sufficient; because if a person chooses deliberately, when writing a letter, to put it in this general way, and to confer complete power upon another person as to how he is to act, and to place himself within the discretion of that person as to how he will carry a given matter into effect, he must be bound by the fair exercise of that person's discretion. What he says is this: "we authorise you to do whatever you think best." I cannot see that I can take upon myself to say that Pater and Co. did not think the best course to pursue at the time was the one they did pursue. If they did, they did that which was precisely what they were desired to do. If they had sold out, they would at once have made the defendant responsible. Instead of which, at that time, this was only the 14th or 15th May, they think the best thing is, to take the chance, and have the shares put in the name of a person who had given them this particular authority. They could not, under this authority, have dealt with any other name. Under these circumstances, I think the defendant. by placing it in the discretion of Pater and Co. in this way, has brought this fairly upon himself. He might have been a gainer by it, though it turns out that he is enormously a loser by it. It is his own fault for giving a general authority of this sort. My brother Martin, who has heard the whole of the argument, desires me to say that he entirely concurs in this judgment.

KELLY, C. B.—My brother Bramwell also, who has heard a great deal of the argument, entirely subscribes to the judgment of the court. I think I ought to add, speaking for myself alone, that I am clearly of opinion that, within the authority to purchase the 1000 shares given by the defendant to Pater and Co. on the 27th April, was included and implied an authority, whenever the name day should arrive, to give the name of the defendant as the ultimate purchaser, unless upon or before that day the defendant should have furnished them with another name which he had required them to give instead of his own. I say that, lest it should be supposed that I entertain any doubt on that point, which I think is settled by the principles of the decisions of Grissell v. Bristowe and Coles v. Bristowe (ubi. sup.), to which I have before referred. But in this latter observation I am declaring my own opinion, and my own opinion alone.

MANN v. HARBORD.

Costs—Review of taxation—Costs of entering cause provisionally—Costs of appeal from master to judge at chambers.

The plaintiff had entered the cause provisionally for trial at the Liverpool Spring Assizes. Before the commission day, the defendant obtained an order from a judge at chambers for a commissioner to examine witnesses at Bombay, and the cause was consequently not tried at the spring assizes:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the expenses of such entry as costs in the cause.

The costs of an appeal from a master to a judge at chambers are not costs in the cause, unless the judge upon the appeal expressly provides that they shall be.

A rule nisi had been obtained for a review of taxation in this case, under the following circumstances. It appeared that by an order made by Mellor, J. and Lush, J., the judges of assize at the Liverpool Spring Assizes 1868, it was directed that, for facilitating the entry of causes for trial at future assizes for the southern division of the county, and for the more convenient arrangement of the business of such assizes, causes for trial at Liverpool and Manchester respectively, might be entered provisionally at the office of the acting prothonotary and associate at Preston, on such days previous to the commencement of such assizes as might by the acting prothonotary and associate be appointed in that behalf, and further, that causes entered provisionally should stand in the list as actually entered for trial, unless withdrawn before the commencement of the entry on the commission day at assizes.

The plaintiff incurred charges in entering the cause provisionally for trial at the Liverpool Spring Assizes 1869. Between the date of such entry and the commission day, Mellor, J. made an order at chambers, at the instance of the defendant, for the issue of a commission to examine witnesses at Bombay, and the trial did not in consequence take place at the spring assizes. The application for the commission had in the first instance been made to a master, who refused it, upon which the defendant appealed to the judge. On the appeal nothing was said about the costs of it. Upon the return of the commission the defendant withdrew his pleas, and it was arranged judgment should go by default. Upon the taxation of costs the master refused to allow the plaintiff the costs of the provisional entry of the cause at Liverpool, on the ground that the entry had been rendered useless, and that where a cause had been so entered, and in consequence of some act done or order made before the commission day the trial did not take place, the plaintiff was not entitled to charge the defendant the expense of entering the case. The master allowed plaintiff all costs of the proceedings at chambers with reference to the commission down to the refusal of the commission by the master, but refused to allow the plaintiff the costs of the appeal to the judge, on the ground that it was like proceedings in a court of error when the judgment of the court below is reversed, and each party left to pay his own costs of appeal. In reference to both those matters it was now sought to review the taxation.

By the 4th section of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 68, the Act to provide for the better dispatch of business in the chambers of the judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law, it is enacted

Every order or decision made or given under the Act by any master sitting at chambers, shall be as valid and binding on all parties concerned, as if the same had been made or given before the passing of this Act by a judge sitting at chambers: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for any person affected by any order or decision of the master, forthwith, or within such time as from time to time shall be appointed by any rule or rules to be made under this Act, and subject to such conditions as to costs as may be provided under any such rule or rules, to appeal from such decision to a judge sitting at chambers.

The Rules of Michaelmas 1867, made under the Act provide that "the costs of such appeal shall be in the discretion of the judge."

Lord showed cause against the rule, and contended that the master had rightly disallowed the items in question.

Herschell supported the rule.—If the master be right as to the costs of entering the cause all the advantages intended to be secured by the judges of assize will be lost. [The Court intimated that they were with him as to this item.] Then with reference to the costs of the appeal to the judge at chambers it is true that the costs are in the discretion of the judge, but it is the established practice at chambers that if a judge makes an order simply dealing with the matter in question, and says nothing as to costs, the costs are taken to be costs in the cause. In this case there is no injustice in this. The result of the commission showed that the evidence the defendant wished to obtain was useless, for he withdrew his pleas on its return. He cited Pugh v. Carr, 6 M & W. 20.

CHANNELL, B.—We are all agreed that as to the second item the party is not entitled to any relief. Whether any such inveterate practice as Mr. Herschell alleges existed with reference to the business at chambers or not, a new order of things is now called into existence. The Act provides that there may be an appeal from the decision of the master to a judge, and that the costs of such appeal shall be in the discretion of the judge. The judge in this case did not provide for the costs at all. He was never asked to exercise, and never did exercise, any discretion.

REG. v. RITSON AND ANOTHER.

Forgery—Deed—Ante-dating.

R. made an equitable deposit of title-deeds with G. for 730l., and afterwards assigned all his property to B. for the benefit of his creditors. He and his assignee B. then, for an additional advance, conveyed to G. the freehold of the property to which the deeds so deposited related. After this the prisoner R. executed a deed of assignment to the other prisoner of a large part of the land so conveyed to G. for a long term of years; but this deed was falsely ante-dated before the conveyance by R. and B. to G., and upon this deed the prisoners resisted G.'s title to possession of this part of the land:

Held, that this deed so ante-dated for the purpose of defrauding G., amounted to forgery.

Case reserved for the opinion of the court by Hayes, J.

The prisoners were indicted before me at the last Manchester assizes under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 20, for forging a deed with intent to defraud James Gardner.

William Ritson was the father of Samuel Ritson, and was a builder. He had been entitled to certain building land at Heaton Norris in Lancashire, which had been conveyed to him in fee, and he had borrowed on the security of it of the prosecutor, James Gardner, more than 730*l.*, for which advances he had given on the 10th Jan. 1868, an equitable mortgage by written agreement and deposit of title-deeds.

On the 5th May 1868, William Ritson executed a deed under the Bankruptcy Act of 1861, conveying all his real and personal estate to James Booth, a trustee, for the benefit of creditors, and on the 7th May 1868 by deed between James Booth, the trustee, of the first part, and William Ritson of the second part, and the said James Gardner of the third part, reciting the said deed of assignment, and that James Gardner had become mortgagee of the said building land, and that there was then due to him 789*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* for principal and interest, and that the said James Booth and William Ritson having caused a valuation to be made had ascertained that the said sum was in excess of the value of the said hereditaments, and that there were some building materials on the land not fixed to the freehold, and that it had been agreed between the parties to the deed to convey the land and assign the materials for 50*l.* to the said James Gardner. It was witnessed that the said James Booth and William Ritson in consideration of the said sum paid as therein mentioned (viz., 49*l.* to Booth and 1*l.* to William Ritson), did respectively grant, convey, and confirm unto the said James Gardner the said freehold land (subject to the two indentures therein mentioned, being previous conveyances to other parties by the said William Ritson of two small plots thereof), and all the estate, claim, and demand of the said James Booth and William Ritson therein to and to the use of the said James Gardner, his heirs, and assigns for ever, with a covenant from the said James Booth and William Ritson, that they or one of them had full power to grant the said lands and hereditaments as aforesaid free from all incumbrances, except as appeared by the said deed, but which deed contained no mention of the deed found to be a forgery as after mentioned but only mentioned the conveyance of the said two small plots.

After the execution of the said conveyance to the prosecutor he entered into possession of the ground so conveyed to him.

About March 1869 the prosecutor had buildings erecting on adjoining land, and had employed William Ritson as a builder, and had given him permission to erect a shed on part of the ground so conveyed as aforesaid, which was done. The prosecutor afterwards wished to have it removed; but the two Ritsons, the son being then working with his father, refused to do so, and the prosecutor removed it himself. On the 20th April 1869 the prosecutor received a letter from a solicitor written on behalf of Samuel Ritson, claiming title to the land, and complaining of prosecutor having trespassed thereon by pulling down a building, and offering to show the deed under which Samuel Ritson claimed. And on the 26th April a writ in an action of trespass, at the suit of Samuel Ritson, was sued out and served on the prosecutor. The prosecutor then saw the attorney for Samuel Ritson, who produced the deed charged as a forged deed, and the prosecutor commenced the prosecution against the two prisoners before the magistrates.

This deed is dated the 12th March 1868, the date being before William Ritson's deed of assignment and the conveyance to the prosecutor, and purports to be made between William Ritson of the one part, and Samuel Ritson of the other part; it recites the original conveyance in fee to William Ritson, and that William Ritson had agreed with Samuel Ritson for a lease to him of part of the land, at a yearly rent of 18*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, and then professes to demise to Samuel Ritson a large part of the frontage, and most valuable part of the land, which had been equitably mortgaged and afterwards conveyed to the prosecutor, as mentioned above, for the term of 999 years from the 25th March then inst. The said deed contained no notice of any title legal or equitable, of the prosecutor, and contained the usual covenants between a lessor and lessee. It was executed by both William and Samuel Ritson, and professes to have been attested by a witness; but such witness was not called at the trial, nor was any evidence given as to the professional man or other person by whom the deed was prepared. Although the date of the deed was the 12th March 1868, it was proved by the stamp distributor who had issued the stamp, that it was not in fact issued from the office by him before the 7th Jan. 1869, nor was the deed ever mentioned by the prisoners before that year.

It was contended on the part of the prosecutor that the deed was a forged deed, made after the prosecutor's conveyance, and ante-dated for the fraudulent purpose of over-reaching that conveyance, and so endeavouring to deprive the prosecutor of his estate under the said conveyance, and of a considerable part of the property for a long term, and leaving only a valueless reversion in him in such part of the property. And in support of this view the counsel for the prosecution cited 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 21, p. 263, 8th edit.; and Salway v. Wale, Moo. 655; 5 Eliz. c. 14; and 2 Russ. Cr., 4th edit., 719; and see 3 Inst. 169, Bac. Ab. "Forgery."

The counsel for the prisoners contended that the deed could not be a forgery, as it was really executed by the parties between whom it purported to be made, and that there was no modern authority in support of the doctrine contended for by the prosecution. He also contended that the prosecutor had obtained his conveyance by fraud, and that it was void against the prisoners, and if so the lease would be rightfully made.

The jury found that there was no ground for imputing any fraud to the prosecutor with regard to his security and conveyance, and I having expressed an opinion in conformity with the authorities cited on the part of the prosecution, and informed the jury that if the alleged lease was executed after the prosecutor's conveyance, and ante-dated with the purpose of defrauding him, it would be a forgery.

The jury found both the prisoners guilty.

And in pursuance of the request of the prisoners' counsel, I reserved the question whether the prisoners were properly convicted of forgery under the circumstances, for the opinion of this court.

G. HAYES.

Torr, for the prisoners.—The ruling of the learned judge at the trial was wrong, and the conviction cannot be sustained. The authorities cited for the prosecution were very ancient, and it is submitted that they cannot be supported at the present day. The authority of Lord Coke in the 3rd Inst. 169 is his comment on the stat. 5 Eliz. c. 14, which enacts, "If any person or persons, upon his or their own head or imagination, or by false conspiracy or fraud, shall wittingly, subtilly, and falsely forge or make, or subtilly cause or wittingly assent to be forged or made, any false charter, deed, or writing, sealed, &c., to the intent (inter alia) that the right title or interest of any person or persons of in or to tenements or hereditaments, freehold or copyhold, may be molested," &c. Lord Coke, in commenting on the words "or make," says, "These be larger words than to forge, for one may make a false writing within this Act, though it be not forged in the name of another, nor his seal nor hand counterfeited. As if A. make a true deed of feoffment under his hand and seal of the manor of Dale unto B., and B., or some other, raze out D the first letter of Dale, and put in S, and then where the true deed was of the manor of Dale, now it is falsely altered and made the manor of Sale. This is a false writing under seal within the purview of this statute. To forge is metaphorically taken from the smith who beateth upon his anvil and forgeth what fashion or shape he will." The case of Salway v. Wale, is no doubt an authority that to alter, by antedating a deed, is a forgery if it prejudices any third person's estate. The deed in the present case was not a forgery or false deed; it was made by the parties between whom it purports to be made, and there was no alteration in it at all. It may be a void instrument, but it is not a forgery. [MARTIN, B.—Mr. Russell, in his work, gives this definition of forgery at common law, "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another," or, more recently, as "a false making, a making malo animo, of any written instrument for the purpose of fraud and deceit," the word "making" being considered as including every alteration of or addition to a true instrument.] It is contended that this is not a false deed, though the finding of the jury shows the date to be so. Deeds which contain false recitals or averments are not, therefore, false deeds within the provisions of the statutes relating to forgery. The present statute the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 20, enacts, "Whosoever, with intent to defraud, shall forge or alter, or shall offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, knowing the same to be forged or altered, any deed, or any bond or writing obligatory, or any assignment at law or in equity of any such bond or writing obligatory, or shall forge any name, handwriting, or signature purporting to be the name, handwriting, or signature of a witness attesting the execution of any deed, bond, or writing obligatory, or shall offer, utter, dispose of, or put off any deed, bond, or writing obligatory, having thereon any such forged name, handwriting, or signature, knowing the same to be forged, shall be guilty of felony, and, being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than three years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement." The question, therefore, is whether this deed is a forgery within the words of that statute, and it is submitted that it is not:

Addison for the prosecution.—The conviction is right, for, both upon principle and authority the making of the deed in question was a forgery. At common law the false making of a letter, or order, or guarantee, was a misdemeanor, but not a capital offence, but the false making of a deed is within all the statutes. There is the authority of Lord Coke, and the case in Moor. And Com. Dig. A. 1, "Forgery is where a man fraudulently writes or publishes a false deed or writing to the prejudice of the right of another." This was a deed fraudulently antedated to the prejudice of the prosecutor's estate in the land. So in Bac. Abr. A., "The notion of forgery doth not so much consist in the counterfeiting of a man's hand and seal, which may often be done innocently, but in the endeavouring to give an appearance of truth to a mere deceit and falsity; and either to impose that upon the world as the solemn act of another, which he is no way privy to, or, at least, to make a man's own act appear to be done at a time when it was not done, and by force of such a falsity to give it an operation, which in truth and in justice it ought not to have." That definition seems to comprehend this case.

KELLY, C. B.—I certainly entertained some doubt at one time upon this case, because most of the authorities are of an ancient date, and long before the passing of the statutes of 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, and 24 & 25 Vict. However, looking at the ancient authorities and the text-books of the highest repute, such as Com. Dig. Bacon's Abr. 3 Co. Inst, and Sir Michael Foster, they are all uniformly to the effect not that every instrument containing a false statement is a forgery, but that every instrument which is false in a material part, and which purports to be that which it is not, or to be executed by a person who is not the real person, or which purports to be dated on a day which is not the real day, whereby a false operation is given to it, is a forgery. It is impossible to distinguish the present case from the authorities cited, and therefore the conviction must be affirmed.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Torr says that this is not an ordinary instance of a deed that is a forgery. The authorities are all to the effect that it is a forgery; and in Tomlin's Dictionary I also find this passage: "Forgery may be committed by a party making a false deed in his own name, as where a party made a feoffment of lands, and dated it prior to a former deed, whereby he conveyed the same lands, for he falsifies the date in order to defraud his own feoffee."

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 24 & 25 Vict. makes it a felony if any person with intent to defraud shall forge or alter any deed, &c. The material word is "forge," and it is necessary, therefore, to see what is the meaning of forgery. It is correctly defined in Com. Dig. to be the making of any false instrument with a fraudulent intent, that is an instrument that purports, on the face of it, in some material thing to be that which it is not. Then we have Gilbert, C. B.'s definition of forgery in Bac. Abr. (see supra). In this case the false statement is in the date which, in ordinary cases, would not be material, but here, by extrinsic evidence, the false date was shown to be very material, and the forged deed would have passed the estate to another person than the prosecutor, if the deed had been executed on the day it bears date. Lord Coke, in his 3rd Inst. cites several cases from the Year Books to show that the forging a deed does apply to this very thing. The same was held in the case in Moor, and in Lewis' case in Foster, C. C. 116, and there is no authority against it. The conviction, therefore is right.

LUSH, J.—If the prisoner had put the true date to the deed in the first instance and then altered it, there could not have been a question as to its being a forgery within the statute. It seems absurd to hold that the making a deed falsely dated from the beginning, whereby a fraudulent operation is given to it, would not equally be a forgery. The Legislature used the word "forge" in the sense of the decided authorities, namely, the making of a deed which purports to be that which it is not.

ARCHES COURT.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 19.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, Dean of Arches.)

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER v. WIX.

Resignation of bishop, the promoter in a suit—32 & 33 Vict. c. 111 — Abatement — Amendment — Common law.

A bishop, the promoter in proceedings against a clerk charged with an ecclesiastical offence, sent the case by letters of request to the Arches Court. Afterwards the bishop, acting under the provisions of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 111, resigned his see.

On a petition by the defendant to be dismissed from further proceedings:

Held, that the proceedings did not abate on the resignation of the bishop; and that the title of the suit might be amended by substituting the proper description of the promoter.

Ecclesiastical courts are not governed by rules or analogies drawn from common law.

In this case the late Bishop of Winchester was the promoter of the office of the judge, the charge against the defendant being one of offences against the laws ecclesiastical by using lighted candles and burning incense during the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, in his church at Swanmore, in the Isle of Wight; the offence charged being a contravention of the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 503. The articles in the present suit were filed on July 7; on Oct. 28 the late Bishop of Winchester sent in a representation of his desire to resign to the archbishop of his province. Such representation was made under the provisions of the Act of last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 111), which by sect. 2 provides that "on a representation being made to her Majesty in manner hereinafter mentioned, that any archbishop or bishop in England is desirous of resigning his archbishopric or bishopric by reason that he is incapacitated by age or some mental or permanent physical infirmity from the due performance of his duties as archbishop or bishop, it shall be lawful for her Majesty, if satisfied of such incapacity and that such archbishop or bishop has canonically resigned, by order in council to declare such archbishopric or bishopric to be vacant, and thereupon such vacancy may be filled up in the same manner and with the same incidents in all respects as if such archbishop or bishop were dead. . . . (And) for the purposes of this section a representation shall be made to her Majesty, in the case of a bishop desirous of resigning, by the archbishop of the province at the instance of the bishop," &c.

On Nov. 11, her Majesty, by order in council, accordingly declared the see vacant. On the previous day (Nov. 10) a petition was filed in the Court of Arches, praying that the defendant might be dismissed from the suit, on the ground that the suit had abated by reason of the resignation of the bishop, the promoter. This was met by an application on behalf of the promoter, that the title of the suit might be amended by striking out the description of the promoter as "the Bishop of Winchester," and substituting "the Rev. Charles Sumner, D.D., late Bishop of Winchester."

Arthur Charles, for the defendant, contended that the suit was instituted by the bishop, not in his individual, but in his episcopal character. He had sent the case at once by letters of request to the Court of Arches, while, under the Church Discipline Act, had the promoter been a private person, the ordinary course would have been for the bishop to grant a commission of inquiry as to the charge against the defendant. It was submitted that the suit abated by the resignation under the statute, just as it would have done had the bishop died. The Privy Council had decided that "letters of request constitute the vehicle by which the case is to be brought before the court, and when brought thither it must be proceeded with as of right," but here he would contend that there was no cause before the court. Doubtless the court was not bound by the rules of common law, but it would proceed on analogy with that law when reasonable to do so. That the resignation would have abated the suit at common law was clear from the authority of Comyn's Digest (title Abatement, H. 44, 46), where it was laid down that accepting the office of archbishop or bishop, pending the writ, by the plaintiff or demandant, would abate the suit; and so on deposition or resignation. It might be said that the present was a criminal proceeding, but in form it was a civil proceeding, and there had been nothing to vary the practice of this court, in respect of abatement, from that at common law, prior to the recent Common Law Procedure Acts. As to the application to amend, it would be submitted that, though the court had a discretion so to do, that discretion would not be exercised under the circumstances of the case.

Dr. Deane, Q. C., and Dr. Tristram, for the promoter, argued that the letters of request were the mere vehicle for bringing the case before the court at once, and the moment that was done, the promoter's functions, quâ bishop, were at an end. It might be that the suit would have abated by the natural death of the promoter, but that would have been because then there would have been no one before the court responsible for costs. But here the promoter, though no longer a bishop, would be before the court still in his private capacity. The charge in the suit would be one of form only, in the mere description of a party. The defendant could not be in any way prejudiced should the court refuse to allow that the suit had abated, nor by the amendment proposed. Arguments drawn from the old common law could have no weight with a court not bound by common law rules, especially when, as here, the common law relied on had been found in practice inconvenient, and had been altered by repeated statutes.

Charles replied.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE (Dean of Arches) in giving jugment said:—Two applications are before the court; one, on behalf of the defendant that he may be dismissed from all further proceedings, on the ground that by reason of the promoter's resignation of his office as bishop the suit has abated; and the other, on behalf of the promoter of the suit that an amendment of the title might be made. As a matter of practice the case is not easy to decide, since no precedent can be found directly in point. But the principle applicable to it is clear. There are two questions, has the court any discretion? And, if it has, ought that discretion to be exercised? Mr. Charles's argument, urging abatement, was an able one, but as was said in the case of Sherwood v. Ray, 1 Moo. 397, P. C., "the proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts are not favoured by the rules of the common law, or any analogies that they furnish." A fortiori, rules would not be adopted from the common law so as to guide the practice of this court, when the common law relied on was in a very imperfect state, and had been found to work so much injustice by its strict rules as to abatement, that those rules were altogether altered by several statutes. The case has been sent to this court by letters of request in proper form, and this court has accepted them. The bishop, doubtless, had more courses than one open to him, but he has adopted this, of promoting the office of the judge in his own person. The bishop was thereby promoting not his (the bishop's) office, but that of the Dean of Arches, as the official judge for the Archbishop of Canterbury: (see per Lord Stowell in Maidman v. Malpas, 1 Hagg. Consist. 210.) The question is a simple one, whether, the promoter having undergone a change of description or title, the suit ought to abate? It is doubtful whether the court has any discretion in the matter, but if it has, I should, without hesitation, decide that for the interests of the Church it would be better not to allow a mere technical point to prevail. I therefore order that the petition of the defendant to be dismissed from further proceedings be refused, and that the promoter's application for an amendment in the title of the suit be granted. As the promoter has not moved for this amendment at once on his resignation, he must pay the costs.

Dr. Deane objected to the order as to costs. The defendant's petition was too soon. The see was not vacant, under the statute, by the canonical resignation, but by the order in council declaring the see vacant. The date of the order in council was Nov. 11, while the defendant's petition was on the previous day.

After some discussion, the Dean of Arches said that he should reserve the question of costs.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT—IN ADMIRALTY.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE STEAMSHIP RUSSIA.

Collision—Jurisdiction—Inevitable accident—Vessel at anchor.

Where a collision occurred in the harbour of New York, between the British steamer Russia and the Austrian ship Figlia Maggiore, by which the latter was sunk, and the Russia being libelled in this court, was arrested within its jurisdiction, the witnesses, some of them being residents of New York, and there being in the case no special question arising under any local law of either Great Britain or Austria:

Held, that the court had jurisdiction, and that there were no circumstances in the case which called upon the court to refuse to exercise it.

Where the ship, lying at anchor in a proper position, was run into by the steamship as she came in from sea, and the steamship alleged that the accident was inevitable, arising out of the fact that the steamship did not obey her helm, and it appeared that her not obeying her helm was caused by the meeting of two tides, causing a tide-rip, which would affect her helm as she entered it, but the tide-rip was well-known and plainly to be seen, and its course, and character and action upon a vessel entering it, were not fortuitous, or varrying, or uncertain:

Held, that the defence of inevitable accident was not made out, but the collision was, on the other hand, the result of negligence on the part of the steamship in not guarding against the effect of the tide.

BLATCHFORD, J.—This is a libel filed by the owners of the Austrian ship Figlia Maggiore, against the British steamship Russia, to recover for the damages caused to the ship and her cargo by a collision between her and the Russia, which took place in the harbour of New York, off the Battery, on May 25, about eleven o'clock a.m. The Figlia Maggiore arrived in port the day previous, from Marseilles, with a valuable cargo, and came to anchor off the battery at a place designated by her pilot, and was at anchor at the same place at the time of the collision. The Russia was coming in from sea on a voyage from Liverpool, and was bound to her wharf at Jersey City. The libel alleges that the Figlia Maggiore anchored from 300 to 400 yards distant from the battery, and at a place usual and customary for vessels to anchor. The tide was ebb, and the weather was clear. The ship's stern was sailing down towards the direction from which the Russia was approaching. The stem of the Russia struck the port side of the ship between the main mizzen rigging, angling somewhat forwards, and crushed her in so that she sunk in less than ten minutes, with all the property on board. The defence set up in the answer to show no fault in the navigation of the Russia, is that, owing to the crowded state of the middle and west side of the North River, the Russia was compelled to go over towards the battery; that when she was within a sufficient distance of the Figlia Maggiore her helm was starboarded, so as to cause her to pass on the port side of the Figlia Maggiore, but that, owing to an eddy which the tide made in that place, she did not mind her helm; that her engines were reversed, and her headway had been nearly stopped when the collision happened; that at the place where the accident occurred the tide makes eddies that are very irregular in their position, direction, and strength, and that it is impossible to foresee when and in what manner they will affect the course of a vessel getting into them. The case is thus sought to be made, on the part of the Russia, one of inevitable accident; and, to attempt to sustain such a view, testimony was put in on the part of the Russia as to the action of the tides from the north and east rivers at their junction. Griffiths, a Sandy Hook pilot, testifies that the ebb tide begins to run out of the East River about an hour and a half before it begins to run out of the North River; that at about half tide or about three hours ebb, which was the state of the tide at the time of the collision, it ordinarily runs out of the East River at the rate of about two knots and a half per hour; that at that time it runs out of the North River at the rate of about one knot and a half per hour; that at that time the two tides meet on a line drawn from the flagstaff at the battery to Bedlow's Island, the direction of the line being south-west by south; that as the tide from the East River runs about west-south-west, and that from the North river runs about south. and against it a regular bulkhead is formed, and a very large ripple is made, that a vessel on striking it is generally slewed around by it to the eastward or the westward, dependent upon how she strikes it; that at the first of the ebb the line of the tide-rip is up towards Castle Garden; that as the North River tide comes down, such line is forced down across the mouth of the East River, until, at half-tide, it runs about south-west by south, as before stated; that a vessel striking into that tide-rip will not mind her helm until she gets a length into it; and that the pilots generally try to keep out of such tide-rip. On cross-examination, he testifies that the rip is easily seen, and that it is risky getting into it. This testimony is confirmed by Van Pelt and Bloodgood, witnesses for the claimants, the former a Sandy Hook pilot, and the latter the master of a steam-tug. The latter also says, that if a vessel having slight way on her, runs heading up the North River, across the mouth of the East River at the stage of ebb tide referred to, her head will turn to the starboard exactly with the tide, from the East River. This testimony condemns the Russia instead of excusing her. In attempting to enter such a tide-rip, with a vessel at anchor as the Figlia Maggiore was, on her starboard hand, and near her course, she assumed all the risk of avoiding such vessel. The tide-rip was plainly to be seen, and its course, and character, and action upon a vessel entering it were not fortuitous, or varying or uncertain, but were, on the evidence, things to be foreseen and therefore, to be guarded against. To enter such a tide-rip, was to take, in respect to vessels at anchor ahead, all the risks of so navigating through it, as not to collide with such vessels. She entered it at an angle, so that, as the tide from the North River struck her on her port bow, the tide from the east River acted on her starboard side, and the effect was to sheer her head to starboard, although her helm was starboarded, and with the way she had on, to shoot her stern on, off to starboard, against the Figlia Maggiore. Another point raised in the answer remains to be noticed. It is, that as both of the vessels are foreign vessels, not owned by the citizens of the United States, this court ought not to entertain jurisdiction of the cause of action set forth in the libel. It is not maintained that this court is without jurisdiction of this suit, but it is urged that it ought not to busy itself with deciding a controversy between foreign vessels and foreigners. This case being one of a collision on navigable waters in the harbour of New York, is a civil case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and, therefore, within the cognisance of this court by virtue of the 9th section of the Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789 (1 U. S. Stat. at Large, 77), the Russia having been attached within the territorial jurisdiction of this court: (The Propeller Commerce, 1 Black. 474; The Belfast, 7 Wall. 624, 637, to 642.) The ground urged why this court should not exercise jurisdiction in this case is, that although it may have power to hear and determine this suit, it will regard the circumstances of the case as rendering it unfit that it should hear and determine it, because the libellant and the claimants are not citizens of the United States, and the colliding vessels are both of them foreign vessels. It is supposed that the court ought, from motives of international comity, delicacy, and convenience, to decline the suit, and it is maintained that justice does not require this court to interpose in favour of the foreign libellants. Although on these principles the Court of Admiralty forbears as a general usage to exercise its jurisdiction over controversies between foreign seamen and shipmasters (The Napoleon, Olcott's R. 208, 215), or over suits brought by foreign seamen against master or owners, being also foreigners, or against foreign vessels (Davis v. Leslie, 1 Abbott's Adm. R. 123, 134; Bucher v. Klogeter, H. 402, 405), yet the principle upon such court proceeds in determining in any case whether to exercise such jurisdiction or not is to inquire whether the rights of the parties will best be promoted by retaining and disposing of the case, or by remitting it to a foreign tribunal: (One hundred and ninety-four shawls, 1 Abbott's Adm. R. 317, 323 to 326.) I am not aware that jurisdiction, in a case of collision, has ever been declined by any court of Admiralty, either in the United States or in Great Britain, because the two colliding vessels were the property of foreign subjects. In the case of the Johann Friedrich: 1 W. Rob. 35, 37, which was a case in rem prosecuted in the High Court of Admiralty in England, on a collision in the high seas, between Dover and Dungeness, between a Danish vessel and a Bremen vessel, whereby the Danish vessel with a cargo on board belonging to British subjects was sunk and totally lost, Dr. Lushington said:—"It has also been said, in the course of the argument, that this court is not desirous of exercising its jurisdiction between foreigners; and, in support of this doctrine, some observations of Lord Stowell, in cases of seamen's wages, have been cited. But it appears to me that the cases cited are distinguishable from the present for the following reason—that all questions of collision are questions of communis juris, but, in cases of mariners' wages, whoever engages voluntarily to serve on board a foreign ship, necessarily undertakes to be bound by the law of the country to which such ship belongs, and the legality of the claim must be tried by such law. One of the most important distinctions, therefore, respecting cases where both parties are foreigners is, whether the case be communis juris or not." Again, he said (p. 38):—"If these parties must wait until the vessel that has done the injury returned to its own country, their remedy might be altogether lost, for she might never return at all; and, if she did return, there is no part of the world so distant to which they might not be sent for their redress. . . . From these considerations it is perfectly clear that a refusal to exercise the jurisdiction of the court in these cases would, in effect, amount to a total denial of justice." In conclusion the judge stated the following to be the grounds on which he exercised jurisdiction in the case. "First, that all causes of collision are causes communis juris; secondly, that the vessel at the time of her arrest was within Admiralty jurisdiction; thirdly, that the collision took place upon the high seas, close upon the English coast." He added, "If it had been necessary, I could have cited several authorities in support of the general jurisdiction of the court. But I decide the question on the grounds I have stated without taking into my consideration the circumstance that was adverted to in argument, that the cargo on board was the property of British subjects. This fact is undoubtedly of considerable importance, inasmuch as I am at a loss to conceive how I could refuse jurisdiction, and send the British owners to a foreign country, and what an anomaly would occur if in a transitory action, I could do justice to one set of owners and refuse it to another." In the case of the Griefswald (Swa. 430, 435), Dr. Lushington says, "In cases of collision it has been the practice of this country, and so far as I know of the European States and of the United States of America to allow a party alleging grievance by a collision to proceed in rem against the ship wherever found." In the present case no reasons exist why this court should decline jurisdiction. The case is one of collision. The Russia has been arrested within the jurisdiction of this court. The collision took place in the harbour of New York. Several of the witnesses on both sides belong in New York, and were not on board of either vessel. There is no special question arising under the local laws either of Great Britain or of Austria to be determined in this case. These considerations, independently of the fact stated on the trial that some of the cargo of the Figlia Maggiore belonged to citizens of the United States—a fact which is, however, not averred in the libel or shown by proof—induce the court to regard this case as one in which it is eminently proper and conducive to justice that it should exercise the jurisdiction invoked by the libellant. There must, therefore, be a decree for the libellant, with costs. The reference to ascertain the damages will include damage to the cargo as well as to the vessel, the former being claimed in the libel to be recovered by the libellant as carrier in possession at the time the damage was done: The Propeller Commerce, 1 Black. 574, 582; The Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wallace, 50–52.)

TAYLOR v. THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Action for injuries caused by falling down an opening unprotected—Liability for negligence.

In an action for injuries caused to the plaintiff by his falling down an opening in the saloon of a steamer in which he was a passenger, and which was unguarded:

Held, that as he was there lawfully, and in the ordinary course of things would not expect any opening in the floor of a saloon, the company, owners of the steamer, were liable for the neyligence implied in the absence of any protection or precaution.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was a passenger on board a steamer of the defendants' for hire and reward, and that by reason of their wrongfully and negligently allowing the opening in the floor of the saloon to be left unguarded the plaintiff fell down through the opening into the saloon, and was grieviously injured.

Plea: Not guilty.

Hawkins, Q. C. and Keane, Q. C., for the plaintiff.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., and W. Williams for the company.

The plaintiff had taken his passage by one of the company's steamers, and went on board. He went to the saloon into which the doors of the cabins open, and saw a clerk, of whom he asked which was his berth. He was directed to a certain cabin, and going towards it he fell through an opening in the floor into the hold beneath, and was grievously and permanently injured. The light was dim, and there was no one to warn him, nor was there any protection. It appeared that the hold beneath was what is called the bullion hold, and that some of the crew were actually at the time engaged in loading, two being in the hold and one above, sending down packages, while an officer sat close to the opening keeping a tally of the packages passed down. Upon these facts it was urged that there no negligence, or that the plaintiff had contributed to the accident by want of proper care and attention. On the other hand it was urged that no one spoke to him to caution him, and that as he was going along looking for the number of his cabin he would naturally not have his eyes on the floor, nor expect a dangerous opening in it.

COCKBURN, C. J. in summing up the case to the jury, left two points to them, first, whether there was negligence on the part of the company's servants leading to the accident; and, next, whether there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff himself which contributed to the result. If the jury should think that the plaintiff was rightfully on board, and that it was in the usual course that he should be in the saloon, the defendants were certainly bound either to keep that part of the ship in a reasonable state of safety, or to give the passengers notice and warning of any unusual danger; and it was incumbent upon all the company's servants to warn the plaintiff when they saw him rushing into danger. In his opinion, he said, there was nothing unreasonable in the plaintiff being in the saloon looking after his berth, nor anything careless in his walking along, looking, as he naturally would, rather at the numbers at the cabin doors than at his feet, as he would hardly expect that there would be a dangerous aperture in the floor. However it was for the jury whether there had been any negligence on his part, and whether the accident was caused by his negligence or the company's.

DARLING v. COOPER; BEAUCHAMP v. THE SAME.

False imprisonment and malicious prosecution—Reasonable cause—Evidence of malice.

farmer having lost two trusses of straw, and finding the plaintiffs soon afterwards at a place some two or three miles distant with some loose straw in a cart, gave them into custody, with some expression of irritation, and prosecuted them for stealing it:

Held, that if the straw were of the same kind as that lost, and in particular if it were clean and new, there was probable cause for suspicion; but if otherwise, there was not probable cause; and if the jury thought that he had acted under irritation, rashly, and rather under the influence of angry feeling than with reasonable care or due inquiry, there was evidence of malice on a count for malicious prosecution.

These were two actions for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution arising out of the same transaction, and tried by consent together. The defendant was a farmer at Egham, and had lost two trusses of straw. Shortly afterwards he was told that two men (the plaintiffs) were then going towards Brentford in a cart with clean wheat straw in it. He pursued and overtook them, and finding in the cart some loose straw, he gave them into custody at Brentford for stealing it, and they were locked up and brought before the magistrate, when, through some mistake he did not attend, and they were discharged. He was proved to have said that he would spend what the straw cost in prosecuting them, and he went before the magistrate and got a warrant against them, in Surrey, upon which they were again arrested and prosecuted and sent to trial, when they were acquitted. They then brought these actions without notice.

(a) Sir J. Karslake moved, but took nothing.

There was contradictory evidence as to the weight, worth, and condition of the straw found in the plaintiffs' cart. According to their account it was loose refuse straw such as was ordinarly taken from farmyards. According to the defendant's evidence it was 50lb. of clean new straw.

It did not appear upon the plaintiffs' evidence that they had said where they got the straw; but that they gave the same account to the defendant at the time, and it was confirmed by the police.

Thesiger objected, first, that there was a misjoinder of action, or a mistrial, the first imprisonment having taken place in Middlesex, and the second in Surrey, and both being local; secondly, that there was no evidence of malice; thirdly, that there ought to have been notice of action.

BRAMWELL, B., however, declined to stop the case.

At the close of the case,

The learned JUDGE, in summing up the case to the jury, said it belonged to a class of cases which were of some importance, because, as there was no ordinary public prosecutor in this country, and criminal prosecutions were ordinarily in the hands of private persons, it was important that the protection which on that account the law threw around private prosecutors should be maintained and upheld. The public (he said) are greatly interested in prosecutors being protected, so long as they honestly intend only to pursue the law, and act upon reasonable grounds. In the present instance, as regarded the justification for the arrest, the defendant had acted hastily, at his own peril, in giving the plaintiffs into custody on the charge of stealing, without any reasonable inquiry; and with nothing beyond the mere fact of finding straw in their possession. The defendant might have been honestly satisfied that the straw was his; but a man had no right to be satisfied in such a case when he might make further inquiry. As regarded the maintenance of the action, he said he could not put the question better than in the words of Williams, J.: "Did the defendant honestly and reasonably believe in the existence of those facts which, if they had existed, would have afforded a justification?" As regarded the count for malicious prosecution, he told the jury, as matter of law, that if they were satisfied the defendant reasonably believed that two trusses of straw had been stolen from him, and that he very soon afterwards found in the plaintiffs' cart such straw as he had lost, there would be reasonable cause for the prosecution, and therefore, in that view of the case, the action would not be maintainable on that count. Whether that were so or not would mainly depend upon the view the jury might take of the facts, and especially as to whether or not the straw was clean and new. If so, then there would be a reasonable cause for the prosecution, and the count on that view failed. If otherwise, then arose the question of malice, and even though there was no reasonable cause for the prosecution, still the action would not be maintainable unless the prosecution was also malicious. It will not be enough (he said) that it appears that the prosecutor was in the wrong; it must appear that he was maliciously so, that is, obstinately and improperly in the wrong, through anger, ill feeling, or any improper motive or feeling, any motive different from a mere honest desire to put the law in force. There is some evidence of the existence of anger on the part of the prosecutor. It is for the jury to say (if they disbelieved his evidence) whether it amounts to evidence of an improper motive. If the prosecutor acted honestly, without any bad motive, and also had a reasonable belief on which he acted, then he is entitled to the verdict, for the law does not allow a private prosecutor to be made liable merely on account of a mistake or error in judgment; nor unless he acted maliciously or without reasonable cause. And as there has been no notice of action, the question arises substantially upon the whole case. Did the defendant act, honestly and reasonably?

PHELPS v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Action against railway company for negligence—Evidence of negligence.

In an action for an injury caused to a passenger on a railway, by alleged negligence of the railway company's servants, it is necessary for the plaintiff to make out that the injury arose from causes which involved negligence on their part. And if the evidence leaves that point in doubt, the company are entitled to the verdict. Thus, where the carriage had broken from its fastenings and gone off the line, and thus had caused the injury; and it was a point in dispute upon the evidence whether this had arisen from insufficient fastening, or from a breakage caused by a latent flaw in the iron, the jury were directed that if they were in doubt upon this point the company were entitled to the verdict.

Action for injury to the plaintiff while travelling as a passenger on the company's line, caused, as alleged, by the carelessness of the company's servants. The declaration stated that the defendants were carriers of passengers for hire, and that the plaintiff became a passenger to be carried by them for reward; but that the defendants were guilty of negligence in this, that they used and employed and continued to use and employ, carriages and engines which were not reasonably safe and proper; and that the railway was not in reasonable repair, whereby the carriage in which the plaintiff was travelling became broken and damaged and the plaintiff was injured.

Plea: not guilty.

Hawkins and J. P. Murphy, for the plaintiff.

Ballantine and Lanyon, for the company.

In Nov. 1868 the plaintiff was a passenger by one of the company's trains from Colchester. He observed that the carriage in which he was rocked and jolted very much, and he complained of it. After this the jolting still continued, until, all of a sudden, a violent bumping occurred, and the carriage went off the line, and one of the tires was broken. He was thrown violently from side to side, and sustained severe injuries. In Dec. 1868 he made a claim to the company for compensation, but they took no notice of it beyond referring it to the superintendent. In May 1869 he made a claim for compensation to the amount of 1500l.; and on the 30th June there was a minute in the board book that the law clerk be directed to settle the claim on the best terms possible. The case for the plaintiff was that the accident had arisen from insufficient coupling, as shown by the jolting, and that from that cause the carriage had broken loose, and gone off the line. And the direction to the law clerk was also relied upon as an admission of liability.

The case for the company, in defence, was that the accident had arisen from causes over which they had no control. It was proved that the carriage was made in 1863, and put into repair in Oct. 1868 (the accident occurring in the next month); and further, that new wheels had been put on three weeks before the accident. The engine driver was called to prove that he had duly examined the wheels and tires just before the journey, and found them apparently quite sound and safe. It was proved that the pieces of the broken tire were found on the line some distance above the spot where the engine was found to have gone off the line, and reliance was placed upon this as showing that the breaking of the tire had happened first, and was the cause and not the effect of the carriage going off the line. Moreover, evidence was given that in fact there was a flaw in the metal of the tire as disclosed by the fracture, and skilled evidence was given to show that a carriage could not have broken its tire from its having gone off the line, and could not have gone off the line through insufficient fastening or from jolting, and that the more violent bumping described by the plaintiff was caused by the carriage going over the sleepers after it had broken loose. Finally, there was evidence of experts that in fact the carriage had gone off the line through the breaking of the tire.

Kelly, C. B., in summing up to the jury, said that it was for the plaintiff to make out his case, and to show that the accident arose from such cause as would cast the liability upon the company; in other words, that it arose from the negligence of their servants. And if the evidence left this point in doubt they must find for the company. Unhappily it appeared that the evidence did leave that point in doubt, and what was clear was that the carriage had gone off the line; but the great question was how this had happened, and upon that the evidence was contradictory; and if the evidence, on the whole, was as consistent with the case for the company as for the plaintiff the case was left in doubt. The case for the company was founded upon the proposition that if the accident had arisen from a latent defect or flaw in the iron they would not be liable, and no doubt that was so. Then there was evidence to show that the accident could not have arisen from the cause suggested by the plaintiff, but had arisen from the breaking of the tire by reason of a secret flaw in the metal. If that were so, or even if it were left in doubt, the company were entitled to the verdict. With regard to the alleged admission of liability, it was not conclusive; though it certainly was fit for consideration, as tending to show a consciousness on the part of the company and their servants that they were in the wrong, though it might only have been the result of prudential considerations. The question then was whether the jury were satisfied that the injury had arisen from causes over which the company had control, and had been caused by the negligence of their servants. If not so satisfied they must find for the company.

Verdict for the company.

Reg. v. Williamson.

False pretences—Misrepresentation as to value of business—A false representation as to the value of a business will not sustain an indictment for obtaining money by false pretences.

On an indictment for obtaining money by false pretences, it appeared that the prisoner, on engaging an assistant from whom he received a deposit, represented to him that he was doing a good business, and that he had sold a good business for a certain large sum, whereas the business was worthless, and he had been bankrupt.

Held, that the indictment could not be sustained upon either of the representations.

Indictment for obtaining money from one S. by means of false pretences, the pretences laid being, (1) that the prisoner was then doing a good business; (2) that he said that he had sold a good business for 300*l.*; (3) that it was necessary for his safety, if he engaged S. as his assistant, that he should have from him a deposit of 50*l.*

There was a second indictment charging that the prisoner obtained money from one W., by falsely pretending, (1) that he was then doing a business with returns of 100*l.* a week; (2) that he had sold a business for 300*l.*

Lilley for the prosecutor.

Oppenheim for the prisoner.

On the first indictment the prosecutor, S., who had been engaged by the prisoner as assistant, was called to prove the representations, and to show that upon the faith of the representation he entered into an engagement with the prisoner for a small salary and half profits, and also deposited 50*l.* as a security, whereas in truth the business was worthless, and the prisoner a bankrupt. He stated that he had deposited the money in the belief that the prisoner "had a good business."

Byles, J. (to the counsel for the prosecution.—On which of the pretences do you rely? It is like the case of a sale of a business with exaggerated representations of its value, upon which, though fraudulent, an indictment will not lie.

Lilley said he relied on the prisoner's representations that he was doing a good business, and that he had sold a business for 300*l.*

Byles, J.—The latter is too remote. You might as well go back to any former transaction of which he had given a representation—that is too remote. As to the other, have you any case in which it has been held that on the sale of a business—the vendor saying it was a good business—he has been thus indicted? (No such case was cited.) (a) This appears to be rather a case for false representation than for a criminal prosecution.

Lilley urged that here the pretence was more entirely false than in any previous case, for the man was a bankrupt.

Byles, J.—There is no pretence laid that he was not a bankrupt. The pretence laid is that he had a good business. It is like the case of a sale of a business upon such a representation. No doubt, if the business was worthless, there was a gross exaggeration, probably fraudulent; but is it a case for an indictment for obtaining money by means of false pretences? If so, an indictment would lie in every case of a false and fraudulent representation of the value of a business. Unless some authority to the contrary can be cited, I must rule against the prosecutor.

No case being cited,

Byles, J. directed the jury to acquit the prisoner, on the ground that such a representation, although grossly fraudulent, was not the subject of a criminal proceeding.

Verdict not guilty.

No evidence was offered on the other indictment.

Re THE NATAL INVESTMENT COMPANY (LIMITED); Ex parte SNELL.

Company—Contributory—Subscriber of memorandum of association—Application for shares—Payment of deposit—Withdrawal before allotment—Power to accept surrender of shares—Companies Act 1862, s. 23.

S. applied for twenty shares in a company about to be established, and paid the required deposit money; he also signed the memorandum of association for that number of shares, and consented to act as a director. Circumstances came to his knowledge which led him to change his intention, and before any allotment of shares to him he wrote to withdraw his application, and request return of the deposit. The directors had power under the articles to accept a surrender of shares, and they returned him the money which he had paid, and from that time he had no communication from the company until after the commencement of the winding-up, nor was his name entered in the register of shareholders:

Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that S. was not liable as a contributory, although until withdrawal he had been; and that it was competent for him, under the circumstances, to surrender the shares, and for the company to accept that surrender, although his name had never, in fact, been entered as a shareholder, the 23rd section of the Companies Act 1862 having no application to a case of this description.

This was an appeal by Mr. Snell, an alleged contributory of the company, now being wound-up in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls, against an order whereby his Lordship settled his name on the list of contributories as the holder of twenty shares, under the following circumstances:

The company was incorporated in July 1864, and shortly before that time Mr. Snell was invited to take shares and to become a director, and he attended a meeting of the proposed directors, at which he consented to become a director. The necessary qualification for the directorship was the holding of twenty shares, and accordingly Mr. Snell sent in a written application for that number, and paid to the company's bankers the required deposit of 1*l.* a share. He also subscribed the memorandum of association for twenty shares, and that memorandum was then registered.

In a few weeks Mr. Snell discovered that the circumstances of the company were not such as had been represented to him when he consented to take shares and act as a director, the intention having been at that time that the company should be brought out by the Crédit Mobilier Company, an intention which it was found impossible to carry into effect. Upon making this discovery Mr. Snell at once intimated to the board his intention of resigning his seat and withdrawing his application for shares. Accordingly on the day after he had made the discovery, as he alleged, he wrote to the directors that the arrangements which they then had for establishing the company were very different from what they were represented to him to be when he consented to join the direction; he, therefore, respectfully resigned his seat at the board, and also requested the company to cancel his application for shares, and to return the amount which he had paid as deposit money, his application having been made under a misapprehension.

The board took this letter into its consideration shortly after it reached them, and on the 15th Sept. 1864 the secretary wrote to Mr. Snell, enclosing the company's cheque for 20*l.*, requesting the bankers' receipt in return. Mr. Snell received the 20*l.* from the bankers, and forwarded to the company the receipt they asked for. No shares were ever allotted to Mr. Snell; his name was never entered on the register of shareholders, and until after the winding-up order he never received any further communication from the company.

By the 38th paragraph of the articles of association, the directors were empowered to accept surrenders and forfeitures of shares; the clause will be found in the judgment, as will also the 23rd section of the Companies Act 1862, upon which the counsel for the liquidator mainly relied.

The chief clerk, however, settled Mr. Snell's name on the list, and the Master of the Rolls refused with costs his application to have it removed. Hence this appeal.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Marten supported the appeal.

Jessel, Q. C. and Fitzroy Kelly, for the liquidator of the company, resisted it, referring to Evans's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. 427; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 252.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I confess that I cannot agree with the opinion which the Master of the Rolls has expressed in this case, because, as it seems to me, there being special power in these articles enabling the directors to accept a surrender of shares, everything was done that it was requisite to do in order to sever the connection of Mr. Snell with this company. First of all, no doubt, by signing the memorandum of association (I think he signed it for twenty shares), he became to all intents and purposes a shareholder in respect of twenty shares; and no doubt, according to the strict ordinary practice, when the articles were registered, which I believe was contemporaneously with the memorandum of association, his name ought to have been entered in the register of shareholders. It was not so entered, and things went on for some time after that. Mr. Snell was a director. There was a power given to resign his directorship, and he did resign his directorship. At the same time he wrote a letter suggesting that the company was a different company to that which he supposed it was. I think there was a suggestion almost of fraud, and that he desired to sever the connection between himself and the company. That transaction no one impeaches as being otherwise than perfectly bonâ fide; and the case between himself and the directors of the company is, that there was that which amounted in reality to a severance, if severance there could be, as between him and the company. True it is, that at that time he was not registered as a shareholder; true it is that no specific shares, in point of allotting shares, had been allotted to him; but for all purposes of liability, although the shares had not been allotted to him, he was a shareholder in that company, and therefore what one has to consider is this, whether or not there was power in the directors to do that thing which was done, and whether the Act of Parliament rendered invalid what was in point of fact done, if what was done was really the true and bonâ fide intention of all parties. The articles contain this clause: "The directors may, if they think fit, at any time accept the surrender and forfeiture of his shares by any shareholder desirous of surrendering and forfeiting them, on such terms as the directors may think fit." The result of that unquestionably is, and it has been admitted at the bar, that if Mr. Snell had had his name written in the list of shareholders and had had an allotment of shares, he could have done the very thing which the parties intended to do; he could have surrendered and forfeited the shares, and so have severed, subject to his liability to creditors for twelve months, his connection with the company. The whole question is whether he could do that antecedently to his name being written in the register of shareholders. The 23rd section of the Act of Parliament which is relied upon is this: "The subscribers of the memorandum of association of any company under this Act, shall be deemed to have agreed to become members of the company whose memorandum they have subscribed, and, upon the registration of the company, shall be entered as members on the register of members hereinafter mentioned; and every other person who has agreed to become a member of the company under this Act, and whose name is entered on the register of members, shall be deemed to be a member of the company." Now can it be, where the substance of the transaction is really that these parties intended to sever their connection, that this transaction should be taken as nugatory, because Mr. Snell's name was not written in the register of shareholders? In my judgment, the Act of Parliament does not apply to a case of this description. I think, if there is a signature to a memorandum of association, where the articles also are registered, and there is in those articles a power to cancel and forfeit shares, and that cancellation bonâ fide takes place antecedently to the name being put on the register, the Act of Parliament in no sense applies, and it must be taken to apply only to putting on the register the name of a person who is to all intents and purposes an uncancelled shareholder at the date of his name being put upon the register. For these reasons I am of opinion that one may look at what is the truth and substance of this case—that there is no matter of form standing in the way whatever; and as Mr. Snell and the directors have agreed that Mr. Snell's shares should be cancelled, and as there was the power to carry out that agreement, that power was duly exercised and the agreement duly performed. Of course the cancellation, as one knows perfectly well, as between Mr. Snell and the other shareholders, would be a cancellation ab initio, but, as between Mr. Snell and the creditors, Mr. Snell would no doubt be liable for the twelve months from the date of his being a shareholder, and until the date of his cancellation he was a shareholder.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the court below must be discharged. Mr. Snell will have his costs in the court below, but not any costs of the appeal. The official liquidator will have his costs of the appeal and in the court below out of the estate.

Re THE AGRICULTURIST CATTLE INSURANCE COMPANY;

DIXON'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Bonâ fide dispute—Compromise—Cancellation of shares—Power of directors—Lapse of time.

In 1846, W. an officer of the above named company, took ten shares in the company in the name of D., in order to qualify him to become a director, D. having given his consent only on an oral undertaking by W. that until an Act of Parliament limiting the liability of the shareholders should have been obtained, he should not be asked to sign any contract, or be considered as an ordinary shareholder. The shares were allotted to D., and registered in his name, but the deposit money was paid by W. D., however, acted so far as a shareholder, and so far only, that he appointed a proxy to vote for him at a meeting of the company, and received, and gave a receipt for, a dividend on the ten shares. The company failed to obtain the Act referred to, and D. soon after, on receiving a circular containing an application for a call, wrote to W., reminding him of the terms on which the shares were allotted, and representing that he was not fairly a shareholder; and in consequence of this, upon an explanation by W. of the circumstances, the directors agreed upon payment of the calls made to allow the shares to be cancelled, and a resolution to that effect was passed, and D.'s name was removed from the list. This was never confirmed by the company; the calls were paid by W., not by D., who was unaware of the arrangement, but from 1849 to the winding-up order in 1861, D. was never treated as a shareholder.

Held, under these circumstances (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the case was one of cancellation of shares and release of a man who had been actually a shareholder, which was ultra vires of the directors; and that it was in this respect to be distinguished from Lord Belhaven's case, 3 De. G. J. & Sm. 41; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 595, in which there was a bonâ fide controversy between the company and the shareholder, which the articles empowered the directors to compromise, whereas here the question was only between the shareholder and W.

In the consideration of such a case the long lapse of time was quite immaterial.

This was a motion by the official manager (the case being under the old Winding-up Acts) to reverse the decision of the Master of the Rolls (reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 288), that the name of the respondent, Mr. Thomas Griffies Dixon, was not to be included in the list of contributories of the company, which was one of unlimited liability.

The whole of the circumstances appear in the report of the hearing at the Rolls.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I certainly wish most sincerely that I could follow the very able judgments, for very able judgments they were, both of Lord St. Leonards and Lord Romilly in the House of Lords in Spackman v. Evans, and other cases of that class; but unfortunately I cannot, for able as those judgments were, they failed to prevail with the majority of their Lordships, and I must take the law to be this—namely, that in this particular company there is no power simply to cancel shares, no power simply to discharge a shareholder. If this transaction is simply a cancellation of shares, or the discharge of a shareholder, the mere lapse of time must be considered, standing by itself, as quite immaterial, and as no ground for taking this gentleman's name from the list of contributories.

That being so, I am brought to the consideration of Lord Belhaven's case, and I take the effect of Lord Belhaven's case to be this: It proceeded entirely upon the fact that there was a controversy between the alleged shareholder and the company, and a compromise of that controversy. In Lord Belhaven's case, Lord Belhaven, beyond all question, rightly or wrongly, asserted that he was not a shareholder; the company were perfectly well aware that he made that assertion, and took from him a sum of money upon the footing that they were to accede to his assertion, and if he had been a shareholder he ceased to be a shareholder, and the whole thing was to be settled and compromised upon those particular terms. What I have to consider is whether the facts of this case come up to Lord Belhaven's case; in other words, whether there really was, looking at all this correspondence and at what took place, a controversy between Mr. Dixon on the one hand and the company on the other, as to whether Mr. Dixon was or was not a shareholder. In examining that I must certainly take Mr. Dixon to be bound by Mr. Wilkie's letters and Mr. Wilkie's communications with the company, and bearing that in mind we must, first of all, start with this, that the cancellation took place in March 1849, and, as I said before, I regret that I cannot pay any attention to the lapse of time, as the decision of the House of Lords has precluded me from doing it. The transaction itself took place somewhat early in the year 1846, and took place entirely between Mr. Dixon and Mr. Wilkie, and as detailed in the first paragraph of Mr. Dixon's affidavit, and I do not at all see any grounds for disputing the truth or accuracy of that affidavit. But subsequently to that we find that in May 1846 he distinctly signs a proxy which, on the face of it, represents himself to be, and alleges that he is, a shareholder in this company. We find further than that, that in Jan. 1847 he receives a dividend, and the Act of Parliament which he alleges was at the outset to be obtained before he could be held responsible as a shareholder, was not really applied for until the year 1848. In that state of things there come subsequently requests to Mr. Dixon to make payments of calls. He takes no notice of those circulars, and then he writes this letter, which is in the fifteenth paragraph of his affidavit, to Mr. Wilkie; he does not communicate directly to the company at all; but at that time, beyond all question, he must have known that he was a shareholder. I do not know that I have got the exact date, but the letter is set out in the fifteenth paragraph, and it is in these terms: "As I have received a circular connected with the Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, I think it proper to remind you of the position in which I am regarding that company. You will recollect that, at the time you put down my name and paid a deposit, you distinctly stated to me that you wanted my name for the purpose of appearing in a list of extraordinary directors in Scotland, when such should be advertised, and when an Act of incorporation was got limiting the responsibility of the shareholders; and that, until that was got, you would not ask me to sign any contract, or consider me responsible as an ordinary shareholder. I have never considered myself properly entitled to interfere with the affairs of the company, and I will be obliged if you will explain these circumstances to the board if you have not done so already, and set the matter at rest. I may remind you that you put down my name and paid the deposit yourself, and you have never asked me to repay you the amount, whatever it is. I wish well to the company, and have uniformly insured my stock with it; but I do not think that, under the circumstances, I can fairly be held a responsible shareholder." Now that does not deny the fact of his being a shareholder: on the contrary it admits very plainly that he was a shareholder, and I can only infer from that letter, which is quite consistent with what he stated in the earlier part of his affidavit, that Mr. Wilkie, to his knowledge, had put him down as a shareholder; but in reality there was an arrangement between him and Mr. Wilkie that he should be indemnified. Then the next letter is dated the 2nd March 1869; it is from Mr. Wilkie to the company, and that letter is in these terms:—"This gentleman's (the respondent's) name appears in the list of shareholders, but as he considers he is not properly so, it is necessary for me to explain how he stands. For this purpose I inclose you the copy of a letter he wrote me after the Bill was withdrawn from Parliament. This letter I had with me while attending the general meeting in the beginning of November last, and which I brought for the purpose of showing you and explaining, and stupidly forgot in the excitement of other matters to do so. I cannot deny what Mr. Dixon states as the terms upon which he allowed me to retain his name as a shareholder on the list. I have never asked him to repay me the deposit, and did not consider myself entitled to do so until we got an Act limiting the shareholders' responsibility. It was on this condition that I obtained his consent to allow his name to remain after I had put it down, and from this also that I did not receive his name to the deed of agreement." That is sent to the company, and the answer to that is very natural. You must observe in both those letters—in Mr. Dixon's own letter he does not assert he is not a shareholder; he only says he was put down as a shareholder with some arrangement that he was not to be liable; neither does Mr. Wilkie assert that he was not a shareholder—the answer on the part of the company is this: "No Act of Parliament will limit the responsibility of shareholders, and a special Act is now being prepared by the Government to effect this most important alteration in the law; but I do not see that Mr. Dixon can expect to get out on such a plea." Mr. Wilkie then writes in answer to this: "I notice what you say in answer to my letter regarding that gentleman's position. In law he may probably be considered bound, but it is thought that it would only be considered equitable that he be released. Would the directors not agree to cancel his name upon payment of the calls that have been made, according to the number of shares for which he is entered? If the directors will be willing to do this, I shall advise him to agree to do so. I really wish this were agreed to, for from my having pledged my word, as I explained in my last letter, it would go far to make gentlemen lose all confidence in me as acting for the company, and this under our present circumstances would have a very bad effect." Now, stopping there for one moment, it is impossible to say upon those letters that there was a controversy between the company and Mr. Dixon and Mr. Wilkie as to whether Mr. Dixon was or was not a shareholder. There was a distinct admission by Mr. Dixon himself that he was a shareholder, and there was a distinct admission by Mr. Wilkie that he was a shareholder, and that was sent to the company, and the only ground suggested for releasing Mr. Dixon is that confidence would be lost in Mr. Wilkie, and consequently that the company might be damaged; but as to there being any compromise of any disputed question, certainly there is nothing of that sort. Then the next letter is from the company. "I think the directors will accept payment of calls and allow these shares to be cancelled; under the circumstances it would, I think, be advisable." That must proceed, if it proceeds upon anything at all, upon the erroneous supposition of these parties that they had the power to cancel the shares. Then the money is paid by Mr. Wilkie, and there are resolutions passed which are, in terms, to cancel and forfeit. Under those circumstances I have no hesitation in saying that I cannot distinguish this case from Spackman v. Evans and Stanhope's case, and that class of cases which were decided in the House of Lords. I cannot see any grounds upon which, when one comes carefully to analyse these letters, this can be brought within Lord Belhaven's case, because there really was no question in controversy between Mr. Dixon and the company. He was admittedly a shareholder; there was no suggestion as to his not being a shareholder, and there was nothing of the sort to compromise. It was a mere attempt to cancel shares and to discharge the shareholder, by agreement as distinct from compromise. Unfortunately for Mr. Dixon, these directors had no power to do anything of that description.

Upon these grounds, therefore, Mr. Dixon's name must be upon the list; but under the circumstances, of course I cannot make Mr. Dixon pay any costs.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PRAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, Nov. 12.

GRENVILLE MURRAY v. EARL OF CLARENDON.

Pleading—Allegation of trust—Demurrer.

M., who had held a diplomatic post in Her Majesty's service, filed a bill against the Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs, alleging that he had been unjustly dismissed from his post, and that various sums were due to him from the defendants; also alleging that a certain sum was annually drawn by the Foreign Office from the Treasury for the purpose of paying the salaries and pension of the diplomatic and consular services, and that such sum was received by the defendants as a trust-fund in trust to pay thereout such salaries, &c. The bill prayed that an account of what was due to the plaintiff might be taken, and that the defendants, as such trustees, might be ordered to pay what should be found due.

On a demurrer by the defendants:

Held, that the general allegation of a trust was not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, but that it was necessary to set out the facts, deeds, or instruments in which the trust originated:

Held, also, that the court had no jurisdiction to take such an account as that asked by the bill, the Foreign Office having a discretion as to the application of the fund, and not being responsible to the Court of Chancery.

Demurrer accordingly allowed.

This was a suit instituted by Eustace Clare Grenville Murray against the Earl of Clarendon, the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and James Murray, the permanent superintending Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The bill alleged that in the year 1841 the plaintiff was employed by the late Lord Palmerston in the service of Her Majesty's Government in the Foreign Office department, and that he served without emolument thenceforward till the year 1852, when he was appointed paid attaché at Vienna, with a salary of 350*l.* per annum; that after holding various other diplomatic appointments, the plaintiff was in 1858 appointed Consul-General for the Russian ports in the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof, which appointment he held till May 1868, when he was, as the bill alleged, wrongfully dismissed by Lord Stanley, who was then the principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The bill also alleged that the plaintiff by divers means incurred the enmity of the defendant, James Murray, who for many years carried on a system of persecution of the plaintiff, and by reason of his great influence in the Foreign Office caused the plaintiff to be refused and deprived of his just rights and emoluments in the service, and to be refused any account of the sums of money due to the plaintiff by reason of his services, and the reasonable expenses incurred by him therein; that the defendant James Murray had conspired with others to procure his dismissal from Her Majesty's service, and to prevent his being paid the pension to which he was entitled in respect of his services.

The bill also alleged that the Foreign Office department of Her Majesty's Government draws annually from Her Majesty's Treasury the sum of 600,000*l.* or upwards for the purpose of paying the salaries and pensions of the diplomatic and consular services, and the expenses incurred by the members of such services respectively, in and about the affairs of the Government, and that the said sum of 600,000*l.* is received by the defendants as a trust fund in trust to pay, or cause to be paid thereout, the salaries, pensions, and expenses aforesaid; that the defendant, James Murray, as superintending permanent Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the complete management and control of such trust-fund, and ought to have paid, or caused to be paid, to the plaintiff the sums of money which, upon the several accounts therein mentioned, are or might have been found due to the plaintiff, and that the same ought now to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendants. It also alleged that the said sum of 600,000*l.* is much larger than the sum allowed by Act of Parliament for the purpose of paying the salaries, pensions, and expenses of the diplomatic and consular services, as aforesaid, and that the defendant, James Murray, as permanent Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had not, during all the time of his superintendence of the financial arrangements of the Foreign Office, as aforesaid, rendered, or caused to be rendered by the Foreign Office department of Her Majesty's Government, any account to Her Majesty's Treasury of the manner in which such sum of 600,000*l.* a year has been disposed of; and that if an account were taken of the manner in which the said sum of 600,000*l.* a year, so drawn and paid as aforesaid, had been spent in each year, it would be found that the sums of money due to the plaintiff upon the several accounts thereinbefore mentioned, had been retained by the defendant, James Murray, for his own use and benefit out of the said trust-fund or sum of 600,000*l.* a year.

The bill prayed that accounts might be had and taken of what was due to the plaintiff from the Foreign Office department of Her Majesty's Government, in respect of the several matters of account thereinbefore stated; that the moneys which should be found due to the plaintiff upon taking such accounts might be paid to the plaintiff by the defendants, as such trustees as aforesaid; that if it should be found necessary for the proper taking of such accounts, an account might be had and taken of all the moneys drawn from, and paid by, Her Majesty's Treasury to the Foreign Office, in trust as therein mentioned, since the time in the year 1858, when the defendant, James Murray, became the permanent Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs superintending the financial business of the Foreign Office down to the filing of the bill, and that the defendant, James Murray, might be ordered to render an account, and that an account might be had and taken of how the said moneys or trust funds had been disposed of. The bill also prayed for an inquiry what damage had been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of his having been deprived of the emoluments of his office during the time therein mentioned, and of his pension, &c., and that what should be found upon such inquiry to be the damage occasioned to the plaintiff by reason of the circumstances therein complained of, might be ordered to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendants, as such trustees as aforesaid.

The Earl of Clarendon demurred to the bill, and, for cause of demurrer showed that the said plaintiff had not, by his bill, made such a case as entitled him in this court to any discovery or relief from or against the defendant touching the matters contained in the bill or any of such matters.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. and Wickens, in support of the demurrer, submitted that assuming the truth of all the allegations contained in the bill, the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief which this court could give. A proceeding against the Foreign Office was really one against the Queen, against whom a subject could only proceed by petition of right. If the plaintiff had proved that a certain sum was due to him, and was in the hands of the Foreign Office, his remedy was by writ of mandamus in the Court of Queen's Bench. They submitted that the demurrers must be allowed, as otherwise the effect would be an interference of this court with the performance of its duties by the Executive Government.

Southgate, Q. C. and Gill, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendants having, for the purposes of the demurrer, admitted that the defendants, who were public officers, had money in their hands issued by the Treasury for the use of the plaintiff, this suit could be maintained against the defendants for the recovery of the money. They cited

Hill v. Reardon, Jac. Rep. 84;
Slingsby's Case, 3 Swanst. 178.

Lord ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that this demurrer must be allowed. In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to no relief in equity on his present bill. General allegations will not suffice to support a bill against a demurrer. It is true that a general demurrer admits the truth of every statement in the bill for the purposes of the demurrer, but this rule must be taken with this qualification, that general allegations are not to be accepted as true when inserted merely to support the bill, where the particular facts do not entitle the party to relief. This was laid down by an eminent equity judge, Alexander, C. B., in Frietas v. Dos Santos, 1 Y. & J. 576. It is not enough, therefore, to allege that the Foreign Office holds a fund in trust for a certain person, to give the court jurisdiction over it, unless there are facts to show that the relationship of trustee and cestui que trust does exist. Otherwise it would be impossible for a demurrer ever to succeed, as it might be defeated by the introduction of some general allegations in the bill. A general allegation of a trust is not sufficient; but, to give the court jurisdiction, it is necessary to set out the facts, deeds, or instruments, in which the trust originated. [His Lordship examined the statements in the bill as to the plaintiff's alleged unlawful removal from his office, &c., which are immaterial to the present report, and continued.] The material point in the bill is the allegation that the Foreign Office fund is a trust-fund. If so, it is held in trust for the general purposes of the Foreign Office, namely, for the payment of salaries, pensions, and expenses, and not in trust for individuals. The application of the fund is left in the discretion of the Foreign Office, and there is nothing to connect the plaintiff with any specific portion of it. No trust, therefore, can be said to exist on behalf of the plaintiff. But it is alleged that if an account were taken of the fund since 1858, it would be found that the sums of money alleged to be due to the plaintiff have been retained by the defendant James Murray for his own use and benefit. In order to make this out, it would be necessary to examine the accounts of the Foreign Office for the past ten years, a task which even Parliament has never attempted. It is impossible for this court to do so, it has not jurisdiction to do so. The Foreign Office is not responsible to the Court of Chancery, but to Parliament alone. The demurrer must therefore be allowed.

A demurrer by the defendant James Murray was allowed without argument.

WOLLASTON v. TRIBE.

Marriage settlement—Voluntary trusts in favour of collateral relations—Power of revocation.

By a marriage settlement made in 1858, certain property belonging to the lady was invested in trustees upon certain trusts for the benefit of the wife and husband during their respective lives, and the children of the wife by the then intended or any future marriage, and in default of such children upon trust for the wife's nephews and nieces absolutely. The settlement contained no power of revocation, and gave the wife no power of appointment amongst her nephews and nieces, and no power to lease, to appoint new trustees, or to change investments. The husband died in 1865, leaving no issue. On a bill by the wife to set aside the settlement:

Held (on the ground that the plaintiff had executed the deed in ignorance of its effect, which had not been sufficiently explained to her, and that the nephews and nieces were mere volunteers, and not within the consideration of the marriage), that the trusts of the deed must be declared void, and the trustees be ordered to retransfer to the plaintiff the property comprised in the settlement.

By an indenture dated the 27th Sept. 1858, and made between Robert Wollaston, of the first part, Mrs. Wollaston, by her then name of Catherine Anne Boghurst, of the second part, Edwin Henty and William Tribe, of the third part, and Henry

John Gore and the said Edwin Henty, of the fourth part, in consideration of a marriage then intended, and shortly afterwards solemnised, between the said Robert Wollaston and Catherine Anne Boghurst, the latter, with the consent of Robert Wollaston, granted and conveyed the freehold hereditaments therein mentioned unto and to the use of the said Edwin Henty and William Tribe, their heirs and assigns, upon trust after the solemnisation of the said intended marriage, to receive the rents, issues, and profits of the said hereditaments and premises, and to pay the same to the separate use of Mrs. Wollaston during her life, without power of anticipation, and after the decease of Mrs. Wollaston, in trust for the said Robert Wollaston, and his assigns, during his life, and immediately after the death of Mrs. Wollaston and of the said Robert Wollaston, if he should survive her, which should last happen, in trust for all and every, or such one or more, of the children of Mrs. Wollaston, by her said intended or any future husband, or the issue of such child or children born in the lifetime of Mrs. Wollaston, in such shares, &c., and in such manner as Mrs. Wollaston should, in manner thereinmentioned, appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for all such children, share and share alike. But in case there should be no child of Mrs. Wollaston by her said intended or any future husband, or no such child who should attain the age of twenty-one years, or who, dying under that age, should leave no issue living at his, her, or their death, in trust for such of the nephews and nieces of Mrs. Wollaston, the children of her two sisters, Elizabeth, the wife of the said Henry John Gore and Laura Frances, the awife of the said Edwin Henty, as should be living t the time of the death of Mrs. Wollaston, and the death of the said Robert Wollaston, and the failure of issue of Mrs. Wollaston, which should last happen, and their respective heirs and assigns as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants.

By the settlement similar trusts were declared concerning the personal estate of Mrs. Wollaston, which had been assigned to Henry John Gore and Edwin Henty. The indenture contained a covenant by Mr. and Mrs. Wollaston for the settlement of all the lady's after-acquired property upon the like trusts. It also contained a power to appoint new trustees in which no consent or concurrence of Mrs. Wollaston was required.

Robert Wollaston died on the 22nd Aug. 1865. There was no issue of the marriage, and Mrs. Wollaston had not married again.

In Aug. 1868 Mrs. Wollaston filed the present bill, praying that the trusts and provisions contained in the indenture of settlement of the 27th Sept. 1858, respecting the real and personal property comprised therein, in favour of the issue of the plaintiff by a future husband, and in favour of the nephews and nieces of the plaintiff, and also the covenant to settle after-acquired property might be declared to be void as against the plaintiff; and that the defendants, the trustees of the said indenture of settlement might be decreed to reconvey and transfer the real and personal property comprised therein to the plaintiff, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely.

At the date of her marriage Mrs. Wollaston was a spinster of the age of forty-one; she had two sisters, one of whom had four children, and the other only one. She consulted her brother-in-law Mr. Henty about the settlement, and told him that she wished her property to go to her nephews and nieces in equal shares in the event of her dying without issue. Mr. Henty gave instructions for the settlement to Mr. William Foard Tribe, who had previously acted as solicitor for him.

Mr. William Foard Tribe made an affidavit, in h he stated that he read the more material parts of the settlement, and explained its general effect to Mrs. Wollaston before she executed it; but that he did not explain to her what her position would be if her husband died in her lifetime, leaving no issue of the marriage, and that he did not suggest that a power of revocation should be inserted in the deed.

The plaintiff now sought to set aside the deed on the ground that she had executed it in ignorance of its effect.

Joshua Williams, Q. C. and Martin Ware, for the plaintiff, submitted that as the solicitor had not fully explained the effect of the settlement, and had not reserved or suggested the reservation of a power of revocation, the deed could not be upheld; it was clear that the plaintiff had executed it in ignorance of its effect. All the interests within the consideration of the marriage had expired, and the nephews and nieces were mere volunteers; the proper course would therefore be to declare the settlement void in toto, and not to rectify it by inserting such clauses as it ought to have contained. Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Southgate, Q. C., and Bovill, for the defendants, contended that it was now too late after the lapse of so many years to set aside the deed. The plaintiff should have come to seek the aid of the court as soon as the mistake was discovered. Moreover this settlement was partly for a good consideration, and only in part voluntary, and it could not be set aside as there had been no fraud or undue influence in the matter. The utmost relief to which the plaintiff was entitled was to have such clauses inserted as the settlement ought originally to have contained. They cited

Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, 18 Ves. 84;

Nov. 15.—Lord ROMILLY, without calling for a reply, said:—I think this is a case in which the settlement cannot stand. It is purely voluntary in so far as it relates to the persons who now seek to uphold it. [His Lordship stated the settlement and the facts of the case, and continued:] In default of children the settlement gives all the property to the nephews and nieces absolutely; this is a purely voluntary gift, for it is clearly settled by the authorities that they are not within the consideration of this marriage settlement. But that is not in itself a sufficient reason for setting it aside, for a voluntary settlement is quite good, if the person making it knows the effect of it, and wishes to carry it into execution. But this lady does not seem to have known what she was doing, or what was the effect of the deed. The form of the settlement is very unusual; the usual course would have been to insert a general power of appointment in default of children, and to have given the property to the nephews and nieces in default of appointment. Mr. Henty, the brother-in-law of the plaintiff, gave the instructions for the settlement, and not the lady herself; there is no doubt that she wished to benefit the children of her sisters, but it does not appear that he wished to do so in an irrevocable manner. She acted as if she were making her will, and she wished the settlement to give effect to her intentions at that time, but there is no evidence that she intended to make an irrevocable disposition of her property. Mr. Tribe, the solicitor who prepared the settlement, gives his evidence very fairly; he says that he read the more material parts of the deed to the plaintiff, and explained the general effect of the deed, but that he did not explain to her what her position would be if her husband died in her lifetime leaving no issue of the marriage, and that he did not suggest that a power of revocation should be inserted in the deed; but this is the very thing that he ought to have done. I think nothing of the time that elapsed before the plaintiff took any steps to set aside the deed; it is of no consequence, as the parties are all in the same position as before, and it is not a sufficient reason to cause the court to hold the plaintiff bound by her deed. The settlement is very faulty in many respects; the trustees have all the power, and, as the plaintiff very justly complains, she is reduced to the position of an annuitant of her own property; in case of the death of a trustee she has no power to appoint a new trustee, but that power is given to the surviving trustee; her consent is not required to any change in the investments, and she has no power to lease. It is, therefore, clear that the settlement cannot stand; there will be a declaration that the trusts now subsisting, and also the covenant to settle future acquired property, are void; and there must be a reconveyance and reassignment by the trustees of all the trust property vested in them.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 8 and 9.

POWELL v. ROBERTS.

County Court—Equitable jurisdiction—Redemption suit—Right to redeem resisted—28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1.

The County Courts have jurisdiction, under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, in suits for redemption, notwithstanding the right to redeem is resisted.

Where, therefore, the defendant, a first mortgagee, with a power of sale, upon giving six months' notice, sold the property before the six months had expired, and the plaintiff, a second mortgagee of the same property, objecting to the sale, filed a plaint in the County Court to redeem:

Held, on appeal (affirming the decision of the court below), that the County Court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a redemption decree.

This was an appeal from the Denbighshire County Court.

The question raised turned upon the power of the County Court judge (under the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act) in suits of redemption, where the right to redeem is resisted. The facts, which were extremely complicated, were briefly these.

By an indenture, dated the first Jan. 1863, John Jones mortgaged certain allotments, numbered 17, 18, and 19, in the county of Denbigh, to Gabriel Roberts, with a power of sale, upon giving six months' notice, to secure 160*l.* and interest.

By another indenture dated the 28th Nov. 1862, but executed on the 28th Nov. 1863, Jones further mortgaged lots 17 and 19 with a power of sale on giving three months' notice to John Powell, to secure 110*l.* and interest.

On the 1st March 1866, Roberts gave notice of sale, and on 31st Aug. 1866 (before the expiration of his six months' notice) joined in a contract for the sale of the property included in both mortgages. Before the contract was entered into Powell through his solicitor made several applications offering to redeem Roberts's mortgage, but was answered that it had been satisfied.

It appeared that some time prior to the contract Jones had executed a deed whereby he had assigned the equity of redemption to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, and their solicitor had given Roberts a cheque for his principal and interest. This cheque Roberts had cashed, but shortly before the contract for sale he repaid the money to the solicitor of the trustees, receiving from him in exchange a promissory note for the amount, and it was alleged that the cheque was given to Roberts as an indemnity on his signing the creditors' deed. The contract for sale was carried into effect, and a deed of conveyance executed, the purchaser taking with notice of Powell's claim to redeem.

On the 23rd May 1867 Powell filed a plaint in the County Court against Roberts, praying that the defendant might be ordered to convey the mortgaged premises to the plaintiff upon payment of 160*l.* and interest, and for an injunction. Subsequently, on an objection taken by the defendant, the plaint was amended by making the purchaser also a defendant, and by praying that the sale and conveyance might be set aside, and that the defendants might be ordered to convey the property to the plaintiff.

On the 8th Feb. 1868, the judge of the County Court made a decree in the plaintiff's favour, and against that decree the defendants now appealed.

Freeling and A. E. Miller, for the appellants, contended that the County Court had no jurisdiction to set aside the sale. The 1st section of the Act of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, although it gave to the County Court all the power and authority of the Court of Chancery in suits for foreclosure and redemption, did not extend that power to suits for redemption where the right to redeem was resisted. On the doctrine of the consolidation of mortgages, the plaintiff could not redeem the mortgage on allotment 17 and 19 without redeeming that on allotment 18:

Tassell v. Smith, 2 De G. & J. 713;
Neve v. Pennell, 2 H. & M. 170;
Beevor v. Luck, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 537.

Further, the power of sale had been properly exercised, and the plaintiff had full notice: (Watts v. Symes, 1 De G. M. & G. 240.) There could be no doubt that Roberts's mortgage was a subsisting mortgage at the time of the execution of the conveyance. As to the cheque given to Roberts by the solicitor of the trustees it was not a payment by the mortgagor, and did not affect the mortgagee's power of sale. Lastly, the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was at law, not in equity. They also cited.

Major v. Ward, 5 Hare, 604;
Vint v. Padgett, 1 Giff. 446; on appeal, 2 De G. & J. 611.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Langworthy, for the respondent, were not called upon.

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—I think that this decree cannot be altered, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs. The first objection to the decree is on the ground of jurisdiction, and the learned judge seems to have been impressed with that as a serious objection, although he overruled it. But it seems to me that this suit is more clearly within the language of the Act of Parliament than the learned judge thought. The words of the Act of Parliament are, that the County Court shall have jurisdiction "in all suits for foreclosure or redemption." A suit for redemption in which the right to redeem is resisted is still a suit for redemption, and it seems to me impossible to read this Act as saying that it gives jurisdiction in all suits for redemption except those in which the right to redeem is resisted. I can put no such construction upon the words "all suits for redemption," for they seem to me as wide as can well be. I have looked to see whether it is the practice to treat suits where the right to redeem is resisted as any other than suits for redemption, and I find in all the text books, as well as in the reports, that a suit for redemption, in which the right to redeem is resisted, is still treated as a suit for redemption. In 1 Seton on Decrees, 376, under the heading of "Suits for Redemption," this is said: "If part of the costs" (that is, in a suit for redemption) "have been caused by the resistance of the mortgagee to a redemption decree he will pay so much of the costs of the suit and receive the rest." I have turned to Sir Thomas Plumer's decree in the case of Harvey v. Tebbutt, 1 J. & W. 203, which was a suit where the right to redeem was resisted on the ground that there had been a decree by the Court of Exchequer for foreclosure (a more formidable resistance to a right to redeem than setting up a decree by which the mortgagor is said to be foreclosed cannot well be imagined); and I see that Sir Thomas Plumer treated the suit as one for redemption, for, he says, "The question is whether upon a bill filed to redeem this mortgagee is to be deprived of that which is usually allowed to mortgagees, namely, the payment of his costs." In the decree in that case there is a declaration that the plaintiff ought to be allowed to redeem, and in dealing with the costs it was "ordered that the said master do tax all parties the costs of this suit so far as the same have been occasioned by the defendant's controverting the plaintiff's right to redeem." All this shows that in the view of the court technically, as well as in the ordinary interpretation of language, a suit to redeem where the right to redemption is resisted is still a suit to redeem. Therefore I feel in no degree embarrassed with those doubts as to the jurisdiction which the learned judge entertained, and I think he came to a right conclusion in holding that there was jurisdiction in the court to entertain the suit. I see that the learned judge seems to have been struck with the fact that the County Court had no power to cancel the deed; but in cases of this kind it is no part of the direction that the deed should be cancelled. In the case which I have quoted of Harvey v. Tebbut there was no direction other than that notwithstanding that decree the plaintiff should be let in to redeem. Here the judge stated, very properly, I think, his opinion that the sale was void. It could not be sustained, and there is no reason why the plaintiff should not be allowed to redeem. As to cancelling the deed, it is a thing in no degree necessary, and indeed, I think would not be proper in a suit of this kind. The other objections to this decree are wholly unsustainable. Where a mortgagee has a power of sale this court has always been careful to see that that power is regularly and fairly exercised, if the exercise of it is insisted upon. In the case of Jenkins v. Jones, 2 Giff. 99, decided by me some time ago, it happened that although the mortgagee knew that the mortgagor was anxious to redeem, there was no legal tender. At the sale the mortgagor attended and struggled to be allowed to redeem and said that he was ready to do so, but there was nothing like a legal tender. The court set aside that sale, and held that, notwithstanding all formalities had been properly observed, there was not a fair and proper exercise of the power. This case, I must say, seems to me to be a gross one. It is a case in which the mortgagee, after payment of his money, proceeds to sell by private contract. An attempt has been made to show that, although he received the money it was not by any payment of the mortgagor, and that it was afterwards paid back again; but the circumstances of the transaction are quite sufficient to induce the court, when the question is as to the due exercise of a power of sale (which is a prodigious power) to say that it has not been properly exercised. The case does not rest there; after having the money which was paid to him by Adams, who was the solicitor of the trustees of a deed which was executed by the mortgagor for the benefit of the creditors, he not only by word of mouth, but by letter, said that he had been satisfied. But the case does not stop even there. The terms of the power of sale are upon default in payment within six months after notice. The notice is dated the 1st March 1866, and the sale was on the 31st Aug. The suit has occasioned much expense, and the only objection I am disposed to take to the decree is that it does not decree the plaintiff the payment of the costs of so much of the suit, as was done in the case of Harvey v. Tebbutt; but, as the plaintiff is contented with the decree as it stands, it is not, I think, for the court now to alter it; therefore my only duty is to dismiss the appeal with costs. I do not think it necessary to notice the argument as to the consolidation of the mortgages. There was no right in Roberts, as against Powell, who was mortgagee of both these properties, to say that Powell should not redeem his mortgage without redeeming another mortgage which was made by his mortgagor.

Miller.—Your Honour recollects that Roberts was mortgagee of all the lots.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think it necessary to observe this: This decree is in an unusual form, and I think, considering the amount of the property, it is a convenient form. It does not direct an account of what is due to the plaintiff, the mortgagor, or anybody. It only says that an account is to be taken of what is due from the plaintiff on the mortgage. It then goes on to direct payment of what shall be so found due by the plaintiff into court within six months. I think, considering the nature of the question between the trustees under the creditors' deed and Gabriel Roberts, that that was a very convenient and proper form of decree. As to the other objection that the proper relief was at law, and not in equity, really it is difficult to understand how it could arise.

Miller.—Your Honour will excuse me for one moment, but I do not know whether your Honour has clearly understood that Gabriel Roberts was mortgagee of both these properties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I quite understand it, but what has Mr. Powell to do with that? I think the decree is perfectly right, and that the cases cited have no application. The case has been misunderstood, and I should not have thought it a case necessary to be brought before this court.

SOLLORY v. LEAVER.

Receiver—Annuity in gross—General charge of debts—Legacy and an annuity.

A testator gave an annuity to his son T., and all his real and personal estate to his son J. absolutely, subject and charged with the payment of debts funeral, and testamentary expenses, legacies, and the annuity. The annuity was paid for twenty years, and then fell into arrear, and T. filed a bill, and moved for a receiver:

Held, that under the 4 Geo. 2, c. 18, T. had a power of distress, and his remedy was at law. Motion refused.

This was a motion for a receiver, the question being whether the court would make the order where an annuity was given, and all the real estate was generally charged with debts, legacies, and the annuity. There were two suits, the present by the annuitant for arrears, a receiver, and, if necessary, for administration, and a creditor suit, in which it was stated that probably a like motion would be made. The bill stated that John Sollory, by his will, dated the 9th April 1824, as far as was material, gave as follows:

I give and bequeath unto my son Thomas Sollory (the plaintiff), for his life, one annuity or clear yearly sum of 36*l.*, which I direct shall be paid by my son James Sollory, his heirs, executors, or administrators, by four even quarterly payments in the year, the first payment to begin and be made at the end of three calendar months after my decease. And subject and hereby charged with the payment of my debts (whether due on mortgage or otherwise), funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies or sums of money and annuity hereinbefore mentioned, I give, devise, and bequeath all my messuages, tenements, and dwelling-houses, lands, hereditaments, and premises situate in Bridleswith-gate and Byard-lane or elsewhere in the said town of Nottingham, with their and every of their rights, members, privileges, and appurtenances; and also all my household furniture, book and other debts due and owing to me at the time of my decease, tools, implements of my trade as a plumber and glazier, and all other my goods, chattels, personal estate and effects whatsoever unto my son James Sollory, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns.

That the testator died more than twenty years since, and James Sollory took possession of his personal and real estate, and he, or those claiming under him, had ever since remained, and were now in such possession. James Sollory made his will, dated the 2nd Sept. 1842, and thereby directed payment by his executors of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and devised and bequeathed the messuages and hereditaments (mentioned in the will of John Sollory), with other property, to Mary Sollory (a defendant) and John Stock (since dead) absolutely upon trust for Mary Sollory for life, or so long as she continued his widow, for her separate use, and subject thereto, as to one moiety, upon trusts for Mary Sinclair and her children; and as to the other upon like trusts for Emma Phœbe Huggins and her children. James Sollory died on the 8th Jan. 1843, and his estate was administered to by Mary Sinclair. On the 3rd Nov. 1868 a creditor's bill was filed asking for a receiver, and to restrain Mary Sollory from receiving the rents. On the 16th Jan. 1869 an application for a receiver was made in that suit, which stood over, and no receiver had been appointed. The plaintiff's annuity was paid down to the 1st June 1867 regularly, since which time only a few small sums had been paid in respect of it, and ultimately this bill was filed, charging that the parties in the other suit, though willing, had no power to assist the plaintiff, and he had no means of enforcing payment of his annuity except by the aid of this court. There was no personal representative of John Sollory except Mary Sinclair, whom the plaintiff charged sufficiently represented his estate.

A. E. Miller, in support of the motion, contended that this was the case of an annuity in gross, without a power of entry or distress, and must be regarded in the light of a legacy, being coupled with legacies in the general charge in the will. It was not the case of a rentcharge, and the annuity could not be regarded as issuing out of land in the strict sense. In Boyes v. Rusborough, Kay, 71, which was affirmed by the House of Lords, where there was a simple devise of land in fee, it was held that there was a right to file a bill to have the will carried out. There was land in Ireland and England, and the heir recovered in ejectment, and the devisee filed a bill as against him in respect of the English property. A mortgage for 1200*l.* had been made by James Sollory. In Francis v. Grover, 5 Hare, 39, there was a charge upon leaseholds; and in Pritchard v. Fleetwood, 1 Mer. 54, it was held that a trustee of an estate, subject to an equitable interest must submit to a receiver.

Field for the mortgagee in the other suit, supported the motion.

Chitty, for Henry Sollory, opposed it, and argued that the plaintiff had his legal remedy by distress under the statute (4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 5), and showing no impediment to taking that course, he could not come into equity: (Buttery v. Robinson, 3 Bing. 392.) Here there was a direct gift of an annuity to the plaintiff to be paid by James Sollory out of real estate, and he had a fee simple given to him. It was therefore a legal rentcharge with power of distress under the statute. There was no trust, and the fact that there was a mixed gift of realty and personalty made no difference: (Buxton v. Monkhouse, Geo. Coop. 41.) The will was demurrable, but the demurrer was not before the court.

Miller in reply.—The case of Buttery v. Robinson did not apply here, there being no particular charge. The personal estate was primarily liable, and the annuitant would have no right to resort to the land. [Chitty.—The doctrine of the application of assets was unknown at law.] In Carrow v. Ferrior, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 719; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79, it was held that the court would not interfere with a legal title. No doubt the appointment of a receiver was in the discretion of the court; but a mere legatee, and the plaintiff was no more, could not distrain. The plaintiff had been advised that he could not proceed at law.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This annuity is given to the plaintiff, and subject to the payment of defendant's funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and this annuity (the only one given and particularly mentioned), there is a gift of all the real and personal estate to James Sollory. The result is, that every part of the estate is devised to James Sollory, subject to the payment of this annuity. The bill admitting payment of the annuity to within two years, states that it is now in arrear, and for some reason, for which no satisfactory explanation is given, the annuitant remains unpaid. It also appears that mortgages were executed by James Sollory, subject to the annuity, and the parties claiming under James Sollory also ask for a receiver. Now, considering the state of confusion into which the estate has got, I have not a shadow of doubt that it would be the very best thing for the plaintiff, for Mary Sollory, and everyone concerned, that a receiver should be appointed; but, whatever my inclination may be, the question is, what power have I, and what is my duty in administering the doctrines of this court? It is clearly settled then wherever an annuity is charged on land, without a power of distress and entry, that is not a rentcharge but a rent-seck. To enable the annuitant to enforce payment of the annuity, the statute 4 Geo. 2, c. 18, applies, and a power of distress is superadded. That was decided in the case of Buttery v. Robinson (sup.); and I believe that that has been recognised ever since as an authority. Here there is an annuity charged on real estate admittedly of different value, and such charge is without power of distress, and therefore it is a case in which the statute adds the power and the plaintiff is an annuitant with power of distress, and he asks me to appoint a receiver. Am I at liberty to do so? The doctrine of the court is that it will not appoint a receiver on the application of those who do not need it. Therefore it is that in the case of a first mortgagee with a legal estate who asks for a receiver, the application will be refused, because the court does not help those who will not help themselves; because a first mortgagee can enter and receive the rents, and give notice to the tenants to pay them to him and get into possession. A second mortgagee, having no such remedy, can get a receiver appointed. The question is whether I can appoint a receiver on the application of an annuitant who has the power of helping himself just as much as a first mortgagee. It appears to me I have no such power, and it makes no difference whether the estate is large or small. If I recognised any such doctrine I might do it in every case where an annuity was in arrear. This case is not within the authority of the case in Sir George Cooper's reports, although there a power was given by deed, and here it is superadded by the statute, but the parties are in precisely the same situation. There a receiver was appointed ex parte on motion, in 1810, and Lord Eldon says, "I think this receiver improperly appointed, the plaintiff being a trustee with power of entry and distress on the leasehold estates." The very reason given by Lord Eldon was, not that the annuitant had power, but that it was vested in a trustee, and therefore he decided that the appointment of the receiver was wrong. So here the annuitant has vested in himself a power of distress and entry, and I think it is an analogous case to a first mortgage, and the doctrine ought to be applied that the court will not help those who will not help themselves. I am not able to accede to the motion, which must be refused.

Re WHITELEY'S SETTLED ESTATES.

Practice—XLI. Consol. Ord., rule 14—Names and addresses of petitioners—Advertisement.

Where petitioners in a petition under the XLI. Consol. Ord., rule 14, and the 20*th section of the* 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, are very numerous, the name of one, and the description of the property, and place for service on all, is a sufficient compliance with the order.

In this case a petition had been presented under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), and the Lord Chancellor's secretary considered that the petition had not been properly advertised. By the XLI. Consolidated Order, rule 14, in connection with sect. 20 of the Act, it was provided that every petition under the Act should set forth the name, address, and description of the petitioner, and also a place in London where he might be served, &c.

In this instance the petitioners were very numerous, no less than twenty-six in number, and therefore, for brevity's sake, as giving the full names and addresses would have rendered the advertisement enormously long, it was merely stated that the petition was presented by Robert Tolson and others; the property proposed to be affected being described, and the place for service of the petition.

W. Barber mentioned the matter to the court, and referred to two unreported cases, one before Stuart, V. C. (Re Burley), on May 25th, 1868, and the other before this court (Re Nune) on the 15th March 1867, where words of description were omitted, and yet the order was made.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Advertisements issued in these cases are for the purpose of giving all persons full information. In this case the property is described, and the place for service on the petitioners, and the name of one. The court has, as appears by the case referred to before Stuart, V. C., and one before myself, dispensed with a strict compliance with the terms of the order. All that is requisite is a substantial compliance. I do not think, therefore, in this case that a new advertisement is necessary; the giving all the names and addresses would afford no further information.

HALL (app.) v. POTTER (resp.)

Public Health Act 1848—Notice to do works.

A notice given to the owner of premises under sect. 69 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (Public Health Act 1848), containing directions, some of which are ultra vires, will be good, and may be enforced in respect of such directions as are legal.

A local board acting under the above section, gave the respondent notice to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel certain premises, including the gardens in front of the houses:

Held, that although that part of the notice applicable to the gardens was invalid, the rest was lawful, and that the notice therefore could be enforced pro tanto.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 upon the refusal of justices to make an order upon the respondent under the 11 & 12 Vict. 63, s. 69.

The case stated as follows:—Whereas at a petty sessions holden at the police court, Strangeways, Manchester, in and for the division of Manchester, on the 16th Dec. last before me, complaint was preferred by the above-named appellant, John Hall, clerk to the local board of health of the district of Rusholme, in the said county of Lancaster, that one Michael Potter, the respondent above-named, was on the 7th April 1867, owner of certain premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon a certain street called Victoria-street, in Rusholme, within the said district of the said local board of health, which said street was not then a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and was not then sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the said local board of health, and that the said local board of health had, by a certain entry dated the 7th Aug. 1867, sealed with the seal and signed by five of the members, and also by the clerk of the said local board of health, given to the said Michael Potter as owner of the said premises, fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon the said street, notice within the space of two calendar months from the date of the said notice, to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel so much of the said street as the said premises fronted, adjoined, or abutted upon in manner in the said notice mentioned; and the said notice further required the said respondent to execute the said works in accordance with a plan and section therein mentioned as being deposited at the office of the said local board.

And whereas the said Michael Potter, as required by the said notice, did not within two calendar months after the date of the said notice, execute the works in the said notice mentioned.

And whereas the said local board executed the works required in the said notice to be done by the said Michael Potter, as above mentioned, except that they did not flag certain gardens included in the said notice and plan, and mentioned in the ninth paragraph of this case. The said board also executed works of sewering, levelling, paving, and flagging, and channelling other parts of the said street.

And whereas an apportionment of the expenses incurred by the said board in doing such work as was done by the said local board in the said street was duly made as required by the said Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69), and notice thereof, so far as related to the said premises of the said Michael Potter, was duly given to him.

And whereas the amount of the said expenses apportioned, in respect of the said premises of the said Michal Potter for the work so done, as apportioned by the surveyor, amounted to 94*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*; and such sum was duly demanded of the said Michael Potter on the 2nd July 1868, and he refused to pay the same.

And whereas the said Michael Potter was duly summoned before me to show cause why an order should not be made upon him for the payment of the said sum of 94*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* so as aforesaid demanded of him.

And whereas at a petty sessions holden on the 12th Jan. last, by adjournment from the said 22nd Dec. last, the said complaint was heard and determined by me, a stipendiary magistrate appointed for the division of Manchester, in the county of Lancaster, and sitting at the police court appointed in that behalf, and the said parties being there present by attorney and counsel, and upon such hearing I dismissed the said summons.

And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with my determination upon the hearing of the said complaint, as being erroneous in point of law, &c., I do hereby state and sign the following case.

The facts mentioned in the recitals hereinbefore contained were proved, and it was also proved that the said premises of which the said Michael Potter was the owner, fronted, adjoined, or abutted upon the said Victoria-street to the extent of 201ft. 3in., coextensive with such street. It was also proved that a portion of such premises, viz., 154ft. 6in. in length, and 2yds. 21in. in breadth, was composed of small gardens enclosed in front of the houses there situate, of which the said Michael Potter was owner. It was also proved that no part of the said gardens had ever been dedicated to or used by the public. The notice so given to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel referred to a plan deposited in the office of the said local board, and included the land forming the said street, and also the land forming the said gardens; the length of the said street, as shown in such plan, was 638ft. 6in., and the width thereof 36ft., including nevertheless in such 36ft. the said gardens, so far as the same were co-extensive with the said street as aforesaid.

I held the notice to pave, sewer, level, flag, and channel to be informal and invalid, because it required the respondent to do that which the said local board had I considered no authority to require the respondent to do, inasmuch as it required the respondent to flag the land forming the said gardens in front of the respondent's house. I request the opinion of the court on the following question: Was the said notice of the 7th Aug. 1867 a bad notice, and altogether invalid, on the ground abovementioned, or a good and valid notice, so far as it related to the said works so actually executed by the said board?

If the court shall be of opinion that the notice of the 7th Aug. 1867 was bad and altogether invalid, for the reason above stated, then my determination is to stand; otherwise, the case is to be remitted back to me, with the opinion of the court thereon, for the further hearing of the case before me.

H. L. TRAFFORD.

W. H. Cole appeared for the appellant.—Admitting that the notice is too extensive it is good pro tanto, and the magistrate ought not to have dismissed the summons, but have heard it and have made an order in respect of that part which was good. That part of the order which referred to the paving of the garden might be bad, whilst the remainder of the notice may have been perfectly good. He cited

The Mayor of Manchester v. Cheatham, 31 L. J. 173, M. C.; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 541;
Reg. v. The Newport Local Board of Health, 32 L. J. 97, M. C.;
Caley v. The Local Board of Hull, 5 B. & S. 815.

Quain, Q. C. (Baylis with him) appeared for the respondent.—The notice was bad, inasmuch as it contained an order to pave a garden, which was ultra vires. With such a notice the respondent would be quite unable to ascertain what he was really required to do. He cited Parkinson v. The Mayor of Blackburn, 33 L. T. Rep. 119.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think that the contention of the appellant is correct. He gave the respondent a notice which it is admitted is bad as to part, inasmuch as it called upon him to pave and flag a part of his garden, and represented that as part of the work to be done under the plan served along with the notice. There was thus a mistake as to this part of his notice, while the other part of the notice which required the respondent to pave and flag the road abutting on his property was good. The question is, whether the notice was valid pro tanto? and I think it was. It is true the board could not call upon him to pave and flag part of the property represented on the plan; but the owner must have known this, inasmuch as it was his own property, and so that the notice could not apply to that portion of the plan. It would lead to great inconvenience and confusion if every time the board went beyond the line and included in their notice something which they could not enforce, the owner could remain acquiescent until a certain time elapsed and then turn round and set up the partial mistake as freeing him from all his obligations to comply with the parts of the notice which were valid. As it would lead to great mischief if that view were adopted, I think this notice was valid pro tanto, and that our judgment should be for the appellant.

Judgment for the appellant

DIGNAM v. BAILY.

Practice—Costs—Plea bad, but verdict for defendant on the merits.

In an action against a sheriff for an escape, the defendant pleaded (1) not guilty; and (2) the production by the debtor of a certificate of the registration of a composition-deed under sect. 198 of the B. A. 1861. The plaintiff demurred to the second plea, and replied that he was not a creditor bound by the deed, as his cause of action first accrued after the making and registration of the deed. The defendant demurred to the replication, and the demurrers being argued, judgment was given for the plaintiff that the plea was bad, and the replication good. The issues of fact being afterwards tried, the verdict was entered by the court for the defendant on the replication to the second plea:

Held, that the defendant, notwithstanding that his plea had been held bad, was entitled to the postea, he having succeeded on the merits of the case.

Declaration: That the plaintiff, on the 11th Dec. 1866, obtained judgment against one Thomas Brassington; that a ca. sa. was sued out and delivered to the defendant as sheriff of Kent, commanding him to arrest Brassington, to satisfy the plaintiff's debt and interest from the 11th Jan. 1866, on which day the judgment was entered up; that the defendant arrested Brassington, and afterwards allowed him to escape.

Pleas: 1. Not guilty; 2. That after the defendant's officer had taken Brassington in execution, Brassington produced to the officer, and gave him a copy of, the certificate from the Court of Bankruptcy of the due registration of a deed made and executed between Brassington and his creditors, within the true intent and meaning of sect. 198 of the Bankruptcy Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), whereupon the defendant's officer released Brassington from custody.

1st replication, traverse. 2nd replication, that the plaintiff's cause of action against Brassington, in respect of which the judgment was recovered, first accrued after the making and after the registration of the deed, and the plaintiff was not a creditor of Brassington in respect of the said cause of action when the deed was made, nor when the same was produced and left for registration, nor until after the certificate was granted; and the defendant was not one of the creditors referred to or intended to be bound by the deed.

There was also a demurrer to the plea; and the defendant demurred to the replication.

Issue and joinder in demurrer.

After argument of the demurrers, judgment was pronounced on the 17th Jan. 1868, in favour of the plaintiff, viz., that the plea was bad, and that the replication was good.

Afterwards the issues of fact were tried by a jury, when it appeared that the plaintiff's cause of action against the debtor was in respect of a bill of exchange accepted by the debtor, and which was outstanding at the date of the deed, though the debtor had neglected to plead the deed. The verdict was for the plaintiff on the plea of not guilty, and on the 2nd replication; the damages being assessed at the amount of the judgment-debt, and leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, if the court should be of opinion that the debt of the plaintiff was barred by the deed. A rule nisi was obtained to enter the verdict for the defendant, and the rule was afterwards made absolute by the court on the ground that the only question raised on the pleadings was whether the plaintiff was a creditor bound by the deed.

An application having been made to Mellor, J. at chambers, an order was made by him, directing the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff on the plea of not guilty, but ordering the postea to be delivered to the defendant in order that he might tax the general costs of the cause.

A rule nisi calling on the defendant to show cause why the latter part of the judge's order should not be rescinded, and the postea delivered to the plaintiff, having been obtained by J. O. Griffits.

Raymond now showed cause against the rule, and contended that the order was right, and that the postea should be delivered to the defendant, he having succeeded on the merits of the case; and the damages in favour of the plaintiff being assessed only contingently. Each portion of the pleadings must be treated by itself. "There never was such an idea before," said Buller, J., in Kock v. Nowill, 1 T. R. 124, "as the counsel against the rule have suggested, that one plea might be supported by what was contained in another. Each plea must stand or fall by itself; they are as unconnected as if they were on separate grounds." So Patteson, J. in Gwynne v. Burdell, 1 Scott. N. R. 770, "It seems to me to be essential to the due course of pleading, and to avoid confusion, that no blending of pleas should in any instance be permitted, and that, whatever may be the number of pleas placed upon the record, each plea should be treated both in itself and in its consequences, as if it were the only plea on the record." To the same effect, Parke B., in Galloway v. Jackson, 3 Scott's N. R. 771, "Each set of pleas is independent of the other, and the defendant below has a right to have the case disposed of as if each plea had been the only one on the record." If the court sees that on the whole of the record either party is entitled to judgment on the merits, it is bound to award the costs according to the very right of the case. [COCKBURN, C. J.—How is the defendant entitled to judgment on the merits?] Because the plaintiff was in reality bound by the deed, as the court held in Dignam v. Baily L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 376. The plea contained a slip, which was amended by what followed. [COCKBURN, C. J.—You say, in fact, that if there had been no pleadings, and the facts had been stated as they now stand, the defendant would be entitled to succeed.] So I submit. The sheriff according to the verdict, had substantial right on his side. Littleton says, sect. 366 (Co. Litt. 226a), "Also albeit a man cannot in any action plead a condition which toucheth and concernes a freehold without shewing writing of this, as is aforesaid, yet a man may be aided upon such a condition by the verdict of 12 men taken at large in an assise of novel disseisin, or in any other action where the justices will take the verdict of 12 jurors at large (l'ou les justices voilent prender le verdict de xii. jurors a large)." In Gray on Costs, p. 33, the law is thus stated, "When the issues have been found by the jury, the first question which presents itself is, which party is entitled to the postea? There is no doubt that as a general rule, if the plaintiff has succeeded on any part of his declaration, he is entitled to it; and he also succeeds if the pleas on which issues are found for the defendant do not answer the whole of the cause or causes of action contained in the declaration. The plaintiff is in that case entitled to recover damages in respect of that portion of the cause of action not so answered. His action has been effective, and he has what is called the general verdict. But if the pleas on which issues are found for the defendant do answer the whole of the cause or causes of action in the declaration, the plaintiff is entitled to no damages.

Digitized by Google

His complaint or cause of action has been entirely answered, and the defendant has the general verdict, and is entitled to the postea, although various other issues may be found for the plaintiff, those issues arising in consequence of the defendant setting up distinct answers to the same part of the cause of action under the statute 4 Anne, c. 16, already considered; for it will be found that it is only where there is double pleading that the defendant can have the general verdict, and yet the plaintiff have issues found for him. In some cases a confusion is created on this subject from damages being found for the plaintiff, and entered on the postea, although the defendant has the general verdict in the manner already explained. Staley v. Long, 3 Bing. N. C. 781; Smith v. Brown, 5 Dowl. 736, are examples of this." In Staley v. Long (ubi sup.) the action was one of trespass, quare clausum fregit, to which the defendant pleaded (1) not guilty; (2) not plaintiff's close; (3) right of way, and a verdict having been found for the plaintiff on the 1st and second pleas with 1*s.* damages, and for the defendant on the third, the court ordered the postea to be delivered to the defendant. Tindal, C. J. said: "The entry of 1s. damages is a mere slip of the associate; he, perhaps, thought the plaintiff entitled to the general costs in the cause. I am inclined to think the defendant is; it is not necessary to decide that now. But the postea must be delivered back to the associate;" and Coltman, J.: "The postea should be delivered to the party who has substantially succeeded. That is the defendant."

Griffits, for the plaintiff, in support of the rule.—The defendant's plea being demurred to, and decided by the court to be bad in law, it is submitted that everything subsequent to that is immaterial. After that decision of the demurrer, the record would be inconsistent if judgment should be afterwards given in accordance with the plea. [LUSH, J.—We must look at all the facts as they are now found.] The replications cannot in any way be called in to aid the plea, and as that was bad, and was the only defence on the record, the plaintiff is entitled to the verdict for the damages found by the jury. One pleading cannot be referred to in aid of another. Even if the replications could properly be called in aid of the plea, it would not appear that the action on which the judgment has been obtained was brought after the protection had been obtained, because the defendant did not plead the protection. [HANNEN, J.—That point was not taken at the trial.] As a fact the point intended from the first to be raised on the trial was whether a person who had obtained protection under a composition-deed, if sued by a creditor bound by the deed, was not bound to plead the protection; and whether, if he did not plead it, the protection could avail against a judgment obtained in the action.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We think the order made at chambers was quite right. Looking at the record and the state of the facts as they now stand, however the case might be if certain things mentioned by Mr. Griffits had formed part of it, there is no doubt, on the finding of the jury and as the result of the whole, that the defendant is entitled to the postea. We are of opinion, therefore, that the order of my learned brother was perfectly correct.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The replication, which is found to be true by the jury, amends the defendant's plea; and the facts as they stand on the whole record are such as entitle the defendant to the postea.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

COCKER (app.) v. CARDWELL (resp.)

Nuisances Removal Acts—18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, ss. 10, 11, 12—23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, s. 13—29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, ss. 14, 21—Complaint by an inhabitant—Notice.

Where proceedings are taken by an inhabitant under sect 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. (The Nuisances Removal Amendment Act 1860), for the abatement of a nuisance, he is not required under sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90 (The Sanitary Act 1866), before taking such proceedings, to serve a notice on the person by whose act the nuisance arises requiring him to abate the same.

This was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, as follows:

The respondents were summoned before two justices on an information by the appellant laid under sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, charging them with having on the 23rd March 1869, committed a nuisance by allowing a certain chimney at their mill at Savile town, near Dewsbury, to send forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance. On the 19th April 1869 the information came on to be heard. The appellant proved that he was an inhabitant of the parish or place in which the nuisance complained of arose, and he gave evidence in support of the information. Mr. Wilson Hemingway also proved that on the 8th June 1868 he informed the defendants of his appointment as smoke inspector of the Dewsbury Union district by the West Riding Association for the suppression of the smoke nuisance, and that on the same 8th June he left a copy of the notice hereinafter set out at the respondents' place of business. Also on the 20th Oct. 1868 he personally served the appellant, James Cardwell, with a notice, of which the following is a copy.

West Riding Association for the Suppression of the Smoke Nuisance, statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90.

I hereby give notice that having been appointed by the above-named association to the office of smoke inspector for the Dewsbury Union district, I have already commenced discharging the duties of that appointment, and am now making observations of such chimneys as appear to me to be most noxious with the view of laying information according to law for the abatement of nuisances arising from dense smoke. All the chimneys within the district will be inspected as early as possible, and if you have not already adopted some proper and satisfactory means for the prevention of smoke, you are hereby required to do so without further delay, or summary legal proceedings will be taken against you without further notice for any nuisance which may arise from your neglect.—Yours, &c.,

Westgate, Dewsbury. WILSON HEMINGWAY.

Upon the hearing the following questions arose:—Upon an information by an inhabitant under sect. 13 of the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, is a notice required to be given as under sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, by the nuisance authority or chief officer of police? and, if so, was the notice given to the respondents sufficient for that purpose? The justices were of opinion that a notice was required, and that the notice given was insufficient. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said justices were right in holding that a notice was required, and that the notice before referred to, and given at the time proved, was insufficient?"

Jelf for the appellant.—The question is whether an inhabitant who prefers a complaint before the justices of the existence of a nuisance in his parish under sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77 is bound to give the notice that the inspector of nuisances is required to give under sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90. There are three Acts of Parliament material to the point—18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 12; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, s. 13; and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90. By sect. 14 of the last Act all three Acts are to be construed as one Act. By sect. 12 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, the local authority may cause complaint to be made, and the justices may order an abatement of the nuisance. By sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77 an inhabitant may make a complaint of the existence of a nuisance before a justice, who may issue a summons requiring the person by whose act the nuisance arises to appear before two justices, who shall have power to inquire into the complaint, and act in relation thereto as in cases where complaint is made by a local authority under sect. 12 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, and as if the person making the complaint were such local authority. By sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, the nuisance authority shall, previous to taking proceedings before a justice, under sect. 12 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, serve a notice on the person by whose act the nuisance arises, to abate the same within a certain time. It is contended that this latter notice is not required to be given where the proceedings are taken by an inhabitant. Sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, deals with the duty and powers of the local authority. By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 10, notice of the nuisance may be given to the local authority by the person aggrieved. By sect. 11 the local authority have power of entry under certain conditions in order to ground proceedings by them under sect. 12, which section shows what proceedings are to be taken by them where a nuisance is so ascertained to exist. The notice required by sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90 is clearly inapplicable to the case of a complaint preferred by an inhabitant under sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 76, as in the latter case the justices, after a summons is issued, have to inquire into the existence of the nuisance, and can adjourn the inquiry. Again, as these Acts are to be construed as one Act, suppose the three Acts formed but one Act, then it is obvious that sect. 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90 refers only to the proceedings taken under sect. 12 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121.

No one appeared for the respondent.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the construction put upon the 12th section of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, by Mr. Jelf is the right one. The first Act of Parliament to which our attention has been called, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, by sect. 11, gives power to the local authority to enter upon certain conditions being complied with upon premises in order to ascertain the existence of the nuisance. Sect. 12 specifies the proceedings that are to be taken by the local authority where a nuisance is so ascertained to exist. The second Act of Parliament, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, by sect. 13, enables the justices, on the application of any inhabitant, to order the removal of nuisances, the justices being required to proceed to inquire into the complaint, "and act in relation thereto as in cases where complaint is made by a local authority under sect. 12 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 77, and as if the person making such complaint were such local authority." Then follows a proviso that "it shall be lawful for the said justices, if they see fit, to adjourn the hearing for an examination of the premises where the nuisance is alleged to exist." Then comes the third Act, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, and it is upon the 21st section that the question arises, whether in the case of proceedings taken by an inhabitant under sect. 13 of the second Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, it is incumbent upon such inhabitant previous to taking such proceedings to serve a notice on the person by whose default the nuisance arises in compliance with clause 21 of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90. That section says that "the nuisance authority . . . shall, previous to taking proceedings before a justice under the 12th section of the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, serve a notice on the person by whose act . . . the nuisance arises . . . to abate the same, and for that purpose to execute such works . . . as may be necessary within a time to be specified in the notice." This is a distinct and positive clause requiring the nuisance authority to give a notice to the defaulting party before the nuisance is abated. It is hardly applicable to the case where proceedings are taken by an inhabitant. Certain powers are given in this section to the nuisance authority, which the Legislature has not entrusted to an inhabitant. These Acts are to be construed as one, and must therefore be taken in pari materiâ; and although the acts appear to have been very inartificially drawn, I think that this clause being silent as to the notice to be given in the case of proceedings taken by an inhabitant, we cannot import words which are not contained in the section.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is almost impossible to construe these Public Health Acts. It is now about twenty years or upwards since the first Public Health Act was passed, and the Legislature have since from time to time passed Acts amending the former ones, and it is really not surprising that the justices who have to interpret these Acts find very great difficulty in understanding them. However, I have endeavoured with the assistance of Mr. Jelf to arrive at the meaning of this 21st section of the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90. I agree with my Lord in holding that no notice is required by this section where proceedings are taken by an inhabitant under sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77. It seems to me that the Legislature in passing the last Act forgot that they had passed the second Act. It is a casus omissus.

MELLOR, J. concurred.

HANNEN, J.—I only wish to add that I concur in the judgment given by my Lord and my brother Blackburn. These Acts are very clumsily and inartistically drawn, and the construction to be placed upon them has necessarily become very difficult.

Case to be remitted to the justices with the opinion of the court.

MERCER v. WOODGATE.

Way—Limited dedication—Inconvenient to the user of the way by the public.

The public had, as far back as living memory went, used a footpath across a field. During the same period the owner or occupier of the field had, at the proper season of the year, ploughed up the field and the soil of the footpath. Upon this evidence the occupier had been convicted before the justices of unlawfully destroying the highway. On a case stated, the court quashed the conviction, holding, first, that the proper inference from these facts was that the occupier had dedicated the path to the public, subject to his right of ploughing up the same at the proper seasons of the year; secondly, that such a limited dedication by the owner of the soil of a way to the public was good.

Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect 72 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, that the said appellant on the 25th Sept. last, at the parish of Bellbroughton, in the said county of Worcester, did unlawfully and wilfully destroy and injure the surface of a certain highway there situated leading from Bellbroughton to Fairfield and Bromsgrove by then and there ploughing up the same a certain distance, to wit, fifty yards and more, thereby doing injury to the said highway to the amount of 20s., contrary to the statute in that case made and provided, the appellant was convicted of the said offence, and was ordered to pay the sum of 1s., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 16s. for his costs.

The following facts were either proved before us or admitted by both parties.

The appellant is a farmer, and the occupier of a certain field of arable land, in the parish of Bellbroughton, across which is a public footpath leading from the village of Bellbroughton to the Stourbridge and Bromsgrove turnpike road, and the hamlet of Fairfield. The appellant, on the 26th Sept. 1868, in due course of farming, ploughed the field, and in so doing ploughed up and destroyed all trace of the footpath in question.

The appellant bonâ fide claimed the right to plough, and to continue to plough, the said footpath, and the previous occupier had so ploughed at all times within living memory.

There was no evidence before us of the existence of the footpath or the tillage of the land before living memory, and no witnesses were called on behalf of the appellant, nor was any evidence given by the appellant of any partial or limited dedication of the land, or of any reservation by him of the right to plough up the land along the line of the footpath, except as otherwis appears by this case.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the footpath was a highway within the meaning of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, and that under the circumstances the justices should convict the appellant under sect. 72 of that Act for the destroying and injuring the surface of a highway.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the footpath was not a highway within the meaning of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, but that if it were, he and the previous occupiers having ploughed it up as long as it was known to have existed, the public had a right only to the use of the footpath, subject to its being so ploughed up.

We, however, being of opinion that the footpath was a highway within the meaning of 5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50, and that the appellant having destroyed and injured the surface of the footpath, we were bound in law to find appellant's acts to be unlawful, no further evidence than herein appears having been offered to us of any reservation by the owner at the time of dedication, or presumed dedication, of a right to plough up the surface of the footway, and accordingly we gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the footpath is a highway within the meaning of the 5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50, and, if so, whether we were bound in law under the circumstances above stated to convict the appellant of an unlawful act, or whether, upon the facts set forth, we should have been justified in finding the acts complained of to be lawful, and whether we had jurisdiction.

If the court should be of opinion that we were bound to convict the appellant, and that our jurisdiction was not ousted in consequence of the land having been ploughed at all times when necessary within living memory, then the conviction is to be affirmed, otherwise it is to be quashed.

Harrington, for the appellant, contended upon the authority of Pelham v. Pickersgill, 1 T. Rep. 660, that the fact of the path having been ploughed up during all the time that the path had been used by the public, showed that the occupier had dedicated the way to the public, subject to the right of ploughing at seasonable times. If that is not so, then the case of Stafford v. Coyney, 7 B. & C. 257 shows that there may be such a limited dedication, and if not, then there was no dedication at all. A way may be dedicated to the public by the owner subject to a dangerous nuisance: (Fisher v. Prowse, and Cooper v. Walker, 31 L. J. 212, Q. B.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711.) Therefore a way may be dedicated, subject to a nuisance which is not dangerous, but only inconvenient.

Rew, for the respondent. — A way cannot be dedicated, subject to such a right, for the exercise of the right destroys the way. The dedication of the way may be good, but the condition is void. It is an indictable nuisance for the occupier of a field to plough up a public way across it:

[HANNEN, J.—How do you distinguish the present case from Fisher v. Prowse? BLACKBURN, J.—What is there to prevent a way being dedicated to the public with a limitation as to its future user?] Morant v. Chamberlain, 6 H. & N. 541, shows that the inference cannot be drawn that this way was dedicated subject to the right of ploughing up the way. [HANNEN, J.—But it shows that a highway may be dedicated to the public subject to a pre-existing right of user by the occupiers of adjoining land for the purpose of depositing goods thereon. COCKBURN, C. J. referred to Rex v. Northampton, 2 M. & S. 262.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the appellant. I entertain no doubt that it is competent for the owner of the freehold to dedicate a way across his land to the public, subject to his right of ploughing up that way at seasonable times. From the evidence before the magistrates it appears that as far back as living memory goes, while on the one hand the public have exercised a right of passage across this field, on the other hand the owner or occupier of the field has from time to time, without any regard to the user of the way by the public, ploughed up the way. Take it, therefore, as the proper inference that the exercise of this right of ploughing by the owner has been coeval with the user of the way by the public. On this state of facts we must infer that the right of the public to use the path in the original dedication was subject to the grantor's right of ploughing it up at the proper seasons of the year. It must not be lost sight of that there was no obligation on the part of the owner to dedicate the way at all; but it must be taken that he did dedicate it with the reservation of the right to plough up the footpath; there was no obligation on the part of the public to accept the dedication. It would be most unjust to the owner of the freehold to hold that he was bound by an absolute dedication, and that the reservation was void. It seems to me that the owner of the soil only intended to grant a limited right, as in the case of Reg. v. Northampton, where it was held that a bridge might be a public bridge used by the public at all such times as it was dangerous to pass through the river. That case is clearly an authority for holding that there may be such a partial dedication. If not, I agree with my brother Blackburn, in the dilemma put by him in the course of the argument, either this is a limited dedication or it is not. If it is not a dedication, then cadet quæstio; if it is a limited dedication, then the public accept it as qualified by the conditions attached thereto. These ways are common enough in agricultural districts, and to hold that the owner could not, in dedicating a foothpath across his field for the use of the public, reserve such a right, would be manifestly to the inconvenience of the public, inasmuch as no owner would ever dedicate a way at all.

BLACKBURN.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with Mr. Rew that when the owner of the soil dedicates a way across his land to the public, it is a voluntary act on his part, and if nothing more were said or done by him the public would be entitled to a right of way not obstructed by any nuisance, such as the ploughing up of the way itself. But in the present case it appears that the owner of the soil dedicated the way, not simpliciter, but that he dedicated it with this qualification, namely, that the public might use the way, subject to his right to plough up the path at proper times. The case is clearly within the principle laid down in the judgment of this court in Fisher v. Prowse, at p. 218, "But the question still remains whether an erection or excavation already existing, and not otherwise unlawful, becomes lawful when the land on which it exists, or to which it is immediately contiguous, is dedicated to the public as a way, if the erection prevents the way from being so convenient and safe as it otherwise would be; or whether, on the contrary, the dedication must not be taken to be made to the public, and accepted by them, subject to the inconvenience or risk arising from the existing state of things. We think that the latter is the correct view of the law. It is, of course, not obligatory on the owner of the land to dedicate the use of it as a highway to the public. It is equally clear that it is not compulsory on the public to accept the use of a way when offered to them. If the use of the soil as a way is offered by the owner to the public under given conditions, and subject to certain reservations, and the public accept the use under such circumstances, there can be no injustice in holding them to the terms on which the benefit was conferred. On the other hand, great injustice and hardship would often arise if, when a public right of way has been acquired under a given state of circumstances, the owner of the soil should be held bound to alter that state of circumstances to his own disadvantage and loss, and to make further concessions to the public altogether beyond the scope of his original intention. More especially would this be the case when public rights of way have been acquired by mere use. For instance, the owner of the bank of a canal or sewer may, without considering the effect of what he is doing, permit passengers to pass along until the public have acquired a right of way there. It is often hard upon him that the public right should have been thus acquired; it would be doubly so if the consequence was that he was bound to fill up or fence off his canal." In the present case, therefore, there is no injustice in holding that the public have the benefit of the way, coupled with the inconvenience of its being ploughed up from time to time.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The authorities cited by Mr. Rew go to this extent: that where there is an unrestricted dedication, the ploughing up the way would be an indictable nuisance, but that question is not raised here. The case falls within the principle of Fisher v. Prowse. If the reservation is void there is no dedication as was pointed out by Parke, B. in Poole v. Huskinson, 11 M. & W. 830, where he says, "There may be a dedication to the public for limited purpose, as for a footway, horseway, or driftway; but there cannot be a dedication to a limited part of the public. In that respect the direction of the learned judge was quite correct; not so the alternative—that as such a partial dedication was invalid in law, it would nevertheless operate against the intention of the owner of the soil, in favour of the whole public. I think it would be merely void." Therefore in this case if the reservation is of no effect I think that there was no dedication at all.

Conviction quashed.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 15.

THE LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. MYERS (resp.)

Railway company's private Act—Maximum charge for carriage per mile—Mileage not necessarily by the most direct route.

By the private Act of the London and South-Western Railway Company (9 & 10 Vict. c. cxxxi.), s. 13, the maximum charge for carriage is limited to a certain sum per mile:

Held, that the mileage is not necessarily to be counted by the most direct and shortest route; but that if the route adopted by the company in the carriage of goods entrusted to them as common carriers be a reasonable one under the circumstances, they are entitled to charge the maximum rate for the number of miles over which they actually carry the goods.

This was an appeal from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Hampshire, holden at Southampton, upon the following case stated by the said judge:—

This was an action for alleged excess charged on the carriage of a consignment of machinery (value 160*l.*) and paid under protest, viz.:

Charged 2 tons 6 cwt. 1 qr., at 50*s.*	£5	15	8
Should be 2 tons 6 cwt. 1 qr., at 34*s.*	4	0	2
	1	15	6
	£3	17	6

With regard to the second item of the plaintiff's claim, it was held that there had been no undue delay in the delivery of the goods, and judgment was given for the defendants.

With regard to the first item of the plaintiff's claim this case is stated.

The defendants are a railway company, carrying on the business of common carriers. Luton is a station on the Great Northern Railway.

The goods in question were collected from plaintiff's premises at Southampton by defendants to be carried by them as common carriers, and to deliver according to the direction, which was "Luton to order viâ Great Northern." The defendants signed a receipt-note as follows:

To The London and South-Western Railway Company, Southampton Station.

802. March 7th, 1868.

Receive the under-mentioned goods from Mr. Myers, of Caxton Works, to be conveyed by the London and South-Western Railway Company as mentioned below, and on the conditions stated on back.

		Luton to order via Great Northern.	say	13 3	Pieces. Cases. Total, 16.	Printing Machinery.

Charges to be paid by (signed) HUNT.
J. J. MYERS, Sender.
Checked by Outwards Entered.

N.B. It is particularly requested that any goods brought to any of the company's stations to be forwarded by the London and South-Western Railway may be accompanied by one of these notes, properly filled up for each separate station to which goods are to be sent, and signed by the sender.

 This note is to be carefully filed.

N.B. A copy of the full address must be inserted on this note with any instructions that may be given on the address as to route, &c., &c.

On the back of the note was a printed notice, of which the following is material to the present case:—

London and South-Western Railway.
Consignment note.

Goods traffic. The Blossoms Inn, Lawrence-lane, Cheapside, has been opened by this company as their receiving house for goods and parcels; and 53, King William-street, as a parcels receiving office. The company undertake the collection and delivery of goods in London, in connection with the traffic on the railway. Goods delivered at the Blossoms Inn before six p.m. for goods. Trains are despatched the same evening. It is particularly requested that all goods or parcels to be forwarded by this line be specially directed "By London and South-Western Railway Company." The undermentioned are also appointed receiving houses for this railway, in addition to the station at Nine Elms: Blossoms Inn, Lawrence-lane, Cheapside, &c.

N.B.—Unless goods and parcels are delivered at any of these offices, the company cannot be responsible for the proper charges being observed; and parties in the country will do well to advise their London correspondents as to this. If not delivered at these offices constant irregularities will occur. Goods sent direct to Nine Elms Station cannot be received after 6.30 p.m., as the station gates then close.

ARCHD. SCOTT, Traffic Manager.

Notice as to goods—The London and South-Western Railway Company hereby give notice that they will receive, forward, and deliver goods, solely subject to the conditions hereunder stated:—1. That the company shall not be responsible for the loss of or injury to any goods or articles put into returned wrappers, boxes, packages, cases, or baskets, delivered or received as "empties." 2. Nor for the non-delivery or mis-delivery of parcels or packages of any kind improperly or insufficiently directed, nor for the loss of or injury to goods mis-described or improperly packed, or so packed that the breakage or leakage of one or more of the articles would be likely to injure the rest, nor for loss by leakage occasioned by bad or imperfect casks or cooperage, nor for the loss, waste, or damage by fermentation. 3. Nor for the loss of or injury to any goods, packages, or parcels left till called for, or delivered to order, or warehoused for the accommodation of any of the parties interested therein, unless such loss or damage shall be shown to have happened by the default or negligence of the company and its servants. 4. Nor for the loss of or injury to any of the articles specified and enumerated in the Act, 1 Will. 4, c. 68, commonly called the Carriers Act, and in the notice posted up in the company's receiving offices, under the provisions of the 2nd section of the said Act, unless declared and insured according to the rates set forth in such notice. By order of the directors,

FREDERICK CLARKE, Secretary.

London, 5th Oct. 1854.

The goods were conveyed in the same trucks without unloading on the defendants' railway from Southampton to Nine Elms, from thence back to Clapham Junction, also on the defendants' railway; from Clapham Junction to Blackfriars, on London, Chatham, and Dover Railway; from Blackfriars to King's-cross, on the Metropolitan and Great Northern Railways; and from King's-cross to Luton by Great Northern Railway.

The plaintiff contended that the defendants were under the statutes affecting and regulating the railways over which the plaintiff's goods were conveyed bound to charge no more for those goods than 3*d.* per ton per mile over the whole journey, taking the most direct route, with the exception of 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton at each end for loading and unloading.

It was contended by the defendants that they were not so bound under the above circumstances.

The County Court judge held that the amount charged by the defendants was a reasonable amount, and the route adopted a reasonable one under all the circumstances of the case, but held that the defendants were bound, by the statutes referred to, to make no higher charge than at the rate of 3*d.* per ton per mile over the whole journey by the nearest route, so contended for by the plaintiff; the defendants having charged 1*l.* 15*s.* in excess of that rate; and the judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, and granted this case.

The judge having ordered the party appealing to pay the amount of such judgment into the hands of the clerk of the court, and the same having been paid accordingly, the question for the opinion of the court is whether in a case like the present, in which the defendants undertook to have the goods conveyed from Southampton to Luton, the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the amount claimed from the defendants as an excessive charge.

If the plaintiff is so entitled the appeal is to be dismissed; if not so entitled, judgment is to be entered for the defendants.

Denman, Q.C. (with whom was Mangles) argued for the appellants, the railway company.—Cap. cxxxi. of 9 & 10 Vict. is the local Act with regard to this company, and upon the 13th section the County Court judge based his decision. It will be seen, however, that the limit of the maximum charge there laid down does not apply to other railways than the South-Western, nor is the charge limited to the number of miles of the shortest distance between the places of departure and arrival. The words of the section are: "That notwithstanding anything in the said recited Acts or this Act contained, the maximum charges to be made by the company in respect of all the tolls and charges for the use of the said London and South-Western Railway, and the railways from time to time purchased, hired, or otherwise acquired and held by the said London and South-Western Railway Company, and of any carriage, and for locomotive power, and for every other expense incidental to such conveyance, except loading and unloading, where such service is performed by the company, shall not exceed the sums following, that is to say," &c. For machinery, 3*d.* per ton per mile. Here clearly there is nothing about the charge which the appellants may make for carrying articles over lines other than their own; and the Railway Clauses Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20) does not apply in any way to this railway company. By the 1st and 2nd sections that Act is made applicable only to railway Acts "hereafter to be passed." Moreover, this point is not raised here; the only matter about which the County Court judge entertained any doubt was whether the appellants were justified in charging for more miles on their own line than the shortest distance necessary for them to carry these goods by that line. There are no words in the appellants' Act compelling them to charge only by the shortest route; and although the course here was somewhat zigzag, the judge has found that the route adopted was reasonable under the circumstances. This being so, the company may surely charge for the actual number of miles of that reasonable route over which they have carried the respondent's goods. [Stopped by the court.]

Bere, Q. C. for the respondent.—The railway company are not entitled to charge for the extra and unnecessary distance over which they pass merely for their own convenience. But that is not my only contention in support of this decision; I am prepared to show that the other railway companies, over whose lines these goods were taken, are limited in their charges in the same way as the South-Western, and therefore the charge was excessive even if the appellants were justified in counting the miles between Clapham Junction and Nine Elms and back again. [By the COURT.—We cannot consider this last point; for it was clearly never intended to be raised upon this special case.]

BOVILL, C. J.—It seems to me to be impossible upon the facts stated, to hold otherwise than that this decision was wrong. The question is whether the mileage is to be counted by the nearest route; confining our judgment to the only point raised, I am certainly of opinion that the railway company are not so bound to limit their charges. They are common carriers, and it is not necessary for them to take any but a reasonable course. If they adopted the usual and accustomed route, they have done all they are bound to do. They are not bound to adhere to one line, or to cart the goods they carry from one line to another in order to convey them in the straightest direction. The appeal will be allowed.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. Coaches going between the same places by different roads may charge for whatever distance they travel over; so, if their route be reasonable, railways may charge for the actual number of miles over which they carry goods. There is in so doing no transgression of the Act.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think if the point referred to by Mr. Bere had been intended to be raised in this court, the case would have been stated very differently. The company certainly have a right to make a mileage charge for their usual and accustomed route. I think no other points are raised by the special case. Judgment will be for the appellants.

BRETT, J.—I fail to gather from the case an explicit statement of any other point but this, and it lay upon Mr. Bere to show that the company had no right to charge for the distance of that route which they were accustomed and it was reasonable for them to take, provided they might have saved a few miles by a more inconvenient route. Upon this point I think he had no case to argue.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

BREWER (app.) v. THE TOWN CLERK OF BRADFORD (resp.)

Borough vote—Tenant of a dwelling-house who allowed a lodger the use of his sitting-room—Joint occupation—Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102) s. 3—Costs upon the affirmance of an appeal from a revising barrister.

An inhabitant occupier, as tenant of a dwelling-house within a borough, otherwise duly qualified under the second clause of sect. 3 of the Representation of the Act 1867 to vote for the borough, had let a furnished bedroom to a lodger, and had allowed the lodger the joint use with himself of another room for his meals:

Held, that the words "joint occupier" in the proviso at the end of the 3rd section did not apply to lodgers, being limited to the sense in which they are used in the enacting part of the section, viz., as owner or tenant of a dwelling-house. Therefore the circumstances of this case did not render the tenant of the dwelling-house a joint occupier within the meaning of the proviso.

The Court of Common Pleas reserves to itself discretion as to granting or refusing costs, upon affirming an appeal against the decision of a revising barrister.

At a court held at Bradford, in the West Riding of the county of York, for the revision of the list of voters for the borough of Bradford, before the revising barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the said borough, Joseph Brewer claimed to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the township of Horton, in the borough of Bradford, as entitled to vote in the election of members for the borough of Bradford in respect of his occupation of a dwelling-house in the township of Horton, within the said borough.

It was established by the evidence that the appellant was of full age, and it did not appear that he was subject to any legal incapacity.

That the appellant was on the last day of July 1869, and during the whole of the preceding twelve calendar months had been an inhabitant occupier as tenant of a dwelling-house within the township of Horton, in the said borough of Bradford, which dwelling-house was not of the clear yearly value of 10*l.*

That the appellant was during the time of such occupation rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises so occupied by him to all rates made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises, and had paid all rates up to the 5th Jan. 1869 in respect of the said occupation.

That the appellant was the sole tenant of the house in respect of which the claim was made and was alone liable for the payment of the rent and rates payable in respect thereof.

The appellant had during three months of the year preceding the last day of July 1869 let a furnished bedroom in his house as a sleeping apartment to a lodger, who also had the joint use of another apartment as a sitting-room. The appellant provided board for his lodger, and received a fixed weekly sum for such lodging and board; but such lodger was not in any way responsible for the payment of the rent or rates, and his occupancy might at any time have been terminated on one week's notice given by either party.

It was alleged that there are in the said borough a large number of persons, probably 1000, whose right to be on the register of voters for the said borough was not on this occasion in dispute, but who are in a position similar to the appellant in having lodgers, and whose only claim to be on the register is founded on sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1867.

Upon this state of facts the barrister decided that the appellant was a joint occupier of his dwelling-house within the meaning of the proviso at the end of sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1867, and on that ground disallowed his claim to be placed on the register of voters for the said borough.

He was of opinion that the words of the proviso "joint occupier of any dwelling-house" did not either by express words or necessary intendment mean "joint occupier of any dwelling-house, as owner or tenant." That the words "as owner or tenant" being omitted in the proviso, the words

"as joint occupier of any dwelling-house" were comprehensive enough to include lodgers occupying a part of the house. That by sect. 4 of the same statute lodgers are qualified to vote if occupying apartments of 10*l.* value unfurnished, "separately, and as sole tenants;" and that the interpretation clause, sect. 61, defines "dwelling-house" to be "any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling." He thought that the claimant did not occupy any part of his house as "a separate dwelling" within this definition. On reference to the 27th section of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, the 10*l.* occupation franchise is there defined to be by express words "an occupation as owner or tenant." And as the Legislature had left out those words in the proviso to the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, he was of opinion that if the intention was to exclude only joint occupiers of any dwelling-house as owners or tenants in the same respect under that section, apt words would have been introduced to express such intention, and that the words as they stood included lodgers as occupiers as well as owners or tenants.

Secondly, the barrister was of opinion that the lodger was a joint occupier with the claimant of the said dwelling-house, as tenant; that there is nothing in the section to import a tenancy under the same landlord, or in the same right, nor was this held to be necessary under the old Reform Act: (Rogers v. Harvey, 28 L. J. 17, C. P.) A lodger is a tenant (Cook v. Humber, 11 C. B. N. S. 43). and so called in sect. 4 of the Representation of the People Act 1867. And it has been held in the case last quoted, "to be immaterial under what denomination of tenant he is classed, whether as a lodger, a farmer, or a lessee." It seemed to him further, under the authority of Cuthbertson v. Hains, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 525, that the lodger was a joint occupier of the same dwelling-house with the claimant, because the claimant was not separately rated for that part of the house which he occupied as a separate dwelling, so as to constitute that part of it a separate dwelling within the meaning of the 61st section of the Representation of the People Act 1867.

In the case of two other persons claiming to be placed on the list of voters for the borough of Bradford, the same objections were raised to the sufficiency of their qualifications, as in the case of the above-named Joseph Brewer, and their claims were disallowed for the same reason; and John Henry Wade, of Kirkgate, in Bradford, on behalf of the several claimants, duly handed into court a notice in writing that they were severally desirous to appeal from the decision in each of the cases, as erroneous in point of law. The barrister allowed the several appeals, and declared that they ought to be consolidated, as each depended upon the same decision; and he named the town clerk of the said borough of Bradford to be the respondent in such consolidated appeal.

The opinion of the court is asked—Whether the barrister was right in disallowing these several claims? If he was, the respective claims are each to be disallowed. If his decision was wrong in point of law then the respective claimants are to have their names inserted in the list of voters for the borough of Bradford.

H. James, Q. C. argued for the claimant (the appellant), and cited from Lee's Cases (temp. Lord Hardwicke), Fludier v. Sir Thomas Lombe, p. 307, in which it was held that where persons were householders of houses above the value of 10*l.* a-year, and paid scot and lot, but had let part of their houses to lodgers, and thereby reduced their rents to be under 10*l.* per annum, they were occupiers of houses and entitled to vote under the statute 11 Geo. 1, c. 13, for regulating elections in London; Lord Hardwicke then said, "a lodger was never considered by anyone as an occupier of a house. It is not the common understanding of the word, neither the house, nor even any part of it can be properly said to be in the tenure or occupation of the lodger." "Lodgers are inmates, and surely the taking in inmates does not make a man cease to be in the occupation of his house." [He was stopped by the court.]

Francis, for the respondent, contended that on the facts stated there was only a joint occupation by the claimant of part of his dwelling-house, which was, therefore no qualification under sect. 3: although a "dwelling-house" is defined by sect. 61 to include any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, the claimant's occupation cannot be said to come within that definition, for he is sole occupant of no part of the house structurally divided from the remainder. The joint use of the sitting-room should, under this section, deprive the claimant of his vote, even if the lodger's occupation of the bedroom is not within the terms of the proviso. This is not the case of a mere lodger; the joint use of the sitting-room makes the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke inapplicable to these circumstances.

BOVILL, C. J.—Throughout the Act of 1867 a clear distinction is drawn between occupiers of dwelling-houses and lodgers in dwelling houses. In this case the claimant came within the meaning of the second clause of the third section of the Act, being an inhabitant occupier as tenant of a dwelling-house within the borough. Then a question arises whether he was a joint occupier under the proviso at the conclusion of that third section. He had let part of his house to a lodger, and the lodger had the sole use of a furnished bed-room, and the joint use with the claimant of another room, a sitting-room. This, however, does not, in my opinion, make the claimant a joint occupier within the proviso. The lodger was not the occupier of a dwelling house at all; he was an inmate of the house rather than an occupier. This appeal must be allowed, and the appellant must be held to be entitled to the franchise.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite out of the question that we should presume to put such a construction upon this statute as that contended for by the respondent, consistently with the view we take of what the Legislature intended to do. The only safe course is to take the language used, and to give it a plain meaning. The words of the section applicable to this case are, "every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter for a borough who" . . . "has been for twelve months an inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant of any dwelling-house within the borough," . . . "provided that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house." We should next consider whether what is primâ facie the intention of this section 3 is in accordance with previous legislation and decisions. The occupier must be the person who has the general control of the outer door, and this would clearly be the condition of the claimant here, except for the proviso concerning a joint occupier. But by that proviso I think it was never meant to exclude an owner or tenant upon the ground that his lodger had a right to take his meals in a room other than that which he occupied as a lodger. The words "as owner or tenant" are not necessarily excluded from the sense of the proviso, because they are not therein repeated. This section deals only with owners and tenants, and the proviso cannot apply to any other occupiers; by reference to the section the proviso should be read as if the words "as owner or tenant" followed "joint occupier." This lodger has a divided occupation of one room, not as an owner or tenant, but as a lodger. The 4th section provides that a lodger shall be entitled to be registered as a voter who has occupied lodgings separately and as sole tenant;" these words seem to be used in opposition to the words "joint occupier," and they are sufficient to describe the position of the appellant with regard to his dwelling-house. Now, turning to the interpretation clause, sect. 61, we find "dwelling-house shall include any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and separately rated to the relief of the poor;" this definition does not exclude a house in which there is such a joint occupation as this. As the position of the claimant does not depend upon the respective values of the two parts of this house, it is not necessary to refer to sect. 29 of the Act of 1832, by which joint occupiers were qualified to vote under certain circumstances. This conclusion reconciles former legislation with the present, and the present with itself. The decision of the revising barrister was, in my opinion, wrong, and the appeal will therefore be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot help thinking that this section is quite clear upon this point when we consider the previous state of the law. The last Act was passed with the object of extending the franchise. Under the former law, joint occupation, if the rent of each joint occupier amounted to 10*l.* a year, gave votes to each. Now it is provided that the limit in amount is to be done away with, and that the rent need not be 10*l.* a year, but it has been thought necessary to put in a proviso that the franchise shall not be reduced in the case of joint occupation, and that nobody who is a joint occupier shall be affected by this third section. During the last three months of the qualifying year the claimant let off a room, and permitted his lodger to use another room occasionally, but he kept the control of the outer door, and was just as much an inhabitant occupier of the dwelling-house as he was before. It is said, however, that allowing the lodger the joint use with himself of a house other than that which he occupied separately and as sole tenant, disqualified the claimant, because it made him the joint occupier of part of the dwelling-house. In my opinion that proceeding had no such consequence. I think we must come to the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to be registered.

BRETT, J.—I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to vote under this sect. 3. The proviso puts a certain limitation upon the direct enactment, but when it appears that the section itself relates only to "an inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant," it is clear that the subsection can have only the same relation. By sects. 3 and 4 the Act deals with the two classes of persons qualified to be voters for boroughs, and in the former of those sections "an occupier" is meant to refer to every kind of occupation different from that of a lodger. By previous law a vote was given for joint occupation over the value of 10*l.* a year; but, in order that no analogy might be drawn from that law to the new extension of the franchise, this proviso was put in, but with no reference to the new class of lodgers.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 16.

Re THE BEVERLEY COMMISSIONERS; Ex parte FLINT AND FITZGERALD.

*Bribery commissioners—Jurisdiction of—Adjournment—Power to hold independent meetings—Committal for contempt—Consent of Secretary of State to adjournment—*15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, ss. 1, 4, 6.

By sect. 4 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, the commissioners appointed under the Act to make inquiry as aforesaid in relation to any county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards, go to such county, &c., and shall from time to time hold meetings for the purposes of such inquiry, at some convenient place within the same, or within ten miles thereof, and shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time, and from any one place to any other place within such county, &c., or within ten miles thereof, as to them may seem expedient; and such commissioners shall give notice of their appointment, and of the time and place of holding their first meeting, by publishing the same in some newspaper in general circulation, in such county, &c., or the neighbourhood thereof, provided always that such commissioners shall not adjourn the inquiry for any period exceeding one week without the consent and approbation of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State:

Held, that commissioners appointed under the Act had power to hold separate independent meetings from time to time, and were not obliged to adjourn at the close of every meeting in order to keep their power alive and enable them to meet again.

In this case Sir J. Karslake, Q. C. had obtained a rule nisi for a habeas corpus on behalf of the applicants, who were confined in York Castle, under the following circumstances.

Three commissioners had been appointed to inquire into alleged corrupt practices at the last election for the borough of Beverley, under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57. They went down to Beverley, and held various meetings, each meeting being regularly adjourned to the next succeeding meeting, and on the 18th Sept. their secretary wrote to one of the Secretaries of State, requesting permission to adjourn the inquiry until the 19th Oct., in the following terms:

Sir,—I am directed by the commissioners to inform you that by the end of next week the principal business of the commission will be concluded, and they accordingly desire your permission to adjourn the inquiry from Monday, Sept. 27th to Monday Oct. 19th, at which latter date they hope to complete the inquiry in a few days.

On the 22nd the Secretary of State answered, giving the required permission. On the date of the receipt of that answer the commissioners agreed upon such adjournment, and an announcement that such adjournment would take place was publicly made in the town hall, at a meeting held by the commissioners on the 25th Sept. On the 25th the commissioners adjourned to the 27th, on which day two only of the commissioners attended, examined witnesses, and adjourned to the 19th Oct. On that day the three commissioners again met, and adjourned to the 21st. On the 21st they again met, and the applicants, Flint and Fitzgerald, having been summoned as witnesses, appeared, but refused to be sworn, and were accordingly committed by the commissioners for contempt.

The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Archibald now showed cause against the rule.—First, there was no necessity for an adjournment at all in order to keep the commissioners' powers alive; secondly, what really took place amounted to a valid adjournment. This is a commission for the purpose of instituting an inquiry, and to that end of examining witnesses and making a report. It pronounces no judgment. It is not therefore in any sense a court, inasmuch as its functions are not judicial. Now the presumption seems to be in favour of such a body's having power to hold independent meetings from time to time. The other side seems to seek to shift the onus of proof on to us, and to assume that the commissioners' functions cease in the absence of an adjournment. They import the analogy of the court of quarter sessions, but that if considered cannot help them; for to sustain such an analogy they must contend that the functions of the commissioners are limited to one day in the absence of adjournment. There is no analogy whatever between a court of quarter sessions and this commission. Adjournment in relation to the former signifies the power of dissolving and reconstituting the court on a future day; if the court separates without an adjournment there is an end of it, for the act of adjournment can only be done by the court which has ceased to exist. Now there is nothing like dissolution and reconstitution of the commission. Having shown, therefore, that the analogy of a court is fallacious, let us look to the words of the statute. The first part of the 4th section clearly gives the power to hold distinct independent meetings. This general power ought not to be held to be cut down except by clear and express words. Now the subsequent words of the statute, not purporting to be restrictive, ought not to be construed as such, inasmuch as a most reasonable meaning can be otherwise given to them. Various cases might arise in which the power of continuing one meeting to a subsequent occasion might be most eminently useful. With respect to the proviso at the end of the section, it is clear that that cannot have the effect of making an adjournment necessary. The provision there is against an adjournment of the "inquiry," not of the "meeting." The word "adjournment" is clearly only used here in the popular sense of postponement. Then, if an adjournment were necessary, it is submitted that there was a valid one here. All three commissioners announced their intention to adjourn at the meeting of the 25th, and the meeting of the 27th was a mere nullity if the other side be correct [KELLY, C.B.—Does that amount to an actual adjournment? It is only an expression of intention.] The adjournment, however, on the 27th was valid according to our contention. All three commissioners had agreed upon it, and exercised their discretion in reference thereto; it would lead to the utmost absurdity and inconvenience if the announcement of it by two were insufficient. If one commissioner were taken suddenly ill or faint, or a railway accident prevented his arrival at the place of meeting in time, the whole of the proceedings would come to an end if, as contended, neither the commissioners present could adjourn nor all the commissioners subsequently hold a fresh meeting. They cited

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C. Sleigh, Serjt., and Morgan Howard supported the rule.—In the first place, the meeting must be adjourned; secondly, there was no such adjournment here. It is not contended that there is a precise analogy between the commissioners and a court, but, inasmuch as they derive their powers from the Act, they must follow the provisions of the Act in the exercise of them. Now, it is clear from the consideration of the whole of the provisions of the 4th section that though the commissioners might from time to time hold meetings, all meetings subsequent to the first were to be held by adjournment from it. Provision is made for notice being given of the first meeting, but not for any of the subsequent meetings, obviously because it was contemplated there would be an adjournment. The word "adjourn" has a well-known legal meaning; it is not to be assumed that the Legislature which was using the word in its proper sense in various contemporaneous Acts did not mean to use it in the same sense here. The power given to adjourn would be nugatory and superfluous if the commissioners had power to meet from time to time afresh, without adjournment. The arguments derived from the possible inconveniences which might arise from the necessity of adjournment apply equally well to the necessity of adjournments of the court of quarter sessions. Yet the Legislature in that case have thought it proper that an adjournment should be necessary. The provision at the end of the section shows unmistakeably what was intended. There is no difference between the "inquiry" and the "meeting." It is clear that it was intended that the meeting should be adjourned from time to time, but in order to prevent protracting the inquiry unnecessarily no adjournment was to be for more than a week without the approval of the Secretary of State. This provision only applies to adjournment, and if the contention on the other side be correct, a fresh meeting might be held at any interval. Thus giving the word "adjourn" its proper legal signification, a reasonable construction is found for the whole of the provisions of the 4th section. Surely this is to be preferred to a construction which gives a wholly incorrect meaning to the word "adjourn," and makes great part of the section surplusage. Then, if an adjournment was necessary, there was not a valid one here. The adjournment must be the act of the commissioners acting quâ commissioners. They have an important discretion to exercise as to time and place. They cannot delegate the matter to one of their number; all three must exercise their discretion, and so all three ought to be present to make up their minds at the time and place of adjournment. Moreover, an adjournment for an interval of more than a week without the permission of the Secretary of State is void. Here the adjournment till the 19th Oct. was without authority, for the permission given by the Secretary of State was to an adjournment from the 27th Sept. to the 19th Oct. The Secretary of State has a discretion to exercise in the matter, and it might well be that he would have refused to allow an adjournment from an earlier period than the 27th; he might have said, "Why do you propose to waste the time until the 27th?" The permission given by him cannot be exceeded, and it presupposed a valid meeting on the 27th. [KELLY, C. B.—Suppose "adjourn" in the section merely means "postpone?"] I contend that the same reasoning would apply. [CHANNELL, B.—Giving the application a fair and reasonable construction, may not its substance be an application to postpone the inquiry till October shortly, without reference to the exact date of the meeting from which the postponement was to be?] All the facts are against such a construction. The other commissioners never agreed to or applied for a postponement from the 25th, but only from the 27th. They cited

KELLY, C.B.—The questions raised in this case are of great importance, inasmuch as they not only involve the liberty of the subject, but our decision must govern the proceedings which may take place under future commissions. Under these circumstances we thought it right to grant a rule, in order that the matter might be fully discussed, and the arguments on both sides considered. That has now been done, and I am of opinion without any doubt that the rule should be discharged. The facts of the case lie in a very narrow compass. It appears that three gentlemen were appointed to act as commissioners. They went down to Beverley, and held several meetings at which witnesses were examined, and various proceedings took place. All these meetings it is admitted were perfectly regular, but about the last week in September the commissioners thought it expedient to put off further meetings for a longer interval than a week, viz., till October. Accordingly they communicated with the Secretary of State, and received permission from him to adjourn from the 27th Sept. to the 19th Oct. His answer was received probably on the 23rd Sept., and on the date of such receipt the commissioners all agreed to such adjournment, and it was publicly announced that such adjournment would take place in the Town Hall at a meeting that took place on the 25th. This meeting was duly held by all three commissioners, and the inquiry was then postponed till the 27th. On the 27th a meeting was held, at which, however, only two commissioners were present, and then those two commissioners expressly postponed the inquiry till the 19th Oct. It is insisted that, only two commissioners being present the meeting was invalid; and that, supposing even that the act of a majority of the commissioners would be valid, it is necessary that the whole body should be present at a meeting; but on that point, as it does not necessarily arise as it seems to me, I express no opinion; not so much because I feel any doubt on the point, as because I think the safest course in such a case is that there should be no judicial expression of opinion on a point that is not directly involved in the decision at which the court has arrived. Putting aside, therefore, this question, and assuming that the meeting being of two only, and so at that meeting the discretion of three not being exercised, the meeting was invalid, and that consequently all the proceedings, including the adjournment, were void, and must be treated as never having taken place at all, the question arises whether any adjournment was necessary according to the provisions of the Act. It is contended that proceedings under these commissions are analogous to, or in the nature of, judicial proceedings, and that consequently at any meeting of the commissioners an adjournment from time to time is necessary, as in the case of a meeting of magistrates at quarter sessions. Now, in my opinion, this commission does not constitute a court at all—it is a mere commission authorising certain persons to prosecute an inquiry, and incidentally to the exercise of such authority in one instance, and it would appear in only one instance, to exercise powers of a judicial character; that is to say, on a witness appearing and being guilty of a contempt, they have power to punish such contempt as any one of the courts in Westminster Hall would have power. That power is, however, only incidental to the main object of the commission, and does not, in my opinion, constitute the commissioners a court, or create any of the analogies of a court of justice. My brother Cleasby has referred to Lord Coke's writings with reference to the functions of commissioners, but the commissioners there referred to are such as exercise functions in their nature judicial. We are, therefore, not called upon, I think, to consider the analogy of a court of justice or the doctrines laid down by Lord Coke, which have been referred to, for it appears to me that the powers of these commissioners depend entirely upon the terms of the Act of Parliament under which they are appointed. The question, therefore, is, whether the commissioners, in prosecuting their inquiry, must be taken to be authorised to hold only one single meeting as long as it is necessary the inquiry should be continued, or several successive independent meetings, not to be holden by adjournment from the original meeting, but from time to time, as the prosecution of the inquiry may require. Now, by the 6th section we find that the commissioners shall, by all such lawful means as to them appear best, with a view to the discovery of the truth, inquire into the manner in which the election has been conducted, and whether any corrupt practices have been committed at such election. By the 4th section it is provided that the commissioners appointed under this Act, to make inquiry as aforesaid, shall, upon their appointment, or within a reasonable time afterwards, go to such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, and shall, from time to time, hold meetings for the purposes of such inquiry within the same or within ten miles thereof. Now here we find by these sections general powers given, which, if not restrained in any way in any other part of the Act, certainly enables the commissioners to prosecute their inquiry by holding meeting after meeting, as in the exercise of their discretion they may think best for the purposes of such inquiry; and if the 4th section stopped here it would be perfectly clear that the commissioners could hold fresh independent meetings without adjournment from one to the other. The section, however, proceeds as follows: "And shall have power to adjourn such meetings from time to time from any one place to any other place within such county, &c., as to them may seem expedient; and such commissioners shall give notice of their appointment, and of the time and place of holding their first meeting, by publishing the same in some newspaper in general circulation in such county," &c. Now it is contended, in support of the rule, that the provision for giving notice of the first meeting shows that this is to be the only meeting except those by adjournment, which are all to operate merely in continuance of this original meeting. The use of the expression "first" seems to me to be somewhat against this contention, but I do not rely very much on that. When we look to the nature of the commissioners' functions, we shall find the strongest reasons against giving the words of the section the meaning contended for in support of the rule, and in favour of the meaning's being that successive meetings may be held. Why, for instance, after one or more meetings have been held for the purposes of the inquiry—of which due notice has been given, and all that remains to be done afterwards is for the commissioners to meet to consider the evidence and agree as to their report, a meeting at which no portion of the public are called upon or entitled to attend—should it be necessary that any adjournment should take place from the last public meeting? Again; the Act says, that if the commissioners find corrupt practices to have been committed, they may make the like inquiries concerning previous elections; having concluded their inquiry as to the last election, they may wish to consider whether they will come to the conclusion that corrupt practices have been committed, and accordingly, whether they will inquire into previous elections or not. Why, in this case, should an adjournment be necessary when it is uncertain whether any further meetings are to be held or not, and nothing can be settled as to the time or place of such meetings, if any be held? It seems by far the more reasonable construction that these meetings may be separate independent meetings. In some cases, and as to some meetings, circumstances may require express adjournment, but in other cases it may be wholly unnecessary and even inappropriate. With reference to the words relating to adjournment, it is to be observed that they do not say that the commissioners "shall adjourn," but that they "shall have power to adjourn from time to time and from any one place to any other place within such county." As I said before, if the section stopped before those words it would clearly give power to hold fresh independent meetings, and why should these words be considered as restricting the previous part of the section. Their natural meaning is not that the commissioners are bound to adjourn, but that they may do so if they think fit. A witness might be describing some transaction in which knowledge of the position of particular localities might be essential to understanding his evidence, and the commissioners might desire to look at the spot for themselves; and, having done so, to return and proceed with the meeting. If a particular witness were unwell, they might think it expedient to adjourn to his residence and take his evidence. At most this is but a power contained in the Act, and cannot be construed as intended to restrict powers given in the previous part of the section. It is said that adjournment is always necessary, for how else are people to know when the next meeting will be held. The answer is, in the same way as any one else who is not present at the meeting. A witness who has not been required to give his evidence before must have a fresh notice. Notice may be given, under the general powers of the Act, by advertisement or otherwise. It is said that the meaning of the Act must be taken from the analogy of courts, or other commissions, where an adjournment is absolutely necessary; and the Legislature, in using this word "adjourn," must be taken to have meant to use it in the strict technical sense derived from such analogy; but if that construction were put on the statute the greatest mischief and inconvenience might arise. If from illness or any accident a meeting appointed cannot be held, the whole proceedings will be at an end. The argument ab inconvenienti, it is urged, might be equally well applied to the case of quarter sessions, and yet the Legislature has clearly rendered an adjournment necessary in their case. But it is clear that in the case of a commission like this the mischief and inconvenience are so much more likely to occur that the two cases are not really analogous; and we ought not, unless compelled by the strongest and clearest words, to hold the same rule to have been intended to apply to both. But now we come to the words at the end of the section, and it is said that these show an adjournment to be necessary. They are these: "Provided always that such commissioners shall not adjourn the inquiry for any period exceeding one week without the consent and approbation of one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State." The whole question with reference to this proviso turns on the word "adjourn;" if it implies that no meeting can be held other than the original meeting except by adjournment, and that no such adjournment shall be beyond a week without the permission of the Secretary of State, then, of course, no meeeting can be good unless there have been a regular adjournment from the previous one; but it seems to me, looking to the whole of the Act, that this proviso means nothing more than that they shall not protract the inquiry by holding meetings at greater intervals than a week without the permission of the Secretary of State; and if they find it necessary to hold a meeting at a greater interval, they must apply for that permission. The word "adjourn" in this place merely means "postpone" in my opinion, and all that is required is permission to postpone the inquiry beyond a week. That permission the commissioners clearly got, and public notice was given on the 25th Sept. that the inquiry would be postponed until the 19th Oct. The other clauses of the Act seem to me, like those which I have read, uniformly to point to the conclusion that the powers conferred on the commissioners are not in their nature judicial, and that it was not intended to encumber them in an inquiry of this sort with the forms of judicial procedure; very general and extensive powers are given to them for the purpose of eliciting the truth; they are to use all such lawful means as to them may seem best. The words of the 4th section certainly bear the construction that they may from time to time, as they deem it expedient for the purposes of the inquiry, hold separate and independent meetings; and it seems to me, from the very nature of the inquiry that they were to hold, absolutely necessary that they should have such power. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also quite satisfied that the rule should be discharged. These commissioners were acting under 15 & 16 Vict., c. 57, and I quite agree with the argument that their authority depends wholly upon the terms of that Act. If they were not exercising that authority when they made those committals, the applicants are entitled to be discharged out of custody. Admitting, then, that they were merely the creatures of the statute, the question arises whether by the statute they were bound to adjourn their meeting from time to time in order to keep the whole proceedings alive; and they have been compared to a court to which an adjournment is necessary. Now it is true that by the statute they are entitled to exercise some powers which a court of law may exercise, and in a similar way, but that does not, in my opinion, constitute them a court. If the 4th section stopped at the words "ten miles thereof," I should have thought the case clear beyond all reasonable doubt, and that these were commissioners acting with express powers to hold meetings from time to time. But a difficulty has been suggested, arising from the subsequent part of the section, which says that they shall have power to adjourn. The question is what construction is to be put upon the word "adjourn" here, and in the proviso at the end of the section?—whether it is to be construed as involving the necessity for an adjournment in the strict legal sense of the term, or merely as used in a more popular sense, and referring to postponement. Now it is worthy of observation that the adjournment is contemplated in two points of view: first, with regard to time; and secondly, with regard to place. With respect to the latter, the commissioners are empowered to adjourn to any place within the limits of their authority without any sanction; but, with respect to time, they cannot adjourn, so that more than a week shall elapse in the prosecution of the inquiry, unless they obtain the approval of the Secretary of State. The concluding words of the 4th section, which make the approval of the Secretary of State necessary are only restrictive of the powers of adjournment previously given, but the 5th section is a positive enactment, and by that the commissioners are empowered with such consent and approbation as aforesaid to hold meetings in the cities of London and Westminster, and to adjourn the same from time to time, as they may deem fit. I cannot, on looking at these provisions as a whole, come to the conclusion that the provisions relating to adjournment were intended to restrict the previous words which give power to hold meetings from time to time. It seems to have been supposed that the effect of the decision of the Queen's Bench is to make the words relating to adjournment mere surplusage; but I do not think that any of the expressions used by the judges there could have been meant to be taken in this sense. It may be, and that was probably all that was intended, that it was not necessary for the purpose of continuing to hold meetings, to exercise the power of adjournment given by the middle part of the 4th section, yet that power may be, as in the cases suggested by the Lord Chief Baron, eminently useful. I do not think, therefore, that those words are surplusage, but I cannot come to the conclusion that they are intended to be restrictive. If the true construction of the Act be such as I have mentioned, then all its requirements were complied with in this case. The postponement of the further prosecution of the inquiry till October was approved of by the Secretary of State, the commissioners all agreed upon such adjournment, and public notice was given that it would be so adjourned or postponed until the 19th Oct. What occurred on the 27th Sept. may be treated as a nullity, and there was therefore a valid postponement made at a meeting at which all three commissioners were present. It was argued, with relation to the postponement till the 19th Oct., that, an adjournment being necessary, there was virtually no consent to such adjournment as took place, because the approval of the Secretary of State must be taken with reference to the application on the 18th, which was not for an adjournment from the 25th, but from the 27th, and that there was no specific consent by reason of the informal meeting, the consent presupposing a valid adjournment on the 27th. On that point I decline to offer any opinion, for in my view it is unnecessary to decide it, if I am right as to the construction of the statute, and no adjournment was necessary to keep the powers of the commissioners alive.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the commissioners, when they made this committal, were acting within their powers. These powers are prescribed by the Act under which they were appointed. We must give this Act a reasonable construction, looking to the subject-matter with which it deals; and I think in so doing it will be found there is no real ambiguity in it, and that the provisions of the 4th section are all very easily reconcilable. It provides that the commissioners shall go down to the place where the inquiry is to be, and may hold meetings from time to time for the purposes of such inquiry. If the section had stopped there, there would have been no room for contention as to its meaning; but it goes on, and adds a power of adjournment from time to time of such "meetings." I confess I cannot imagine words more unapt to lay down the necessity of an adjournment from day to day. The words purport to give a "power" not to restrict previous powers. Such a power is by no means superfluous. Cases may easily be imagined in which the necessity for its exercise would arise. The summons to a witness would require attendance at the time and place specified. If a witness summoned were not examined, it is quite clear if the power of adjournment were not exercised, he must be summoned over again. Then, thirdly, comes the proviso which sets a limit to the power of adjourning. This seems to me to make no difference; it does not imply that the meeting must be kept alive by adjournment, or else that the powers of the commissioners will come to an end. The word adjourn may be used in a strict technical sense as with reference to the court of quarter sessions; but it may also be used in a more popular sense, as meaning merely postponement. The provision is merely that the inquiry shall not be postponed beyond the certain limit, without the consent of the Secretary of State. It is clear that the commissioners did not postpone the inquiry beyond the week without the consent of the Secretary of State. They agreed to postpone the meeting from the 25th to the 27th; so far they required no permission. For the postponement till the 19th Oct., upon which they all agreed, and of which notice was given, they had the requisite approval. The question is whether the consent and all the subsequent proceedings became void because no valid meeting was held on the 27th. I cannot come to such a conclusion; reading the word "adjourn" as meaning "postponement," with reference to this point, for such postponement they had permission. If we come to the conclusion that no formal adjournment was necessary, it seems to me to follow that all that was requisite to give the commissioners jurisdiction existed in this case.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the meeting of the 21st Oct. was a valid meeting of the commissioners under the Act. It is argued that it was not, because their powers had come to an end for want of a previous adjournment. It is alleged in answer, first, that no such adjournment was necessary; and, secondly, that if it were, there was a valid adjournment Now a commission under this Act does not appoint a commissioner to any office by virtue of which he exercises any particular authority or character apart from the provisions of the Act. We have therefore to look to the Act alone to determine the powers of the commissioners and their limits. Now if I were satisfied that a regular adjournment were necessary it would not be necessary to decide the first point, but I confess I cannot see my way to deciding that this was a regular adjournment by all three of the commissioners. All that was stated at the meeting of the 25th Sept. was a mere expression of intention to adjourn after a meeting on the 27th. I do not think that amounted to an adjournment. The intention might have existed, but it might be altered; it might be that on the 27th circumstances might arise to induce the commissioners to come to the conclusion that the adjournment had better be to the 28th. Neither can I think that the act of the two commissioners on the 27th could constitute a valid adjournment. If an adjournment be necessary to keep the commission alive, it is clear it is no matter of mere form or small importance. But these points become immaterial for the conclusion at which I have arrived, looking to the words of the 4th and 5th sections of the Act, and the subject-matter, and the fact that the commissioners have to report as well as to hear evidence, is that it not essential that there should be an adjournment in order to keep the commission alive. The words of the 4th section give the power to meet from time to time, and then give power to adjourn from time to time and place to place. Without these words, I should think the commissioners would probably have the power, as necessary to their functions, of meeting and adjourning; but the Legislature has thought fit to put this matter beyond doubt by giving the express power. The effect of an adjournment, as distinguished from a fresh, independent meeting is of importance, for, by adjournment, all the meetings so adjourned are continued as one meeting; everything done at a meeting remains in force over all the days during which such meeting lasts. Then the Act proceeds to impose a limitation. The effect is that without the authority of the Secretary of State there cannot be an interval of more than a week between the meetings held in the course of the inquiry. Giving these provisions the most careful consideration that I can, I come to the conclusion that an adjournment was not necessary, and that this meeting was so far perfectly good and valid. But a third question has been suggested. It is said that assuming an adjournment was not necessary, yet if a fresh meeting was held at a greater interval than a week it would not be valid unless held with the consent and approbation of the Secretary of State; and it is further argued that no consent or approbation was given to the adjournment that took place till October. I do not think there is anything in this contention when the substantial effect of what took place is looked at. It is quite clear that if they had separated without adjournment on the 25th, and had then within the week applied for and obtained the permission of the Secretary of State to meet again at a greater interval than a week, such a mode of proceeding would have been valid if our view of the law be correct. It is suggested that here the consent having been to a specified mode of proceeding, namely, to an adjournment after a meeting to be held on the 27th Sept., and that meeting never having been held, the subsequent meeting of 19th Oct. was without authority. I do not think we are driven to that conclusion. Bearing it in mind that no adjournment was necessary, it seems to me that the substance of the authority given was to postpone the inquiry until the 19th Oct. It seems to me therefore that all the requisites necessary to give the commission jurisdiction existed. No adjournment was necessary; the meeting that was held afterwards, at a greater interval than a week, was held with the consent and approbation of the Secretary of State. Under these circumstances the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Reg. v. William Martin.

Coining—Felony—Having possession of counterfeit coin after previous conviction—Course of proof at trial—24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, ss. 12 and 37.

On the trial of an indictment for felonious possession of counterfeit coin, with intent to utter the same, after a previous conviction, the course of proceeding at the trial is prescribed by sect. 37, viz., first to try that part of the offence which relates to the possession, and then, if the prisoner be found guilty, to try the prisoner for the previous conviction.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by William Forsyth, Esq., Q. C., sitting as a commissioner at the Leeds Summer Assizes.

William Martin was tried before me on the charge of being unlawfully in possession of counterfeit coin, he having been before convicted of unlawfully uttering counterfeit coin.

The following is a copy of the indictment:

Yorkshire, West Riding Division, to wit. The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath present that William Martin, on the 10th April 1869, unlawfully had in his custody and possession fifteen pieces of false and counterfeit coin, resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for fifteen pieces of the Queen's current silver coin called crowns; five pieces of false and counterfeit coin resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for five pieces of the Queen's current silver coins called florins: and five pieces of false and counterfeit coin resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for five pieces of the Queen's current silver coin called shillings, knowing the said several pieces of false and counterfeit coin to be false and counterfeit, and with intent unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully to utter and put off the same, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that heretofore and before the committing of the offence hereinbefore mentioned, to wit, at a special session and delivery of the gaol of our Lady the Queen, holden at Lincoln, in and for the county of Lincoln, on Friday the 11th Dec., in the twenty-first year of Her present Majesty's reign, the said William Martin, in the name of Martin Kelley, was, in due form of law, convicted on a certain indictment against him for that he on the 14th Nov. in the twenty first year of the reign aforesaid, at the parish of Gainsborough, in the county of Lincoln, did unlawfully utter and put off to Mary Pycock one counterfeit half-crown, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, against the form of the statute in such case then made and provided. And that the said William Martin, in the name of Martin Kelley, was thereupon ordered to be imprisoned in the house of correction and kept to hard labour for the term of two years. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that the said William Martin on the day and year first aforesaid, feloniously and unlawfully had in his custody and possession the said several pieces of false and counterfeit coin, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, and with intent unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully to utter and put off the same in manner and form aforesaid, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Second count:

And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath aforesaid do further present that the said William Martin afterwards, to wit, on the 10th April 1869, feloniously and unlawfully had in his custody and possession fifteen pieces of false and counterfeit coin, resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for fifteen pieces of the Queen's current silver coin, called crowns, and five pieces of false and counterfeit coin, resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for five pieces of the Queen's current silver coin, called florins, and five pieces of false and counterfeit coin, resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for five pieces of the Queen's current silver coin, called shillings, knowing the said several pieces of false and counterfeit coin to be false and counterfeit, and with intent unlawfully, fraudulently, and deceitfully to utter and put off the same against the form of the statute, in such case made and provided. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do say that heretofore, and before the committing of the offence in this count mentioned, to wit, at a special session and delivery of the gaol of our lady the Queen, holden at Lincoln, in and for the county of Lincoln, on Friday, the 11th Dec., in the twenty-first year of Her present Majesty's reign, the said William Martin, in the name of Martin Kelley, was in due form of law convicted on a certain indictment against him, for that he on the 14th Nov., in the twenty-first year of the reign aforesaid, at the parish of Gainsborough, in the county of Lincoln, did unlawfully utter and put off to Mary Pycock one counterfeit half crown, knowing the same to be false and counterfeit against the form of the statute, in such case then made and provided. And that the said William Martin, in the name of Martin Kelley, was thereupon ordered to be imprisoned in the House of Correction and kept to hard labour for the term of two years.

At the outset of the case Mr. Forbes, the counsel for the prosecution, called a witness, and proposed to give in evidence a certificate to prove the previous conviction of the prisoner. Mr. Middleton, the counsel for the prisoner, objected, and I, having regard to the 37th section of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, refused to receive the evidence at that stage of the case.

Evidence was then given to show that the prisoner was guilty of the subsequent offence charged, but I refused to allow evidence to be given of the previous conviction until the jury should give their verdict upon the subsequent charge.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, the counsel for the prisoner contended that there was no case of felony to go to the jury, for that the offence of being in possession of counterfeit coin, was, by the 12th section of the above statute, made felony only when there had been a previous conviction of an offence relating to the coin, and no such previous conviction had been proved.

I allowed the case to go to the jury upon the question whether the prisoner was guilty or not of the subsequent offence.

The jury found a verdict of guilty.

The prisoner was then asked whether he had been previously convicted as charged in the indictment, and he admitted that he had been so convicted.

Feeling doubtful whether I had done right, first in refusing to admit the certificate when it was tendered in evidence, and, secondly, in leaving to the jury the question of the prisoner's guilt as to the subsequent offence before the previous conviction had been proved, I deferred passing sentence, and the prisoner remains in custody.

I desire to have the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved whether I was right in rejecting the certificate when it was tendered in evidence, and in submitting to the jury the question whether the prisoner was guilty of the subsequent offence before the previous conviction had been proved against him.

William Forsyth.

Forbes for the prosecution.—The question was reserved in order to ascertain what is the proper mode of proceeding upon the trial of cases of this kind. The indictment is under the 12th section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, which enacts that "Whosoever having been convicted of any such misdemeanor or crime and offence as in any of the last three preceding sections mentioned, or of any felony or high crime and offence against this or any former Act relating to the coin, shall afterwards commit any of the misdemeanors or crimes and offences in any of the said sections mentioned, shall be guilty of felony." By the 11th section, the having three or more pieces of counterfeit gold or silver coin in possession, with intent to utter or put off the same, is made a misdemeanor. Upon the trial of indictments of this kind different modes of proceeding have prevailed. The 37th section, however, seems to apply. That enacts that "Where any person shall have been convicted of any offence against this Act, or any former Act relating to the coin, and shall afterwards be indicted for any offence against this Act committed subsequent to such conviction, it shall be sufficient in any such indictment, after charging such subsequent offence, to state the substance and effect only of the indictment. . . . And the proceedings upon any indictment for committing any offence after a previous conviction shall be as follows (that is to say), the offender shall in the first instance be arraigned upon so much only of the indictment as charges the subsequent offence, and if he plead not guilty the jury shall be charged in the first instance to inquire concerning such subsequent offence only; and if they find him guilty he shall then, and not before, be asked whether he had been previously convicted, and if he answer that he had been so previously convicted, the court may proceed to sentence him; but if he deny that he had been so previously convicted the jury shall then be charged to inquire concerning such previous conviction. [Blackburn, J.—Mr. Justice Crompton pointed out the difficulty on this section. The charge in the indictment is for felony, which cannot be unless the prisoner has been previously convicted; but he said the technical difficulty must give way to the common sense of the words, and the first thing to be tried was, was the prisoner guilty of misdemeanor? And then if he was, had he been previously convicted.] Willes, J., at the Warwick Assizes in 1851, Lush, J., at the Leeds Assizes in 1867, and Mellor, J., had ruled that it was necessary to prove the previous conviction first, and then the other part of the offence. [Martin, B.—To make the offence a felony, I should have thought it right to prove the previous conviction first, but sect. 37 directs how the proceeding is to be.] Sects. 20 and 21 were then referred to.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

Kelly, C. B.—Section 37 prescribes the course of proceeding on the trial of such indictments as this, and that was the course adopted in the present case. The conviction will, therefore, be affirmed.

Lush, J.—When I directed a different course at the Leeds Assizes my attention was not called to sect. 37, but I afterwards discovered it, and that prescribes the course of proceeding.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

The pictures were not then completed, but afterwards defendant expressed approval of them, and said he would send for them next day:

Plaintiff was an artist, defendant a picture dealer; there had been many transactions between them, and the claim for 3*l.* 10*s.* related to a previous affair not material here.

When the agreement was entered into, the pictures bargained for were neither of them finished; the plaintiff took possession of the clock just afterwards.

On the 2nd June plaintiff wrote to defendant saying the pictures were finished, and asking for the money. The defendant called at the plaintiff's studio, and a conversation took place, about which the evidence was conflicting. Both parties admitted that defendant agreed to buy another picture of plaintiff for 20*l.* Plaintiff said that defendant expressed approval of the three pictures which were the subject of this action, and agreed to send for them the following morning; he also said that he sold the fourth picture for 20*l.* upon condition that the defendant should pay the whole 80*l.* he owed the plaintiff the next day when he sent for the pictures. The defendant, however, said that he made no such condition as to his purchase for 20*l.*, and that he called the plaintiff's attention to some objections which he made concerning the colour of some drapery and the naturalness of some flowers in the other three pictures; and never entertained an intention of taking the pictures until these matters to which he objected were altered.

Next day defendant sent his son to plaintiff with 10*l.*, and a request to have the 20*l.* picture; this plaintiff refused, and he returned the 10*l.* Afterwards nothing further, except recrimination, took place between the parties.

Griffits submitted that upon this action for goods bargained and sold, and sold and delivered, there must be a nonsuit as to the subject of the agreement of the 3rd May. There was no evidence of appropriation; the proper form of action would have been for not accepting; and the claim could only be for damages. The defendant might have answered such an action by payment into court, or by objection to the manner in which the pictures were painted. He cited Lee v. Griffin, 1 B. & S. 272, in which it was held that a contract to make a set of artificial teeth was a contract to supply goods, and not for work, and that the relative value of the work to that of the materials was no criterion as to the nature of the contract.

Day, for the plaintiff, contended that the property passed to the defendant when he called at the plaintiff's studio, expressed approval of the pictures, and said he would send for them next day.

MELLOR, J.—I shall hold that upon the plaintiff's story, if it be true, the property then passed to the defendant, and this action will lie; and, if I thought it necessary, I should certainly amend the declaration.

Day declined to have the record amended.

In summing up to the jury, the learned JUDGE asked them if they believed the plaintiff's version of the conversation between himself and the defendant in the studio. If they did not believe it, but accepted the defendant's evidence, which he reminded them the defendant did not give with very great confidence,—if, he said, they believed that the defendant on the last occasion of his seeing the pictures expressed dissatisfaction, and did not promise to pay for them the next day, then perhaps Mr. Griffits had some foundation for his objection, and the verdict should be for the defendant as to 60*l.* of the claim.

The jury found a verdict for the whole amount claimed by the plaintiff, and the learned judge stayed the postea, and granted leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit as to 60*l.* upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to establish legal appropriation of these specific pictures, but upon the following conditions—viz., that the amount of the verdict should be paid into court in a week, that the plaintiff should keep the pictures till the whole matter had been settled, and that both parties should be bound by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, the court being at liberty to amend the form of action upon any terms.

MILLER v. MILLER.

Restitution of conjugal rights—Husband successful—Wife condemned in costs—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 51.

A wife in her answer to a petition for restitution of conjugal rights, made charges against her husband of odious and disgusting conduct, which her counsel withdrew at the trial. She was proved to have a separate income of 700l. a year. The husband obtained a decree, and the court, under the 51st section of the Divorce Act, condemned the wife in the costs of the suit.

This was a suit by the husband for the restitution of conjugal rights. The parties were married in June 1856, the husband being then practising as a surgeon at Barton, in Staffordshire, and the wife having a separate income of her own to the amount of 700*l.* a year. In 1864, the wife induced her husband to give up his practice, and to come up to London, urging that her income was large enough for their maintenance. Accordingly they came to London, and cohabited at Tavistock-terrace, Notting-hill. In Nov. 1866, the wife, without just cause, withdrew herself from cohabitation, and has ever since refused to return to her husband's house. In March 1868, the husband filed a petition for the restitution of conjugal rights. The wife in her answer denied generally that she had withdrawn herself from the cohabitation, and went on to charge her husband with cruelty, and alleging that her health had suffered very considerably "from the violent filthy conduct towards her" of her husband. In the fourth and fifth paragraphs she gave particulars alleging that at two specified dates in Aug. 1865, and in Nov. 1866, "The said Benjamin Miller insisted with violence, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the respondent, in the exercise of his marital rights at a period when it was not proper or decent to have conjugal intercourse, that is to say, when the respondent was in a state of menstruation," and "that on three several occasions he handled the petitioner in a most filthy manner, thereby causing her much pain and misery of mind and body." In further paragraphs the respondent charged her husband with personal violence. The petitioner denied these charges, and issue being joined, the case was tried in July 1869, before Lord Penzance, J.O., and a special jury. At the trial the counsel for the respondent admitted that he had no evidence to support her charges, and all the issues having been found for the petitioner, the court pronounced a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and reserved the question of costs.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Spinks, on behalf of the petitioner, now moved that the respondent be condemned in the costs of the suit. He read affidavits setting out that the respondent continued to reside abroad, keeping her place of residence concealed, in order to evade the service of the decree, and that although her movements were well known to the family of the respondent, her trustees, and solicitor, they refused to disclose it. In his affidavit the petitioner stated that he had been put to great expense to meet the charges placed on the record, and that though he had recently gone into practice as a consulting surgeon, his earnings at present were very slender and precarious, and wholly insufficient to bear the costs of the needless and expensive litigation entailed upon him by his wife. He also stated that his wife had a separate income of 700*l.* a year. He submitted that the 51st section, which says that "the court on the hearing of any suit, proceeding, or petition under this Act, and the House of Lords, on the hearing of any appeal under this Act, may make such order as to costs as to such court or House respectively may seem just," was sufficiently general in its terms to give the court power to make the order prayed. Whatever might have been the privilege of the wife in the old ecclesiastical courts, the Act gave the unlimited power to condemn either party in costs, and it had frequently exercised it: (See Glennie v. Glennie and Bowles, 3 S. & T. 109; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; Carstairs v. Carstairs, 3 S. & T. 528; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; Wells v. Wells and Hudson, 3 S. & T. 542; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; Robinson v. Robinson and Lane, 1 S. & T. 362.) Where there was a fund to pay, the court had power to act on the merits of the case, see Melford v. Melford, 37 L. J. 77, where the House of Lords had condemned the wife in the costs of a vexatious appeal, and Morgan v. Morgan and Porter, L. Rep. 1 P. & M., 544, where the court had ordered to be deducted from the wife's costs the expense of meeting certain charges against her husband, made by her against her husband. On the merits he urged that this was peculiarly a case in which the court should exercise that power.

Dr. Tristram on the same side.—In the Ecclesiastical Courts the wife was a privilege suitor because she was presumed to have no property of her own. But here the wife had considerable property, and the reason ceasing the rule ought also to cease. He cited

Wilson v. Wilson, 1 Consist. 204;
Davis v. Davis, 2 Consist. 203;
D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hag. 788.

Dr. Deane contra, admitted that the section gave the power, but submitted that there was no case in which it had exercised it adversely to the wife. Morgan v. Morgan and Porter was merely a case of deducting a certain sum of money from that which had to be paid by the husband as costs, and in Garston v. Garston, an unreported case, where there was a petition for nullity on the ground of impotence, and the wife had abandoned her defence on coming into court, a similar application to condemn in costs was made, and the court refused to create a precedent.

Dr. Spinks, in reply.—In Garston v. Garston, all the husband's property came from the wife.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O. — I have no particular recollection of what took place in the case of Garston v. Garston; but, having the circumstances called to my mind, I do not recognise in any of these circumstances mentioned, any ground for condemning the wife in costs. Each case must stand on its own merits so far as the discretion of the court is to be exercised. The legal questions are whether the court has the power; and secondly, will the court ever exercise that power in proper cases? It cannot be doubted that the court has the power, because the section (51) says very distinctly the court may order either party to pay the costs. The question therefore is, will the court ever exercise that power? I see no reason why it should not be exercised. I see no reason why, if a wife has separate property of her own she should be entitled to put her husband to all manner of expense by instituting a frivolous suit against him, which fails altogether, and then be allowed to retire from the court free of costs, and escape altogether every portion of the burden. The only reason why a wife stands in a different position in this court from suitors generally is, that the law presumes that she has no property of her own. So matters were in the old days of the ecclesiastical courts, but under the auspices of the court of equity she has achieved the power of holding considerable private property. To the extent, therefore, to which she has private property the reason of the rule fails, and there is no reason why the wife should not litigate to that extent on the same footing as other suitors. Of course the court in the exercise of its discretion will bear in mind certain principles to one of which the court referred in Carstairs v. Carstairs. And that is, that the House of Lords before it would allow a husband to be divorced from his wife always insisted that some provision should be made for the maintenance of the wife, and would make no order which would end in the absorption of her means of subsistence. The court has to look not merely to the fact of the wife having separate property, but to the amount of that property, before it makes an order upon her. In this case the wife is stated to have a separate income of 700*l.* a year, and as the costs of the suit cannot be heavy, I have no hesitation in making an order on her to pay them.

Salvage—Form of tender—"Costs (if any) due by law"—Practice.

For the future, where a tender is made in this court, it must state that it is a tender for salvage reward, together with an offer to pay costs, or it shall specify the ground upon which costs are not tendered, and refer the question to the court.

This was a case for salvage, in which the court pronounced the tender, or rather two tenders taken together, to be sufficient. They amounted to 282*l.* Two questions were reserved for the further consideration of the court: 1. Whether the sum awarded, being under 300*l.*, the court, having regard to the sects. 3 and 9 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 (The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act), ought to certify for costs. 2. Whether, although the suit had been properly instituted in this court, the plaintiffs ought to have their costs, inasmuch as the court had pronounced for the sufficiency of the tender.

The form of the tenders was as follows:

Take notice, that we have this day paid to the account of the registrar at the Bank of England the sum of £ which we tender together with such costs, if any, as may be due by law.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—With regard to the first question reserved for consideration, I have considered all the circumstances, and especially though not solely, the small difference between the sum awarded and that which limits the jurisdiction of the County Court, and I am of opinion that I ought to certify for costs. As to the second question cases were cited to me with respect to the Chancery and Common Law Courts on questions of tender; but I cannot consider them as furnishing precedents for the practice of this court. Various cases on the subject of tender decided in this court were also referred to in the course of the argument. They will all be found collected in Chap. 5 of Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, which also contains in the notes some valuable remarks upon the principles of tender in this court. The first decision of any importance is that of Lord Stowell in the case of the Margaretta (decided in 1801), 4 Rob. 146. The rule which Lord Stowell intended to lay down in that case, was that the parties ought to know "what is proposed to them for their reward and what for costs;" and that, inasmuch as verbal offers had led to misunderstanding and uncertainty, a more regular and legal form should be adopted for the future. Since that time the matter was several times discussed before my predecessor in this chair. But upon the whole I am of opinion that the practice on this point has been somewhat wavering and uncertain; and I agree with the observations made at the bar that it is expedient to take this opportunity to lay down a fixed rule on the subject. With respect to the present case, I am of opinion that it was competent to the defendant to tender the reward for salvage and reserve the question of costs; and such was the intention of the tender, and I think it would have been competent to the plaintiff to have accepted the tender, so far as it related to the reward, and to have reserved the question of costs for the consideration of the court. I shall give the plaintiff his costs up to the time when the second tender was made; but having regard to the uncertainty as to the practice, and to the correspondence between the solicitors of the parties, which has been put in evidence, I shall make no order as to costs subsequent to the tenders, but leave both parties to pay their own costs. For the future I must direct that, when a tender is made, it shall either state that it is a tender for salvage reward together with an offer to pay costs; or it shall specify the ground upon which costs are not tendered, and refer the question of costs to the consideration of the court.

ANTONY v. THE ETNA INSURANCE COMPANY (a).

Marine insurance—Perils of the sea—"Other misfortunes"—Risks of lighterage—Inherent defect.

The plaintiff insured with the defendants a shipload of cattle, the adventure to begin from the loading and continue until the cattle should arrive and be safely landed at the port of destination. The risks covered by the policy were "perils of the lakes, seas, rivers, canals, railroads, fires, jettisons, and all other perils and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said property or any part thereof;" and also "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon." The propeller on which the cattle were shipped arrived off Ontonagon, but was prevented by a bar in the harbour from landing them. The animals were taken from the propeller on board a lighter, where they were fastened with a five-eighth inch iron chain. During the passage the animals were frightened, the chain broke, and a number of them fell into the sea and were drowned:

Held that this was a loss covered by the policy; that, if not a "peril of the sea," which the court was inclined to think that it was, it came within the term "all other perils and misfortunes."

Semble, that where animals are drowned in the sea, that is a loss by "perils of the sea."

Held, further, that in the absence of explanation by the insurer, it was to be presumed that the fright of the animals was caused by something connected with navigation; and also that the insurer must be presumed to know the usual mode and appliances of lighterage at the place, and to have had in contemplation such an accident as happened, when taking the risk.

This was a motion for a new trial, the verdict having been given for the defendants, the insurers. Judgment was delivered by WITHEY, J.—On the trial of this cause at a former term, the court rendered a verdict for defendant, on the ground that the loss sustained by plaintiff was not covered by the policy of insurance. A motion for a new trial is urged on the ground that such ruling was erroneous. It affords me great satisfaction that my brother Wilkins, who presided at the trial, has been able to sit with me and hear the arguments on this motion, and that he entirely concurs with the conclusions which I shall express. On the 1st May 1865 an open season policy was issued by defendant to plaintiff, insuring the plaintiff's property from ports and places to ports and places, including the voyage in which was this risk. The adventure was to begin from the loading, and continue until the property should "arrive and be safely landed at the port of destination." The risks covered by the policy are "perils of the lakes, seas, rivers, canals, railroads, fires, jettisons, and all other perils and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said property, or any part thereof;" also, "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon." Under this insurance the plaintiff shipped on board the propeller Pewabic from Bayfield to Ontonagon, on Lake Superior, forty or more beef cattle. The vessel arrived off the latter port in July 1865, but was prevented by a bar in the harbour from landing. The animals were taken from the propeller on to a lighter to be landed, and were fastened on the lighter in this way: A chain of five-eighth inch iron—called an anchor chain—ran fore and aft through the middle of the lighter, fastened at the ends to timber heads eight or ten feet from each end of the lighter. To this chain the cattle were tied by ropes, heads in on opposite sides of the chain. When the lighter had proceeded from a quarter to a third of the distance in, the cattle, from some cause not explained, became frightened, breaking the chain into three pieces, and twenty-seven of the cattle, tied to one of these pieces, went over into the lake and were drowned by the weight of the chain carrying their heads under water. The lighter was tugged in and out, and was in good condition. The cattle were fastened on the lighter in the customary way of lightering at that place. Such was the case made by the plaintiff at the trial, and the question presented, which we are called upon to decide, is whether the loss was occasioned by a "peril of the lakes," or other "peril and misfortune" within the meaning and intent of the policy. The general doctrine is, that the insurer undertakes, in a marine risk, only to indemnify against extraordinary perils of the sea, and not against those ordinary ones to which every ship must inevitably be exposed. Every loss which arises from tempests, or by rocks, winds, or waves, strictly and naturally comes under the idea of a loss occasioned by perils of the sea. But if this be the extent of the phrase "perils of the sea," we should be obliged to conclude that it covered only accidents of an extraordinary nature, and produced only by natural causes peculiar to that element. Such, however, is clearly not the rule for construing the phrase "perils of the sea," in reference to marine insurance. Mr. Parsons, in his work on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, p. 544, says: "The phrase covers all loss or damage which arises from the extraordinary action of the wind and sea, and from inevitable accidents directly connected with navigation, excepting those provided for in other parts of the policy, as captures and the like." Mr. Justice Story, in the case of the schooner Reeside, 2 Sumner, 567, remarks. "that the phrase 'danger of the seas,' whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing only loss by natural accidents peculiar to that element; or, whether understood in its more comprehensive sense, as including inevitable accidents upon that element, must still, in either case, be clearly understood to include only such losses as are of an extraordinary nature, or arising from irresistible force, or some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." The Supreme Court of the United States, in Garrison v. Memphis Insurance Company, 19 How. 312, seems to give the more extended sense to the term, "perils of the sea," as suggested by Story, J. That court says these words "have been extended to comprehend losses arising from some irresistible force or overwhelming power, which no ordinary skill could anticipate or evade." It has often been said, and correctly, that what are ordinary and what are extraordinary perils, is a question of much difficulty. The difficulty has been illustrated by many cases. Thus, in Magnus v. Buttemer, 9 Eng. L. & E. 461; 11 C. B. 876, a vessel moored in a tide harbour, and took ground when the tide fell. In consequence of this she was hogged and strained all over. It was held that the underwriters were not liable, In Potter v. Suffolk Insurance Company, 2 Sum., 197, the circumstances were very similar to the last case, and Mr. Justice Story held, "that unless there was inherent weakness in the vessel, such damage could only be occasioned by an unusual and extraordinary accident in grounding upon the ebbing of the tide, which would be a peril of the sea." In Hunter v. Potts, 4 Camp. 203, Lord Ellenborough held, a leak occasioned by rats was not a peril of the sea, not being a loss of an extraordinary nature. But in Garrigues v. Cox, 1 Binn., 592, a leak occasioned by rats was held to be a peril within the policy. And Mr. Parsons, in his Marine Insurance, vol. 1, 546, note, after citing a number of cases, concludes his review by saying: "On the authority of recent cases in this country, we should consider the insurers liable in such a case, even if the rats remained on board through the negligence of the master, on the ground that the damage by water was the proximate cause of the loss." We might refer to many other cases on the subject, but we think they will not tend very much to elucidate the question involved in the case at bar, inasmuch as every case depends so much on its own particular facts and circumstances. My own views are strongly in the direction of holding this case to be a loss within the term "perils of the sea," in accordance with the more comprehensive sense of those words and their more reasonable signification—in brief, because the cattle were drowned, which is peculiar to the element on which they were being transported; because they were drowned by an accident that could not have been guarded against by ordinary exertions or prudence, considering the fact that it was the usual mode of lightering at that place, which fact must be presumed to have been known to the insurer; because, too, it could not reasonably have been foreseen that there was inherent weakness in the chain; and because, in the absence of explanation by the insurer, it is to be presumed the fright of the animals was caused by something connected with navigation, whether from the exhaust of steam, the working of machinery of the tug, the ringing of a bell, or otherwise. It was a peril of navigation, which could not well have been foreseen or guarded against by the carrier. But we are not compelled to rest our decision on the ground strictly of a loss by a "peril of the sea," and the court does not wish to be understood as so deciding. I have simply indicated the tendency of my own mind after an examination of the question, because that particular point was much dwelt upon by the arguments of the learned counsel. We are entirely clear, after a careful examination of the the authorities, that the loss was a risk within the general terms of the policy, "all other perils and misfortunes," and the specific provision, "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon." While it is laid down by the authorities, that these general words, "all other perils," cover only perils of the like kind to those specifically enumerated, we think they are material and operative words, and are not in the policy to have no effect assigned to them in its construction. Hillyard on Marine Insurance, p. 348, says, these words have the effect of providing for any doubts which might arise as to causes which come nearly, but not precisely, under the specific causes of loss. In Cullen v. Butler, 5 M. & S., 465, Lord Ellenborough says: "They are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have due effect assigned to them in the construction of the instruments; and which will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other causes of marine damage of the like kind with those which are specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes." The animals did not die from diseases or any inherent defect in them, but from an accident on water, in course of the voyage, which was something peculiar to that element. Had the accident of breaking the fastening occurred in a land transportation, no such result could have taken place. The cattle were drowned by their heads being drawn under water by the weight of the piece of chain to which they were tied. It was five-eighths inch iron, and had the chain been perfect would undoubtedly have resisted any strain the whole number of the animals on board could have produced, and yet the accident was fortuitous. It was the custom to use this chain for fastening cattle lightered from vessels, it was believed to be sufficiently strong, and as we have already remarked, it could not have been foreseen, in all reasonable probability, that there was inherent weakness in this anchor chain. The insurer must be presumed to have known the usual mode and appliances of lighterage at the place, and to have had it in contemplation when taking the risk. If now we regard it doubtful whether the loss was strictly within the indemnity against "perils of the sea," still we think it should be regarded as caused by perils of his kind, and therefore covered by the general words of the policy. No case has been found where the facts were like those in the one at bar; but on principle, Deveaux v. J. Anson, 7 Scott, 507, is regarded as sustaining the conclusions to which we have arrived. In that case, the effect of the general words of the policy, "all other perils and misfortunes," were very fully considered, and the cases which had been decided referred to. The declaration averred that the "ship was broken, damaged and destroyed, and rendered wholly incapable of pursuing the said voyage, by certain perils which the said assurers, by said policy, did take upon themselves, to wit: by the accidental breaking and giving way of the tackle and supports whereby the said ship was supported, in being moved from a certain dock; in consequence of which breaking and giving way, the said ship struck violently against the sand and was bilged, broken, destroyed, damaged and rendered incapable of pursuing the said voyage." The defendants traversed the allegation "that the ship was broken, damaged and destroyed, and rendered incapable of pursuing the voyage, by any perils which the said assurers, by said policy, did take upon themselves." Lord Chief Justice Tindal said, "the point remaining to be considered is whether the loss was occasioned by any of the perils insured against by the policy. It is to be observed that the words in the policy are very large; the policy not only enumerates 'perils of the sea,' but all other perils, losses and misfortunes that had or should come to the hurt, detriment or damage of the subject matter of the insurance." After referring to several cases, the learned judge says, the "loss occasioned by the endeavour to get the vessel afloat from the dry dock in which she had just been repaired, was a loss within the policy." Here the supports broke and caused the damage, like the case at bar. Again, the other clause in the contract, "the usual risk of lighterage at Ontonagon," was clearly not necessary to indemnify the assured against "perils of the sea," nor perils of the like kind, for the risk begins with loading the freight and continues until safely landed. Assuming, then, what is claimed by defendant, the accident which happened not to be a loss by "perils by the sea," nor "other perils and misfortunes," we should, in order to give due effect to the clause, "usual risk of lighterage," in view of the other stipulations of the policy being held not to cover the loss, say that it is covered by the risk of lighterage. In the view we have taken of "all other perils and misfortunes," there is no occasion to inquire into the effect of the lighterage clause, but if we were to hold differently in reference to the other specific and general clauses of the policy, it would be difficult to see how the lighterage clause could be regarded as operative words in the contract, unless held to cover their loss. For the reasons given, the motion must prevail, and a new trial be awarded.

Irish Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BELFAST ELECTION PETITION.

Saturday, 30th Jan. 1869.

(Before FITZGERALD, B.)

Subscription to Orange halls—Bribery—Paying expenses of candidate—Application of money subscribed Corrupt intention—Double candidature.

The respondent subscribed to an Orange hall with a view to express the bent of his opinions:

Held, that this was a legitimate method of giving expression to the opinions of the candidate with the view of influencing votes.

The friends of the respondent early in the canvass held out an assurance to J., a proposed colleague, that a public subscription instituted for the purpose of paying his expenses would be contributed to by them:

Held, that such a subscription was not illegal, but that it behoved the candidate so assisted to see that the money subscribed was legitimately expended.

It was suggested that a guarantee should be given under which a settlement might take place after the election. This was objected to, and money desired. Eventually this was paid, although the acting agent of the respondent warned the persons making the payment of the danger which would follow:

Held, that supposing the real intention accompanying this payment was to secure the return of J., there would be strong ground for holding that it was a corrupt practice so far as concerned the return of J. But

Held further, that however corrupt the practice might have been as regarded J., if the object of the payment was to create a community of opinion on the part of the voters of J. in favour of the respondent, and thus secure assistance in his election, that was not a proceeding which would avoid the respondent's return.

There is no power given by the Corrupt Practices Acts to deal with practices which have effects similar to those covered by the statutes; and offences not defined by such statutes, although having the same pernicious results as those which are defined, are not cognizable by the court.

This was a petition against the return of Mr. M'Clure. All material facts and arguments are stated in the judgment.

FITZGERALD, B.—I have considered this case, with certainly great hesitation upon one part of it, but I have come to my determination. There are points in the case upon which I shall touch very lightly indeed. [Having done this, his Lordship proceeded]:—The next case is one of a class to which I confess I have been unable from the beginning of this case to give any weight at all, that is the subscription to the Orange Hall. I really confess, having listened with the greatest attention to the arguments on both sides, that I cannot see what effect it has at all in the shape of bribery. I am not here to try whether it was consistent upon the part of Mr. M'Clure to give support to an Orange Hall. I am not here to try whether it was done in perfect sincerity; that is a question with which I have nothing to do; but of this I am sure, that the profession by a candidate of holding certain opinions is a legitimate mode of influencing votes. If it were not, they would have no means in millions of cases of influencing votes at all; and if (for I am not going to try whether it was consistently or sincerely done) Mr. M'Clure thought that it would be for his benefit with reference to the election, and for procuring votes, to inform Orangemen and others that he did entertain opinions in favour of institutions of this kind, I see nothing illegitimate in that. The case appears to me identically the same as if he had written a pamphlet in support of, or sustaining such institutions as Orange Halls, and had paid the printer for publishing it. I am not upon the question whether it was consistent upon the part of Mr. M'Clure to do it, or whether it was not. If by subscriptions of that kind he thought proper to indicate that his opinions were favourable to institutions of this kind, I have no right to try his consistency or sincerity, but it was perfectly legitimate for him to put forward his opinions as a means of procuring votes. I now come to the part of the case upon which difficulty really exists, and I quite agree both with Mr. Falkiner and Mr. Kisbey that I am so to endeavour to construe this Act as to repress the mischief which the Act was intended (and, I presume, sincerely) to guard against. I am bound to do that, and for that purpose I am, so far as such common sense and such knowledge of the world as I possess, enable me to do so, to strip of every colour, of every dress, of every shape, any act which is brought before me, so as to discover what the true and real nature of the act is; and if, having so done, if, having stripped it of its colouring, taken off its dress or varnish, or whatever may be about it, I find that in its true nature the act is one of the corrupt practices defined by the statute, I am bound, notwithstanding what shape, notwithstanding what colour, notwithstanding any dress it may have, to give effect to the Act of Parliament. But I have not the power under the act of Parliament to change the nature of the act itself because the act proved may be clearly shown to me by most reasonable evidence to be fraught or attended with all the pernicious consequences which the Act was intended to guard against. I have no power, notwithstanding, to repress the act, unless the act be in its nature one of the corrupt practices specified, and I cannot make it so by reason of its being attended by circumstances which the Act of Parliament was intended to guard against. It appears to me that it is an application of real subtlety, when one endeavours, by reason of the mischief which follows, to alter the nature of the act itself for the purpose of repressing the mischief. That is what I cannot do. Well now, the transaction, so far as it is necessary for me to state it, is one about which, until we come to the motives of it, there is in reality little or no controversy. It appears that early in the canvassing for Mr. M'Clure, Mr. Duffin, and certain other gentlemen who were his friends and supporters, did hold out an assurance to the friends of Mr. Johnston that a public subscription, instituted for the purpose of defraying the expenses of his election, would be contributed to by them, to the extent of at least 300*l.*, according to Mr. Duffin's evidence. Mr. Johnston, as it appears he stated to one of the witnesses in this case, Mr. Dysert (and it seems to be agreed by other witnesses that it was so publicly stated), had not the money or the means, or did not think he had the money or the means, or did not wish to apply such money or means as he had to the expenses of his election, and he declined altogether to stand at his own expense; but, as he told Mr. Dysert, he was perfectly willing to be of service to his friends and supporters provided they returned him. Now, so far as I can judge, I have no reason for believing that a subscription instituted for that purpose, that is to pay the expenses of a candidate, and relieve him from any expenses in the matter, is in any way an illegal or unconstitutional proceeding. It would behove the candidate to look well that the money of which he availed himself of his own knowledge, is legitimately applied, because he incurs a responsibility the moment he holds himself out as a person to be elected by those means. But that a public subscription raised for that purpose, and contributed by his friends and supporters, is itself illegal, I am not aware. Now it was perfectly competent to the supporters of Mr. M'Clure, if they thought fit to to contribute to this fund. Therefore there is nothing illegal in that, even though the fact be that they would not have contributed to the fund unless Mr. M'Clure had happened to be a candidate. I do not think it was made less legitimate by that. That being so, it appears that the subscription went on very slowly up to the election; as far as I can gather there was little more than 300*l.* collected altogether by both parties, and complaints were made that the promises given by those friends of Mr. M'Clure who had engaged to give this subscription, were not carried out. Accordingly, they proposed to do this—and I should imagine it must have been in some respect, at least, with the object of bonâ fide seeing that the money was rightly applied, and placed under the control of parties who would rightly administer it—they proposed to give a guarantee of responsibility for the payment of 500*l.* to the treasurer and three other members of the association, who were also members of Mr. Johnston's election committee. They proposed to give that so that the money should not be forthcoming until the time came for arranging the election expenses. That guarantee was carried by the person to whom it was given by Mr. Brett, the conducting agent of Mr. M'Clure, to Mr. Kelly, the conducting agent for Mr. Johnston, the man being, in the first instance, satisfied with it according to the evidence. Mr. Kelly objected to it. The ground of his objection, so far as I can gather, was that money would be more serviceable for the purpose; and it is very probable the difficulty may have occurred to him, without doubting the honour or credit of these gentlemen, that it was not a document that could be legally enforced on account of its form. Accordingly, he desires the men to take it back and return it, telling them, at the same time, that it would be better to have the money. But he then appears to have become apprehensive that the money might be paid into the hands of some of these parties, so as to be out of his control in the expenditure, and yet be paid with his knowledge; he was naturally, reasonably, and I think, properly, afraid that the interests of his own client Mr. Johnston, the candidate, might be affected by its being entrusted into the hands of these parties; and accordingly (and this is a part of the case that, I acknowledge, has pressed upon me throughout) he writes to Mr. Brett and waits upon Mr. Brett, also nearly contemporaneously, and warns him against making this payment. He offers himself to be responsible for the money; he would be satisfied with its being paid to Clarke, the regular treasurer of it; and Clarke and he appear to have been in communication upon it. But he positively warns him, and I think the fair inference from his evidence is that he must have been afraid that it would not be legitimately applied for the purposes of Mr. Johnston's election. In the face of that, the course adopted, upon the suggestion of the man, so far a I could see, and, so far as I understand Shannon's evidence, was, that 300*l.* of the 500*l.* should be paid in the mode in which Kelly required, and the remaining 200*l.* given to four of these active persons. Mr. Kisbey says—though it does not appear to me to be very material upon this part of the case—that they did not appear to be exactly the four named in the guarantee. Clarke was not one of the four to whom it was to be given, and instead of Clarke a man named McGladdery was one of the four to whom it was given, but his name is not in the guarantee. According to Shannon, the ambassador of these men to Brett, the 200*l.* is given by Duffin. Duffin says his difficulty was this: he was under an honourable engagement, to secure a contribution to the sum to be raised for defraying the expenses of Mr. Johnston's election. He says, there seem to be disputes among themselves what should be paid. He says, says, "I could not tell what to pay." And under those circumstances 300*l.* of it was paid as one party desired, and the remaining 200*l.* to the rest. Well, now I confess the strong inference to my mind would be that, even supposing the real intention of the gentlemen who paid this money was to secure the return of Mr. Johnston, there would be strong ground for holding that money so paid to these parties, under such warning especially, would be a corrupt practice as far as the election of Johnston was concerned. If money paid to secure the return of a party means anything, it appears to me that money so paid, with almost the assurance and the certainty that it will not be regularly applied, is a corrupt practice, and if it be not a corrupt practice, I find it difficult to say what the first clause and the fifth clause of the section mean. Then comes its serious bearing upon this part of the case. If I find gentlemen and men of business so acting with a species of disregard as to the mode in which the money is applied, does it not afford something in the shape of strong evidence that (interested as they were for M'Clure, and the probable inference from what they did being that this money never would have been subscribed at all unless M'Clure had been a candidate) the real object of the money so handed over was something different, and that it was intended by its influence as money to procure the support of these men for M'Clure? That is the difficulty that has pressed upon my mind throughout this case; I put it as strongly as I can, but not more strongly than it has pressed upon my own mind. On the other hand, if I could be fully satisfied that this money had been paid legitimately as a subscription to the fund, and that the real hope as to the mode in which it would affect Mr. M'Clure's election was by the impression produced upon the supporters of Johnston, and the community of feeling and desire to aid upon the part of M'Clure, it appears to me that the payment would be a legitimate one, and if the money was paid legitimately there would be no reason to complain of it. Supposing I were satisfied that however corrupt the practice was as regards Mr. Johnson's election, the only effect it could produce upon Mr. M'Clure's election, would be an identical one, and that that was the effect contemplated, can I make it a corrupt practice as to the election of Mr. M'Clure? It does not appear to me that the Act has said so. The true way to try it is, supposing that state of facts to be clear, that is, that it was so clearly a corrupt practice to secure the election of Johnston that an indictment could be maintained against these parties for corrupt practice in order to procure the return of Johnston, and it further appeared that these parties entertained a hope or expectation that the effect produced upon the minds of the supporters of Johnston would be a community of opinion and aid from them in favour of the election of Mr. M'Clure, and that they would give their votes just in the same way as they would if the money had been directly so applied; can I say that an indictment could be sustained against them in the alternative in order to procure the election of Mr. M'Clure? If I cannot, then I say it comes to this, that it is a case not provided for by the Act of Parliament, though open to mischief, but I have no power to change the nature of the act itself, because it would have been followed by the same mischief, and to make it an act of the same nature as that which would be corrupt under the Act of Parliament. The real difficulty that has been upon my mind is whether I must not regard this as a mere colourable proceeding, considering the mode in which it was done by men of business, by men well acquainted, several of them, with electioneering practices and contrivances of various kinds—whether I am not to treat this as a colourable act really done to influence the election, as distinct from the contrivance of which I have spoken, and which might operate in favour of the election of M'Clure. I acknowledge that there appear to me to be strong grounds for treating it in that way, and that has pressed heavily upon my mind throughout. But in order to do that I must act against the sworn testimony of men of respectability and character. I need hardly say that I pay very little or no regard to a gentleman who gets upon the able and says, with indignation, "I never committed an act of bribery in my life," because I do not know what is the meaning of it, unless I know that the gentleman puts the same meaning upon the word "bribery" as I do. Trace this throughout, up to the moment at which the separation took place into two sums, and I am unable to see anything that can be treated as a corrupt practice to secure the election of Mr. M'Clure. Well, then, am I to distrust these gentlemen as to the instructions given, however loose they were, that this was not intended to impose any obligation whatever upon the parties to whom it was given; that it was to be for the election of Johnston; that it was given in regard to the original promise, and so forth; and the positive oath of these men that they did it for no other purpose? It is a strong thing for me to do that. If I were to act merely upon the probabilities of the case alone, I acknowledge my conclusion would have been different, although even then there are circumstances insisted upon by Mr. Andrews as to the original innocence of this transaction, and the peculiar circumstances under which the alteration took place. I cannot decide, in the face of that sworn testimony, whatever doubt I have; and I am obliged to put it under the same class of cases as the money given by Mr. Dysert. With reference to the case of treating, I really shall not dwell upon that. It seems to me that the purpose mentioned in the Act of Parliament has not been proved in either of the cases which have been spoken to in evidence, and they appear to me to have been merely introduced for the purpose of filling up the case. Therefore I have come to the conclusion to declare Mr. M'Clure duly elected, and, of course, I must say that he is not cognisant that any corrupt practice was resorted to at this election. And the costs must follow in the ordinary course.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 16.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).

RUSHBROOK v. LAWRENCE.

Mortgage — Equity of redemption — Release—Agreement in fieri—Abandonment of agreement.

Mortgagees brought an action of ejectment in July, 1853, against the mortgagor, who was in possession of the mortgaged property. The action was compromised upon these terms: That the mortgagor should give up possession to the mortgagees on the 29th of September then next, and should release to them (if required) all his right, claim, and interest in the mortgaged property, the release to be prepared at the expense of the mortgagees; the mortgagees agreeing, in consideration of the mortgagor engaging to give such possession and execute such release, to forego all claim in respect of costs of the action; but in case default should be made by the mortgagor in giving up such possession, or in the execution of such release (if required), the mortgagees should be entitled to the costs.

A release was never required, and the mortgagor continued in possession until 1865, when the mortgagees sold the property under the trust for sale contained in the mortgage deed, and realised more than sufficient to pay their principal, interest, and costs:

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the compromise was an agreement in fieri, which had been abandoned by all parties, and could not now be carried out, and that the mortgagor was entitled to the surplus proceeds of sale, after paying to the mortgagees their principal, interest, and costs.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of the Master of the Rolls. The suit was by the heir-at-law of a mortgagor against a mortgagee to recover the surplus of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property, after payment of the mortgagees' principal, interest, and costs. The defendant resisted the suit on the ground that the plaintiff had released his equity of redemption. The proceedings in the court below are fully reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 192.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C., and G. N. Colt for the appellant.

Southgate, Q.C., and Rigby for the plaintiff.

The following cases were cited:
Knight v. Majoribanks, 2 Mac. & G. 10;
Vernon v. Bethell, 2 Eden. 110;
Ford v. Olden, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 461;
Watson v. Marston, 4 De G. M. & G. 230.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—It appears to me, I confess, that the view of the Master of the Rolls in this case must be supported—the view that he took as to the whole thing being considered as a matter abandoned and put by; it being, in truth, intended only for a particular purpose. That appears to me to be perfectly clear upon the face of the bill itself. But taking the Master of the Rolls' view first, it would stand thus: Suppose, for instance, there had been an arrangement that this gentleman should concur in giving up all his right in the equity of redemption, that was a matter done at a time when from the bill of costs it appears that a sale was contemplated. "As soon as ever possession should be taken." In the course of October, 1853, there is that entry about the sale being about to take place. The sale did not take place, and the consequence of it was that the object for which the possession was sought not having been required to be carried into effect, the sale was eventually postponed for fourteen years. No party to the arrangement took the slightest notice of that. They did not even ask for possession; they allowed this man, I will not say to remain in possession, because there is some question as to how he got in. At all events, one Cave was afterwards intrusted with the possession. That is clear upon the whole from Cave's evidence, and the documents produced, and clear also from the result of the evidence, and from the conduct of the mortgagees' own solicitor, who, in taking possession from Cave, paid to Cave all that he had expended for rates and taxes during the time he was in possession, on behalf of Mr. Rushbrook and his mortgagees, as they are called. Then, the whole property is treated as a property without the slightest reference to any release or intention to release the equity of redemption; it is treated as a mortgaged property, and sold by the present defendant as a mortgagee under trust for sale; and, taking advantage of that position, he stipulates in his conditions of sale that he shall not enter into any other covenants than the common covenants against incumbrances. Therefore, we have a single bill by the representatives of a mortgagor who conveys the fee simple in trust for sale, subject to a prior mortgage which was vested in Ingle's representatives; a bill by the representative of the heir of the mortgagor, to have the benefit of the surplus produced by the sale, now in the hands of his trustees. That person treats himself as such trustee from the year 1853 down to the time of sale in 1867; he has made that sale as mortgagee, and has never, apparently, divested himself in any way of that character. So that if the agreement does mean what the defendant says it means, then clearly it is an agreement which, as the Master of the Rolls says, has been abandoned by everybody upon every side. It seems to me the true intent of the parties themselves, so far as the instrument is concerned, is quite consistent with that intention. The plaintiff states it in this way in his bill: "The plaintiff believed and understood that the said document was intended only to give to the mortgagees the means of obtaining possession of the mortgaged premises, so as to enable them effectually to exercise the powers of sale contained in their mortgages, and that in consideration of his giving up possession when required, he was to be relieved from the costs of the said action." That is borne out by every fact in the case. They were then about to sell in that very year as appears from the bill of costs, and it was an object to them to get possession and to get an undertaking from the person then in possession—who seems to have been all but a pauper—if he joined in the conveyance. There is nothing said about surplus moneys or anything of that kind, because nobody thought there would be any; but it was of consequence to them to get him to concur in handing over the property to a purchaser; and at that time the effect might have been the same as if he agreed to release the equity of redemption. That is to say, there was nothing worth releasing. But that is only what the circumstances might be, it was not any part of the terms of the agreement. We have to construe the terms of the agreement by the facts of the case, and if we look at them I think it is quite plain what was the intent; that it was not the intent to convey by way of conveyance any possible benefit arising from the equity of redemption; because the action is brought by the first and second mortgagees—those two parties are concurring. If there was any intent to convey the beneficial interest in any property, the agreement would have been thus worded: "I will convey to you something apart from the release; I will convey to you for your benefit the surplus, if any." But there is not a word of that kind said. The words of the agreement, supposing the whole to be fully proved, would stand thus: that he engaged to give up possession, and he agreed to release the plaintiff from his right to claim any interest, if any there were, in the hereditaments and premises, the release to be prepared at the expense of the plaintiff. The judge's order is very much to the same effect, except that he leaves out the words "to release to the plaintiff all his right to claim any interest in the hereditaments and premises." But then, contemporaneously with that, we have the fact that a sale was contemplated, and that a sale was made to two parties standing in two different positions with reference to the property—one was first and the other second mortgagee—and as to which there could be no intention to hand over the equity of redemption in consideration to these two parties. And we have at that very time the letter to Mrs Chevell of the 19th July 1853, in which the solicitor tells her of the arrangement that has been made, and calls it a very good one. He is to give up possession on the 29th Sept., and to join in releasing any claim on the heir-at-law; that is, to execute a conveyance. Such is the plain meaning of the agreement, and therefore there is not a pretence for giving up the equity of redemption. If I were to hold any other construction, then there would arise a very serious difficulty; because, if you are to give up the equity of redemption, how does it agree with this part of the case? Here you have this young man of twenty-two, a pauper, who appears to have employed Mr Ind as his solicitor, who brought an action afterwards upon his bill of costs, there being nothing to protect the young man. There is nothing I can trace beyond this, that he does that which anyone would say was a very foolish thing, that is he goes personally to the solicitor on the other side to make an arrangement. I would not blame Mr Ind for saying "I do not object to your doing it," and I do not say there was any harm in joining in the conveyance, because his joining in the conveyance would not deprive him of the produce of the sale, if there happened to be a surplus; if there were no surplus, which was then the most probable thing, it would not harm him either; and so far, I think it would be very reasonable. Mr Ind expressly says he never told him anything about the equity of redemption. Then comes the question—how could you enforce against this young man of twenty-two, who entered into this agreement, in which nothing at all is said about the equity of redemption; how could you enforce against him this agreement, that he is to give up the property, however valuable it may turn out, in order that these two persons should do that which appears to me to be contrary to all the meaning and intent of the agreement? I do not think there is anything in what may be said about there being no redemption, but that it is a trust for sale. It is what one may call an equity of redemption—one perfectly understands what it means. It means his interest in the surplus of the property, whatever that may be, whenever the sale takes place. It appears to me that what he says is entirely consistent with the documents, so far as they are executed, and so far as they have any meaning at all. It was simply an agreement that he should join in the conveyance. It never had the slightest bearing upon his giving up any interest in the surplus moneys, if any there should be—a thing not thought of by anybody at the time; and then it seems to me further, that nobody thought it worth while to act upon it, no step whatever having been taken for fourteen years; and, although the solicitor claimed it as an excuse that he knew nothing about it personally, his client says in her letter she knew all about it; and there is no doubt, if they had known all about it, they would have felt the impossibility of their treating this as a relinquishment of right beyond the right that he should be compellable to execute the conveyance without further trouble; but not a conveyance by which he intended to part with his interest in the surplus, if any existed. I think, therefore, the decree of the Master of the Rolls must be upheld on every possible ground, and I can only dismiss this appeal with costs.

Re MERCHANTS' COMPANY; HERITAGE'S CASE.

Company — Winding-up — Contributor—Non-execution of transfer by transferee.

A. applied for and had allotted to him 100 shares in a company. Before the allotment A.'s brokers, by his instructions, sold the shares to other brokers, who gave the name of B., as the purchaser, without B.'s authority. A. duly executed a transfer of the shares to B., but B. never executed it. The transfer was, however, registered by the company, and B.'s name was entered on the register. His name was subsequently removed by order of the court, on the ground that he had never accepted the shares, and, the company being ordered to be wound-up, A.'s name was placed on the list of contributories:

Held, that, no valid transfer of the shares having been made from A., he had been properly placed on the list of contributories; and an application to remove his name was, consequently, refused with costs.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Mr. Heritage to have his name removed from the list of contributories to to the above company in respect of 100 shares.

On the 5th Oct. 1865 Mr. Heritage applied for 200 shares in the company, which was then in the course of formation, and on the 14th of the same month 100 shares were allotted to him. On the 9th Oct., in contemplation of the allotment, he instructed his brokers to sell the 100 shares, which they did at a premium; and on the first settling day the purchasing brokers paid for the shares, and gave the name of one Hankey as the purchaser. Mr. Heritage duly executed a transfer to Hankey, and returned it to the brokers, who left it at the office of the company for registration, without Hankey having executed it, as required by the articles of association. Notwithstanding this omission, the transfer was registered by the company, and Hankey's name was entered on the register of shareholders.

In Aug. 1866, Hankey, alleging that his name had been used in the transaction without his authority, moved the court to rectify the register of shareholders by omitting his name, which was accordingly done on the ground that he had never accepted the shares. The company was ordered to be wound up in Nov. 1866, and soon afterwards Heritage's name was placed on the list of contributories in respect of the 100 shares. He accordingly took out the present summons to have his name removed from the list.

Jessel, Q.C. and Everitt appeared in support of the application.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. and Lindley for the official liquidator.

Lord ROMILLY.—When a person once take shares he remains a shareholder until his shares are forfeited or duly transferred. There has been no forfeiture in this case, and no valid transfer has been effected, as the deed was not executed by Mr. Hankey, who, in fact, gave no authority for the use of his name. Mr. Hankey's name has been removed from the register of shareholders by an order of this court, and I must assume that order to have been correctly made, as no steps have been taken to discharge it. The effect of the order was that the shares immediately reverted to Mr. Heritage. If I were to grant the present application, the effect would be simply to cancel the shares. The court has already, in effect, decided that there has been no valid transfer from Mr. Heritage, and he was, therefore, properly placed on the list of contributories. I cannot remove his name, and the summons must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

TONGE v. WARD.

Trade-mark—Imitation—Injunction—Damages—Costs.

W.'s manager, without the personal knowledge of W., affixed tickets with T.'s name printed thereon to certain goods of inferior quality to T.'s, and made by another manufacturer. On T.'s complaining of this, W. offered to give an undertaking that he would not use such tickets again, and to pay a certain sum, but declined to make a public admission that he had used the tickets in order to defraud T.:

Held, that, notwithstanding W.'s offer, T. was entitled to an injunction with costs, and also to an inquiry as to damages at his own risk:

Nunn v. D'Albuquerque, 34 Beav. 595, distinguished.

This was a suit by Messrs. Richard Tonge and Co., cloth manufacturers, of Manchester, against Messrs. Ward, Armitage, and Co., who carry on the business of commission agents at the same place, to restrain them from affixing to cloth sold by them, tickets with a name similar in sound to the plaintiffs' name. The bill also prayed for an account, and an inquiry as to damages.

The plaintiffs were manufacturers of certain mixed fabrics of worsted and cotton, known as "Tonge's" chintz poplins, and other similar names, and they were in the habit of affixing to the fabrics manufactured by them, ornamental tickets embossed with the word "Tonge's" in addition to the name of the fabric; under this name or trade-mark the plaintiffs' cloth had acquired a considerable reputation in America.

Early in 1868 a Mr. Brown, of the firm of White, Brown, and Co., of Boston, customers of the plaintiffs, gave the defendants an order for a large number of pieces of a fabric very similar to the plaintiffs' chintz poplins, but admitted by the defendants' answer to be of an inferior quality; Mr. Brown directed Mr. Stewart, the defendants' manager, to whom he gave the order, to affix to the pieces tickets with the words "Tung's chintz poplins," which Mr. Stewart accordingly did, but without the personal knowledge of the defendants. The tickets so affixed did not bear much resemblance to the ornamental tickets used by the plaintiffs, except in the word "Tung's," which is quite similar in sound to the word "Tonge's." About 5200 pieces of fabric with these tickets affixed were sent out to America, and there was evidence to show that in addition to the immediate loss of custom, the plaintiff's reputation as cloth manufacturers had been injured in America by the inferior quality of the fabric to which the defendants had affixed these tickets.

In May 1868 the plaintiffs heard of the transaction, and immediately wrote to the defendants, complaining of their conduct. In reply the defendants admitted what had occurred, but stated that their manager had acted without their knowledge, and that they would give an undertaking not to repeat the offence, and that they would pay 50*l.* to the Royal Infirmary at Manchester. The plaintiffs then required the defendants to make the payment to the infirmary through the plaintiffs as an acknowledgment of the fraud. The defendants, however, refused to make any public acknowledgment of the fraud, and the present suit was accordingly instituted.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Jessel, Q. C., and E. Thurston Holland, for the plaintiffs, submitted that they were entitled to an injunction with costs. They cited

Millington v. Fox, 3 My. & Cr. 338;
Sykes v. Sykes, 3 B. & C. 541;
Chappell v. Davidson, 2 K. & J. 123.

They also asked for an inquiry as to damages.

Swanston, Q. C. and Hume Williams, for the defendants, submitted that the defendants having offered to give the undertaking required, and to pay what was required by the plaintiffs, the bill should not have been filed, and that the decree ought to be made without costs. The plaintiff's trade-mark had been infringed without the personal knowledge of the defendants, and the plaintiffs had sustained no real damage; if the plaintiffs insisted on an inquiry as to damages they were strictly entitled to it, but they submitted that it ought to be made at the risk of the plaintiffs. They cited

Nunn v. D'Albuquerque, 34 Beav. 595.

LORD ROMILLY.—I cannot assent to the proposition that the defendants are not legally and morally liable. It is a very different thing to infringe a patent without knowing that a patent has been taken out, and to sell goods with the name of another person upon them. In this case the defendants sell with the name of "Tung's" upon the goods. If they did not know what their servant had done, they were bound to know. It does not lie in their mouth to say that they did not know. There were two thousand parcels of goods sent out with the name of "Tung's" upon them. For what purpose did they put the name of "Tung's" upon a certain quantity of cloth which was sent to an agent of a Boston house? Would anybody suppose—particularly among persons who are manufacturers of cloths—that there was any particular cloth called by that name? The defendants do not even pretend that there was such a thing; but it is the name of a manufacturer of cloth of a certain description. They were bound to know what their servant did. It is quite true that they could not be compelled to do that which was required, namely, to pay a sum of money to the infirmary or the like. But this they might have done—the moment the bill was filed they might have said, "we will give you a decree as you ask it." It was not at all necessary for that purpose to bring it to a hearing. They might have said, "take a decree in the terms you ask, and we will pay your costs." It is impossible for them to say that they are not liable to pay the costs. This case is quite distinct from the case of Millington v. Fox (sup.) It is quite distinct from the case of Nunn v. D'Albuquerque (sup.), where the defendant said: "I was not at all aware of the patent; the moment I heard of the patent, I gave up the whole of the goods which I had manufactured; I will undertake not to do it any more; I will pay the costs, and I will also pay you the profits which I have made." If after such an offer on the part of the defendant, a plaintiff brings on the suit to a hearing, it is a case of oppression, for what more could he get? He was offered everything which he could possibly get by the suit. That is not so in this case; it is very far from it. Accordingly, I must make a decree as asked for with costs, up to and including the hearing; but I strongly advise the plaintiffs not to ask for an inquiry as to damages.

Jessel, Q. C.—There were 5200 pieces of cloth. It is loss and damage to us.

LORD ROMILLY.—That may be so, but the burden of proof lies upon you, and you will have to pay the costs of the inquiry if you do not prove any damage. There is this circumstance, that it is admitted that the cloth was of an inferior quality, and the damage may be damage to your reputation, besides the quantity of cloth which has been sold. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the decree which they ask in this case. It is impossible for a man to say that he does not know what his agent does. Mr. Stewart was the defendant's agent. Of course this sort of thing is never done personally by the parties in any case; it is always done by some servant or agent. They are bound to know what their agents do, and if they do not know, they are responsible exactly as if they did did know.

Re NEW ZEALAND BANKING CORPORATION; Ex parte HANKEY.

Company—Winding-up—Compromise of claims against directors—Motion to stay actions by dissentient contributories—Jurisdiction—Companies Act 1862, ss. 87, 160.

A compromise had been effected of certain claims by the contributories against the late directors of a company in the course of liquidation; the compromise had been assented to by forty-nine out of fifty-one contributories, and had been sanctioned by an order of the court.

On a motion to stay actions commenced against the late directors by the two dissentient contributories pending an inquiry (which was also moved for) into the conduct of the directors:

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to stay the actions.

This was a motion on behalf of Mr. James Alers Hankey, formerly a director of the above company, for an order that certain actions lately commenced in the Court of Common Pleas by Messrs. Turner and Middlemast, two contributories of the company, against the late directors, might be stayed, pending an inquiry into the conduct of the late directors of the company, in order to ascertain whether such directors had wilfully and fraudulently applied to their own use any moneys of the company, or made any false statements respecting its affairs, or been guilty of any breach of trust in relation to the company, regard being had to a compromise which had been lately effected between the directors and contributories of the company. The motion was also for such an inquiry into the conduct of the late directors.

Disputes had arisen between the former directors and the contributories of this company, and eventually a compromise had been agreed upon, to which forty-nine out of fifty-one contributories had assented. The compromise had been sanctioned by an order of the court dated the 30th July 1869.

The two dissentient contributories were the plaintiffs in the actions, which it was sought to stay.

Jessel, Q. C. and H. M. Jackson, in support of the motion, submitted that the court had jurisdiction, under the 87th and 160th sections of the Companies Act 1862, to stay the action. They cited

Re Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 839; L. Rep. 8, Eq. 241.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., for the assenting contributories, supported the motion.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and G. W. Lawrence, for the dissentient contributories, contended that the sections in question gave the court no jurisdiction to stay actions against the directors of a company as individuals, but only against the company.

Wickens appeared for the official liquidator.

The sections of the Companies Act 1862, above referred to are in the following words:

Sect. 87:

When an order has been made for winding-up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company, except with the leave of the court, and subject to such terms as the court may impose.

Sect. 160:

The liquidators may, with the sanction of the court, where the company is being wound-up by the court, or subject to the supervision of the court, and with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution of the company where the company is being wound-up altogether voluntarily, compromise all calls and liabilities to calls, debts and liabilities capable of resulting in debts, and all claims whether present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages, subsisting or supposed to subsist between the company and any contributory or alleged contributory or other debtor or person apprehending liability to the company, and all questions in any way relating to or affecting the assets of the company or the winding-up of the company, upon the receipt of such sums, payable at such times, and generally upon such terms as may be agreed upon, with power for the liquidators to take any security for the discharge of such debts or liabilities, and to give complete discharge in respect of all or any such calls, debts, or liabilities.

Lord ROMILLY.—I have no jurisdiction to stay the actions, and must therefore refuse the motion. There will be no costs, except that the official liquidator must have his costs out of the estate.

Re GLEBE LANDS OF GREAT YELDHAM.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Purchase-money paid into court—Insolvent railway company—Petition for payment of costs.

A railway company took part of the glebe lands of a parish and paid into court the purchase-money, which was ordered to be invested in Consols, and the dividends to be paid to the rector of the parish during his life; and the company were ordered to pay the costs of the rector. The company became insolvent before they had paid all the costs.

On a petition by the rector:

Ordered, that part of the Consols be sold and applied in payment of the unpaid costs.

This was a petition by the rector of Great Yeldham, praying that part of a sum of 300*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* Consols, which represented the purchase-money of certain glebe lands in his parish, taken by the Colne Valley and Halstead Railway Company and paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, might be sold and the amount applied in payment of certain costs remaining due to his solicitors.

By an order made on the petition of the rector, and dated the 27th Nov. 1867, the purchase-money had been ordered to be invested in Consols and the dividends to be paid to the rector during his life, and the railway company were ordered to pay the costs of the rector, which were afterwards taxed at 143*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* Of this sum only 105*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* had been paid by the company, leaving a balance of 38*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* still due. The purchase-money was invested in accordance with the order, and produced 300*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* Consols.

The petition stated that the railway company was now insolvent, and prayed that a sufficient part of the Consols might be sold to produce the balance still due for costs, and that the proceeds might be paid to the petitioner's solicitors.

Rowcliffe appeared in support of the petition.

Lord ROMILLY.—I think I may make the order as prayed for.

Re JONES (a Solicitor).

Solicitor and client—Taxation of costs on order obtained by client—Costs of uncertificated solicitor—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 26.

The 26th section of the Solicitors' Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 26), which provides that no uncertificated solicitor shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit for the recovery of any fee, &c. for business done by him whilst uncertificated, does not destroy the debt, but merely takes away the remedy.

Consequently, where a solicitor had, without any fault of his own, been without a certificate for six months, and the taxing master, on an order of course taken out by the client, had disallowed all the items in a bill of costs in respect of business done during the time that the solicitor was without a certificate;

Held, on a summons by the solicitor to review the taxation, that the taxing master was wrong in disallowing these items, and the matter was referred back to the taxing master accordingly.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application on the part of Mr. Richard Bevan Jones, a solicitor, that it might be referred back to the taxing master to review his taxation of a certain bill of costs in respect of certain items which had been disallowed.

A client of Mr. Jones has obtained the common order to tax his bill in respect of the costs of a certain suit in which Mr. Jones has acted as his solicitor. The client on his petition for the order had made the usual submission, to pay what should appear to be due in respect of the bill.

During six months (Dec. 1866 to June 1867) of the time over which the business done by Mr. Jones extended, his certificate, by pure accident and through no fault of his own, but through a mistake of his London agents, had not been renewed, and the taxing master, according to his invariable practice, disallowed all the charges for business done during the six months in which Mr. Jones had been without a certificate, on the ground that they were irrecoverable under the 26th section of the Solicitors' Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), by which it is enacted that no person who as an attorney or solicitor shall sue, prosecute, defend, or carry on any action or suit, or any proceedings, in any of the courts, without having previously obtained a stamped certificate which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for or in respect of any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he shall have been without such certificate as last aforesaid.

The client did not deny that the business had been done for which the disallowed charges were made, but relied upon the above-mentioned section of the Solicitors' Act in support of the taxing master's decision.

Jessel. Q. C. and Bevir, in support of the summons, submitted that, although the Act rendered a solicitor incapable of maintaining any action or suit for the recovery of his fees for business done whilst he was without a certificate, it did not destroy the debt; the provision in the Act was analogous to those in the Statutes of Limitation, which had been frequently held not to destroy the debt, but only to bar the remedy. They cited

Courtenay v. Williams, 3 Hare, 539;
Spears v. Hartley, 2 Esp. 81;
Higgins v. Scott, 2 B. & Ad. 413.

Begg, in support of the taxing master's decision, contended that this summons was a suit for the recovery of his fees by an uncertificated solicitor within the meaning of the Act, and that the taxing master's decision must, therefore, be upheld. He cited

Sparling v. Brereton, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 166; L. Rep. 2 Eq. 64;
Re Angell, 6 Dowl. & Low. 144;
Fullalove v. Parker, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 353; 8 Jur. N. S. 1078;
Punter v. Lord Grantley, 3 M. & G. 295.

He also urged that, on grounds of public policy, the decision of the taxing master should be upheld.

Jessel, Q. C. replied.

Dec. 4.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a summons asking me to direct the taxing master to review his certificate in consequence of these circumstances. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case, and continued]: The client took out the order of course. It was not a proceeding by the solicitor, but it was a proceeding taken by the client, who thereupon undertook to pay everything that should be found due. As I have stated, the taxing master has disallowed all these items; and unquestionably, in doing that, the taxing master has only followed the invariable practice. The question seems never to have undergone any judicial decision, and I have, therefore, looked into the case very carefully. Now it is to be observed that the clause of the Act (6 & 7 Vict. c 73, s. 26) is a penal enactment, and, therefore, it is to be construed strictly. Does it destroy the debt? It says that no solicitor or attorney shall maintain any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee or reward in respect of any business done during the time that he has been uncertificated. Am I to go beyond that and say that it puts an end to the debt? If so, I must consider, in the next place, whether this is a proceeding at law or in equity which is maintained or prosecuted by the solicitor for the recovery of his fees. The distinction between putting an end to a debt and putting an end to the remedy is very well marked, and is familiar to everybody. It is well known in the case of the Statute of Limitations, which does not destroy the debt, but only puts an end to the remedy. This is a matter of very great importance, which, as far as I can make out, has never met with any judicial decision; and I have come to the conclusion that it does not destroy the debt, but that the debt is still a subsisting debt, though the solicitor cannot take any step to recover it. That this is so I think there are authorities to show. In the first place this clause has been construed very strictly in various respects. It has been decided that it does not apply to conveyancing business, for it merely says, prosecuting any proceeding at law or in equity, and, therefore, it does not affect conveyancing business. I was referred to several cases by Mr Begg, who has taken a good deal of pains with the matter, and was kind enough to give me all the authorities which appear to exist on the subject, it being very important that the court should come to a mature decision; but the only case which appears to me to be very material upon the point is the case of Fullalove v. Parker (sup.). In the judgments pronounced by the learned judges in that case there are observations which materially fortify the view I take of this case. The case there was of this description. It seems to have been, as far as I can make out, an order for the recovery of costs in a suit in the Secondary's Court in the City of London; the defendant was ordered to pay the plaintiff's costs of the suit; they went to tax the plaintiff's costs; the plaintiff's attorney had not taken out a proper certificate, but the taxing master taxed the costs before the attorney on the other side had discovered the fact; and accordingly the taxing master, all parties being ignorant that the attorney was not properly certificated, allowed the costs. Upon that the defendant appealed to the Court of Common Bench for the purpose of getting the costs disallowed, and the court held that he could not get them disallowed then because, not having taken the objection before the master, it was too late—showing clearly that in their estimation the debt was not destroyed. But, in addition to that, there is an observation made by both the learned judges who disposed of the case, which I think it material to read. Mr Justice Willes says (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 353): "If the attorney is really uncertificated, he is not entitled to recover any costs, nor is the plaintiff entitled to recover such costs from the defendant except in this case only—if the plaintiff has made advances to the attorney, he cannot recover them back as a conditio indebiti, as for money paid under a mistake; the attorney, though uncertificated, is entitled to retain the money so advanced, and the plaintiff would have a right to recover this from the defendant." Mr Justice Byles says (8 Jur. N. S. 1078): "I am of the same opinion. The case cited by my Brother Willes" (Punter v. Lord Grantley, 3 M. & G. 295) "shows that this matter was for the master, not for the court. In the circumstances stated, the court could not interfere without taking a leap in the dark. Moreover, part of the money may have been paid by the plaintiff to his attorney in the interval; in which case it cannot be recovered back." Both these judgments show clearly that the judges did not consider that the debt was extinguished, but only that the remedy was taken away. Then I have to consider whether this is a proceeding at law or in equity by the solicitor for the recovery of his fees. I am of opinion that it is not. I do not say what the effect would be if the solicitor himself had obtained a taxing order, and had taken the initiative in the matter; but he has taken no step. It is a step taken by the client, who obtains the usual order of course to tax the bill, undertaking to pay all that is found due. I am of opinion that this part of the bill was due at the time, and that the clause in the Act of Parliament, like all the other penal clauses, must be construed strictly, and must be considered to have the effect of taking away the remedy and not of destroying the debt. I am of opinion, therefore, that the taxing master was wrong in disallowing these items, though he has followed the invariable practice, which has never before been submitted to the consideration of the court. I am of opinion that I must decide the case according to the proper construction of the Act of Parliament, and that the Act does not take away the right of the solicitor either to set-off the debt or to apply to it money which has already been paid. The result is that this case must go back to the taxing master to tax those items which have been disallowed. Of course there will be no costs. I beg it to be understood that I do not express any opinion what the effect might be if the solicitor had taken the initiative, but this is a proceeding by the client, and the client undertakes to pay all that is due; and as I am of opinion that, under the statute, this amount is due, he is bound to pay it.

Winding-up—Practice—Official liquidator—Appointment by court.

In a winding-up, where the party having the carriage of the winding-up order proposes a fit and proper person to be liquidator, the court will appoint him where there is no material difference in point of merit between the persons proposed.

Re The General Provident Assurance Company, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45, followed.

This was an adjourned summons to determine who should be official liquidator of the above company, which was ordered to be wound-up some months ago upon the petition of a creditor. The winding-up had since been managed by a provisional liquidator.

Two gentlemen were proposed for the office: the first, Mr. Samuel Barrow, was supported by creditors to the amount of 5724*l.*, amongst whom was the creditor on whose petition the company had been ordered to be wound-up, by the holders of 640 paid-up, and 750 partly paid-up shares, and by the Universal Life Insurance Company, who held debentures for 15,000*l.* as security for a loan of 6000*l.*

Mr. James B. Gibbons, the other gentleman proposed, was supported by creditors to the amount of 20,000*l.* by the holders of 3369 shares, and by a Mr. Jenkins, who claimed 30,700*l.* as the purchase-money of estates sold by him to the company; and also by the London and County Bank.

Mr. Gibbons had acted as provisional liquidator.

Swanston, Q. C. and Napier Higgins, for the petitioner and other creditors, submitted that the person proposed by the party having the carriage of the winding-up order should be appointed. They cited

Re The General Provident Assurance Company, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45.

Jessel, Q. C., for the Universal Life Insurance Company, also supported the appointment of Barrow.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, for the shareholders and others supporting Gibbons, contended that he ought to be appointed, as he was supported by the majority of the shareholders, and had acted as provisional liquidator.

W. W. Karslake, Fitzroy Kelly, and Lindley, for other parties, also supported the appointment of Gibbons.

Lord ROMILLY.—I will follow the rule laid down by Malins, V. C. in Re The General Provident Assurance Company (sup.), that where the party having the carriage of the winding-up order proposes a fit and proper person, he shall be the person appointed liquidator if there is no material difference in point of merit between the persons proposed. Mr. Barrow must, therefore, be appointed.

Practice—Revivor by assignees of bankrupt plaintiff—Costs—Stay of proceedings.

Where a plaintiff becomes bankrupt or dies, and his assignees or representatives carry on the suit, they can only do so upon payment of all costs, which he had been ordered and was liable to pay.

This was a motion in the cause in which there had been the usual order of revivor that all further proceedings might be stayed until certain costs ordered to be paid by the original plaintiff were paid. It appeared that, the bill having been filed previously to the month of Dec. 1868, the then plaintiff presented a petition in the cause, which came on to be heard, and upon which an order was made, dismissing it with costs. Matters remained in statu quo until the month of May following, when the plaintiff was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the costs ordered to be paid in December remaining still unpaid, the cause was revived in the ordinary way by his assignee, who claimed a right to adopt the suit, and proceed in it, without first paying those costs, and the question was whether he could do so.

Glasse, Q. C. and Charles Hall, for the defendant, in support of the motion. This case must be looked at as if the plaintiff had not become bankrupt, and no order for revivor had been made; that is the true test. Had that been the case, no further proceedings would have been allowed to be taken by him until he had first paid the costs of the petition dismissed in Dec. 1868. His assignee stands in exactly the same position as the bankrupt, and can have no better rights; and he must therefore pay these costs, or all further proceedings must be stayed:

Bellchamber v. Giani, 3 Madd. 550;
Oldfield v. Cobbett, 12 Beav. 91;
Whitcomb v. Minchin, 5 Madd. 91;
Poole v. Franks, 1 Moll. 78; see also Morgan and Davey on Costs, 86.

The assignee of a bankrupt is in the same position as an ordinary party reviving a suit as representing the former plaintiff, and that was well settled many years ago:

Troward v. Bingham, 4 Sim. 483;
Altree v. Hordern, 5 Beav. 623;
Long v. Storie, 13 Jur. 1091.

A party reviving a suit cannot take advantage of his position as plaintiff without entirely representing the original party. In such entire representation is involved the liability to pay costs if any suit exists; and it is not necessary to refer to the remedy for nonpayment. The same rule holds good at law in the action: 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 162. (The Common Law Procedure Act).

Karslake, Q. C., and Mander contended, first, that no case existed in which such a motion as this had been made and succeeded; if a defendant to a suit could get such an order, there would be numerous precedents, and there were none. It was entirely a question resting on the fact of the party being in contempt for nonpayment of the costs. Bellchamber v. Giani (sup.), and Oldfield v. Cobbett (sup.) showed that. The mere fact of bankruptcy was sufficient to purge the contempt if there was any, and hence the only thing upon which such a motion as this rested, was done away by the bankruptcy, and the assignee began de novo. In the case of a plaintiff becoming bankrupt, the defendants have two courses; they can either have the bill dismissed without costs, if the cause has not come to a hearing; or, if it has, they can move to stay proceedings, putting it upon the assignees to revive, and fixing a time within which they must do so.

Sharp v. Hallett, 2 Sim. & St. 496;
Whitmore v. Oxborrow, 1 Coll. C. C. 91.

No doubt at law, under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 162, the assignees of a plaintiff in an action, who becomes bankrupt, are required to give security for costs; but that finds no parallel in equity. The assignees may continue the suit, and would, of course incur the same future liability for their own acts as any other plaintiff: (Foxwell v. Greatorex, 3 Beav. 345.) The authorities cited in support of the motion were not in point. They were either cases where the assignees did not stand alone, or where they filed a new bill, leaving the defendant in the difficulty of being unable to revive for costs only. The defendants here, if these proceedings were stayed, would have a double remedy, which would not be allowed, for they already have the means of recovering their costs in the bankruptcy, against the bankrupt's estate.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This motion has been argued at very considerable length, and as a matter of practice is of some importance, but I entertain no doubt upon it whatever. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the facts.] The estate of the bankrupt being liable to these costs, it is not, nor indeed can it be, disputed that in case the assignees of a bankrupt plaintiff do not adopt and carry on a suit first instituted by him, the only remedy the defendants have to recover any costs to which he may at the date of his bankruptcy be liable, is by proving the bankruptcy against his estate in respect of such costs as a debt and receiving a dividend. The question, however, in the present case is this: Can the assignee revive a suit and go on with it, not having first paid any costs which his bankrupt was at the date of his bankruptcy liable to pay? I am of opinion that he cannot; I think that is perfectly clear. Let us look, first, at the principle upon which this proceeds; what is the duty of assignees in a case like the present; they find a suit instituted by the party whom they represent, and they have to consider whether they will prosecute it or not. In considering this, they have to consider, not only whether it is worth while to go on at the risk of further costs, but whether it is worth while to take the liability of paying those which the bankrupt was ordered to pay. If the conclusion is that it is not worth while, the suit should be put a stop to, and upon every principle of justice the defendants ought not to be further harassed with the proceedings. This motion, therefore, on principle appears to me to be right. Then the principle being such as I have stated, how does the matter stand on authority? I own I was somewhat surprised to hear Mr. Karslake assert that there was no authority in point; for it appears to me that there are not only many cases directly in point, but that the principle was recognised many years ago; indeed the cases are not new ones by any means. Poole v. Franks (sup.) was a case where a plaintiff having become bankrupt his assignees continued the suit by supplemental bill (that is, in fact, the same as this case), in which the suit is carried on by revivor, amounting to the present practice. Sir Anthony Hart, a most experienced judge in such matters (who was the Lord Chancellor of Ireland), treated the matter in this way. He referred to the fact that the assignees now adopted part only of the case made by the bill, the bankrupt suing both as executor and residuary legatee, and observed that it behoved them not to touch the original record, but to file a new bill. But they elected to come in by supplemental bill, and thereby adopted all the liabilities of the original plaintiff, and that is shown by the very form, which was in the usual terms, of a supplemental bill; namely, to have the benefit of the original suit. This was an adoption of the suit. (The Vice-Chancellor read passages from the judgment.) And Sir Anthony Hart decided that they had adopted the suit and were bound to pay the whole costs as the condition of going on with it. The assignees of a bankrupt and the representative of a plaintiff who revives, are precisely in the same position. In Horlock v. Priestley, 8 Sim. 621, the executors of a plaintiff revived the suit, and the question was whether they could be allowed to prosecute it without first paying the costs, which their testator was liable to pay, Sir Launcelot Shadwell considered that the executor having revived, stood in the testator's shoes, and must pay the costs. In Lyon v. McKenna, 2 Moll. 460, Sir William McMahon took the same view. (The Vice-Chancellor referred to that case.) In that case there was a rule to revive, which the plaintiffs did, but neglected to proceed with the suit, and their bill was dismissed with costs; and it was held that by reviving they were subject to all the costs. Whitcomb v. Minchin (sup.) was not exactly the same—indeed, it was the converse case, the assignees of the bankrupt being defendants, and made parties by supplement, and Sir John Leach concluded that if they improperly resisted the plaintiff's demand they might be liable for all the costs. But further, in Long v. Storie (sup.), a new bill was filed for the same purpose in substance, and Shadwell, V. C. was of opinion that the proceedings ought to be stayed, it being, as he expressed it, "grossly unjust that parties should go on with a second suit until they had paid the costs of the first." That was the same, in fact, as the present case. In Altree v. Horden (sup.), also, a new bill was filed, and Lord Langdale stayed the proceedings in the second suit until the costs in the first suit were paid. Troward v. Bingham (sup.) is to the same effect, and Shadwell, V. C. refers to something he had before recognised, namely, that an adoption of a suit by an executor involves the liability to costs. Foxwell v. Greatorex (sup.) was to the same effect, that being a case of specific performance. The principle, therefore, settled by the authorities is this: where a person fills a representative character, whether it be as the assignee of a bankrupt, the executor of a testator, or the administrator of an original plaintiff, if there be costs due by such plaintiff or the person who is represented, the proceedings cannot go on unless those costs are first paid. There is no authority contrary to this. As to the case of revivor within a limited time, that is for the protection of a defendant, and the option of reviving is given; and if the option is exercised, I am clearly of opinion that it could only be on the terms of paying all the costs to which the bankrupt was liable at the date of the order to revive. A great deal of time has been occupied upon an argument not sustainable, and on a case perfectly concluded by authority forty years ago. Upon principle and authority, therefore, I must accede to this motion. I ought, perhaps, before I part with the case, to refer to an argument which was much pressed, that the practice of staying proceedings by a party until payment of costs was founded solely on contempt. Having carefully considered the authorities, I find no case depending on contempt; they all go on the injustice of allowing a party to go on without paying costs ordered to be paid. The assignee must pay the costs of this motion, which he has resisted and failed in his resistance.

Re FAMILY ENDOWMENT SOCIETY.

Companies Act 1862—Winding-up—Transfer of business—Novatio debiti.

The F. E. Life Assurance Society (unregistered) agreed, in 1861, to transfer its business and assets to the A. company, who undertook its liabilities. Resolutions in accordance with the deed of settlement of the society were passed at two general meetings in 1861, approving the arrangement and dissolving the society, which thereupon discontinued business:

Held, that the society had not ceased to exist before the Companies Act 1862, and that the Court had jurisdiction to wind it up under that Act.

The petitioner (who held two annuities from the society) had notice of the agreement for transfer, and afterwards received his annuities from the A. company, and gave them receipts:

Held, that he had not thereby ceased to be a creditor of the society.

This was a petition for the winding-up under the Companies Act 1862 of an assurance society called the Family Endowment Society, presented by General Pott, the holder of two annuities granted by the society.

The society was formed in the year 1835. It was never registered under the Companies Act 1862. The nominal capital of the society was 500,000*l.*, divided into 5000 shares of 100*l.* each. It was regulated by the provisions of a deed of settlement, and by an Act of Parliament (6 & 7 Will 4, c. xxi.). The Act provided (s. 10) for the enrolment in Chancery of memorials of the names of all new directors, chairmen, and secretaries of the society, and provided (sect. 11) that the persons whose names were last so memorialised, should, until the memorialising of their successors, continue liable to all proceedings as if they had not ceased to be such directors, chairmen, or secretaries. The Act enabled the society to sue and be sued in the name of the directors, or chairman, or secretary.

The petition stated that by a contract dated the 12th March 1849, subscribed by three directors of the society, and duly binding on the society pursuant to its deed of settlement, it was declared that in consideration of the monthly payments to be made as therein mentioned by General Pott to the society until and including the 26th Jan. 1861 (which were all duly made) the funds of the society should be made liable, according to the provisions of the deed of settlement to the payment to Gen. Pott or his assigns of an annuity of 1000 East India Company's rupees, with a bonus, such annuity to commence on the 26th Aug. 1861, if General Pott should be then in India, or on the 26th Feb. 1862 if he should be then in Europe, and to continue thenceforth payable during his life by equal half-yearly payments, on the 26th Aug. and 26th Feb., in every year, provided that the subscribed capital of 500,000*l.*, and other the stocks, funds, securities, and property of the society remaining at the time of any claim or demand made unapplied and undisposed of in pursuance of the provisions and authorities contained in its deed of settlement, should alone be liable to answer and make good all claims and demands upon the society.

The petition also stated a similar contract entered into between the society and General Pott on the 11th June 1850.

The 32nd and 122nd clauses of the deed of settlement were as follows.

Clause 32:

That two extraordinary general meetings, specially called for the purpose, shall by a majority of three-fourths of the votes of the proprietors present and entitled, and not declining to vote at such meeting, or at any ballot which may be taken in consequence of its having been demanded at any such meeting, have full power to pass a resolution to dissolve the society.

Clause 122:

That, whenever two successive extraordinary general meetings shall, upon the recommendation of the board of directors, have come to a resolution to dissolve the society, the board of directors shall cease to grant or renew any contracts of endowments or assurances on behalf of the society, and shall proceed in such manner as they shall think fair and reasonable to meet the existing engagements of the society; and shall cause so much of the funds or property of the society as shall not then consist of money, and as shall not be required to meet the existing engagements of the society, and shall cause so much of the funds or property of the society as shall not then consist of money, and as shall not be required to meet the existing engagements of the society, to be forthwith sold or otherwise converted into money in such manner and upon such terms as the board shall think proper, and after such sale or conversion shall cause so much of the funds or property of the society as shall not be required to meet the existing engagements thereof, to be paid and distributed to and amongst the several persons then being proprietors or holders of shares in the society rateably and pari passu according to the number of shares held by them respectively. And the directors shall have full, unlimited, and uncontrollable power and discretion to direct and adopt any mode which they shall think proper for realising, dividing, distributing, and finally disposing of the surplus funds and property of the society, and for that purpose to retain and set apart to such amount as they shall think proper, any moneys to form an indemnity fund to meet the engagements and liabilities of the society, and to deal with such fund; and in the meantime until it shall be required for satisfaction of the purposes for which it shall have been set apart in such manner as they shall think proper, and in the event of there being a surplus of such fund after satisfying all the engagements and liabilities of the society, the board of directors shall, as soon as conveniently may be after such surplus shall be ascertained, convert the same into money and distribute and divide the proceeds among the several persons being proprietors or holders of shares in the society at the time of the dissolution thereof, and their respective executors, administrators, and assigns; and the further to enable the board of directors to carry into effect a dissolution of the society and to wind-up the affairs thereof, it shall be lawful for them to adopt any plan which in their judgment shall be deemed expedient for paying to the proprietors or holders of shares in the society, or placing at their risk their several proportions of the surplus funds of the society, and the persons who shall be directors at the time of passing the resolution for dissolving the society, shall continue in such office until the affairs of the society shall be wound-up, and shall and may fill up, if they think proper so to do, any vacancies which may occur among themselves during such period, and the persons so elected to fill such vacancies shall have, exercise, and enjoy all the powers and authorities hereby conferred upon directors of the society as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as though they had been elected by the proprietors at an annual general meeting, under the provisions in that behalf hereinbefore contained, provided nevertheless, that in case the funds or property of the society, at the time of such dissolution, be insufficient to pay the existing claims and demands upon the society, in respect of the assurances effected by the society, then, and in that case, the board of directors shall, under the powers hereinbefore contained, from time to time as they shall think proper, or find it necessary, call upon the proprietors of the society for the payment of such further instalments on their shares in the capital of the society as shall be sufficient to make up the deficiency in such funds or property for payment of the existing claims and demands upon the society, and shall distribute the amount of such further instalments together with such fund or property as aforesaid, amongst the several claimants in respect of the assurances effected by the society in full satisfaction of their respective claims and demands, rateably and in proportion to the amount of their respective claims and demands upon the society, and when, and so soon as such payment and distribution shall be completely made and effected, the society shall be dissolved, and every clause, article, matter, and thing herein contained, except this present provision, shall thenceforth cease, determine, and be void.

By articles of agreement made on the 5th Feb. 1861, between three of the directors of the society of the one part, and three directors of the Albert and Medical Life Assurance Company of the other part, it was agreed that subject to the approval of two extraordinary general meetings of the shareholders of the society, the business of the society, and all its money, property, credits, securities, and effects should be transferred as from the 1st Jan. 1861, to the company, which should repay to all the shareholders of the society the sum of 4*l.* per share, being the entire amount then paid upon the shares of the society, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the 1st Jan. 1861. It was also agreed that all the debts, engagements, liabilities, and risks of the society, and all claims and demands against the society should be wholly paid, performed, undertaken, and met by the company, and the company should at all times save harmless and keep indemnified the society and the trustees and directors and shareholders thereof from and against the same, and from and against all actions, suits, and proceedings in respect thereof, and all acts and charges in connection therewith. It was also provided that the holders of all such policies of assurance as would be entitled to participate in the profits of the society (and who should accept in exchange policies of the company, or otherwise concur in accepting the engagements of the company) should be entitled to participate in the profits of the company, and empowered the company to use the names or name of the society, or any of its directors, or trustees, in the proceedings which might be required for realising the assets of the society, and for bringing or defending any actions or suits for the purpose of the agreement.

At two extraordinary general meetings of the society, held on the 21st Feb. and 14th March 1861, resolutions dissolving the society and adopting the agreement, were duly passed and confirmed.

Circulars were shortly afterwards issued to the policy holders and annuitants in the society, announcing the dissolution of the society and the combination of its business with that of the company, and stating that it would not be necessary in any way to disturb the existing policies and contracts of the society, but that should any policy or contract holder particularly desire it, an indorsement of the admission of the liability of the company would be put upon the policy or a new policy issued. They also stated that annuities payable under contracts issued by the society would thenceforth be payable and paid by the company.

The petition alleged that General Pott had never received this circular, though he was aware of the amalgamation.

The Albert and Medical Life Assurance Company having changed its name to the Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company, and afterwards in April 1863 to the Albert Life Assurance Company, stopped payment in Aug. 1869, and was at the date of the presentation of the petition, being wound-up. The annuities secured to General Pott had been paid to him by the company up to the time of its stoppage, but the half-yearly payment which became due on the 26th Aug. 1869 was in arrear.

The petition alleged that General Pott had not in any way assented to any transfer of the liability in respect of the annuities from the capital and funds of the society to the company, or had otherwise in any way released the capital and funds of the society from such liability. It also alleged, that by the resolutions of the general meetings the company became dissolved, and had ever since continued to be dissolved within the meaning of part 8 of the Companies Act 1862, and that it had not since carried on business. It also alleged that the society had no funds or property other than its subscribed capital, and that it was unable to pay the debts due from it to him and others, otherwise than by the payment up of its subscribed capital, and that it was just and equitable that it should be wound-up.

Fry, Q.C. and Westlake appeared in support of the petition.

Amphlett, Q.C. and Kekewich, for the last memorialised directors of the company, on whom the petition had been served, supported the petition.

Sir R. Palmer, J. Napier Higgins, and the Hon. W. Bethell, for shareholders in the society, contended, first, that the petitioner had ceased to be a creditor of the society; secondly, that the society was not a society capable of being wound-up under the Companies Act of 1862; thirdly, that the court ought in the exercise of its judicial discretion to leave the petitioner to his remedies at law.

Kay, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C., Jackson, and Watson appeared for other shareholders.

As to a winding-up after dissolution:

The London and Westminster Insurance Company; Ex parte Phillips, 3 De G. & S. 3.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a petition by the petitioner, General Pott, praying for the winding-up of a society called the Family Endowment Society. The petitioner holds two grants from the society, granting to him annuities. The annuities are in arrear to more than the sum of 50*l*. The society has ceased to carry on business. So far, therefore, the case is brought within the Act of Parliament. The answer to the petitioner's case is threefold. It is said, first, the petitioner was a creditor, but has ceased to be a creditor of the society; secondly, the society is not a society capable of being wound-up under the Act of 1862; and, thirdly, that even if both these propositions should be answered adversely to the contention of the society, the court ought, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, to allow the petitioner to take such remedies as he may have at law. The mode in which the first proposition is attempted to be made out is this: It is said, "True it is you were originally a creditor of the society, but, by an arrangement between the society and another company called the Albert Company, to which you acceded, so as to make it a tripartite arrangement, you agreed to accept, and did accept, the Albert Company, so as to discharge your original debtor, the society." This is an issue of fact which has to be made out by the society. A great many cases have been cited, and they have all of them, I think, been cited for the purpose of introducing one expression, which is found in them all, or nearly all of them, namely, that very slight evidence is sufficient to establish such a novatio as this. When expressions of that kind are taken out of judgments, and pressed on the court, it is very important to bear in mind the class of cases in which, and the circumstances under which, the expressions were used. They were all, I think, cases in which one indebitatus assumpsit was substituted for another indebitatus assumpsit in cases of ordinary mercantile partnership. Such a case, for instance, as this: A. B. and C., being in business, take in a partner, and a creditor of A. B. and C. continues his dealings with the new firm of A. B. C. and D. In that state of things no doubt very slight evidence would be sufficient to satisfy the court that A. B. C. and D. meant to take upon themselves, as between themselves directly, and the creditor the debts of A. B. and C.; and very slight evidence, indeed, would be required to establish that the creditor had taken the joint and several liability of A. B. C. and D. instead of the joint and several liability of A. B. and C., or such a class of cases as this, where not merely a new partner was added to the firm; but where there was a slight change in the constitution of the firm, that is to say, A. B. and C. became B. C. and D. Then possibly, or probably, evidence of a not very urgent kind would be sufficient: because one knows, according to the ordinary course of dealing, and according to the ordinary understanding of mankind, in a great number of these mercantile firms, that what the creditor looks to is not the particular individuals who, on a particular day, constitute the firm, but the firm, the establishment, the house. You trust Baring's house, Coutts's house. You trust Child's house without inquiring who the particular members were at the particular date: That is to say, men in dealing with that kind of firm or house deal with it as if it were a corporation with a continued existence, and you treat and deal with the firm as a continuing body without regard to the elements of which it is composed at any particular period. In a class of cases of that kind, no doubt very slight evidence would do. But if it is meant to be said that from that class of cases this proposition is to be deduced, that whenever a debtor assigns his business to another man, very slight evidence will be sufficient to satisfy the court that the creditor accepted the purchaser of the business as a substitute for his original debtor, I should demur to that conclusion as being a true or just conclusion. But, however that may be in an ordinary case, it seems to me it has no application to such a case as the present. This is not a case, as it appears to me, in which slight evidence would suffice; but a case in which very cogent evidence would be required to establish this, that the man who had a grant in writing (a specialty, not, it is true, under seal, but as valid and effectual to all intents and purposes as if it had been under seal), a grant from the society charging specific property, and that grant secured to him by the provisions of an Act of Parliament, which provide him remedies and very easy modes of enforcing his claim; that a man having such a grant as that accepts in lieu of it, not a contract in writing, not an express promise of any kind, but an implied undertaking, and an implied grant for another joint stock company without any knowledge on his part, or means of knowledge, as to whether it were ultra vires or intra vires, as to whether it was a thing which, according to the institution of that society, anybody could bind the society to, and (which is not immaterial in this case) a grant, not in writing, not to be performed within a year of the date; so, therefore, not complying with the requirements of the Statute of Frauds. In this case, not only is there not that cogent evidence which I should have required, but it seems to me that, in truth, when one comes to look at it, there is no evidence whatever. What was done was simply the creditor presenting himself at the office at which he was to receive the money, receiving it, and giving receipts, which receipts when read in reference to the contracts under which the sums became payable, seem to me to amount to nothing more than this: that is—as if he had taken a bond, payable by instalments, and he had taken the bond to the office, and upon payment of the instalment, had written the receipt upon the instrument itself. He retained the instrument, he had it always with him, and always gave his receipts as for something payable under that instrument, and not as for anything payable under any new or substituted contract with the alleged new debtor. I am of opinion, therefore, that the society have failed entirely to make out their first proposition. Next they say, this society was not a society within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, because it had ceased to exist at the time when the Act of Parliament of 1862 was passed or came into operation, and that Act only applies to companies then existing, and of which it could be predicated that they had a place of business at that time. I am of opinion that the society had not ceased to exist. It could not cease to exist so as to prejudice its creditors. It did not, as it seems to me, purport to destroy its existence so as to prejudice its creditors. The very arrangement itself that was made—the provisions that were contained in the original deed of settlement of the society with reference to these arrangements, all provide that there shall be a continued existence of the society—a continued machinery for the society to collect its assets, to distribute them and to pay its debts, and (which is not immaterial, perhaps, in this case) the society was empowered by an Act of Parliament, which Act had provided the means by which the society could sue and be sued; and which means continued to exist on and after the arrangements between the society and the company. And further, on the very arrangements themselves between the society and the company, it is evident that the continued existence of the society was contemplated, for the company was to use the society's name, if necessary in collecting the assets, and the company was as a company to indemnify the society for its neglect to perform the provisions of the contract. I am of opinion, therefore, that the society did exist at the time when the Act came into operation, and that, as the society had authorised the Albert Company to receive any premiums that were payable upon its policies, and had appointed the Albert Company to pay all claims arising under its grants and contracts, the office of the Albert Company was for all intents and purposes the office or place at which the society continued to carry on its business. Therefore it seems to me that there is no difficulty whatever under the Act of Parliament. The third suggestion is that I should leave the parties to their remedies at law. I do not think that I can properly or justly do so. It would not be right with regard to the creditor, and other creditors in his position, to leave him to bring an action against the nominal defendants, the surviving directors, whose names appear on the enrolled memorandum—it would not be right, I say, to leave the creditor to bring his action against them, and then endeavour to find out the shareholders in any part of the kingdom against whom he might proceed by sci. fa. to enforce the judgment; nor would it be right to the nominal defendants in such a proceeding as that to allow them to be harassed without any means whatever of being protected or indemnified by the society. Under these circumstances, therefore, it appears to me that the petitioner has made out his case; that the society have failed to make out any of their defences, and the order for winding-up goes ex debito justitiæ.

After some discussion as to costs, the Vice-Chancellor decided that the costs of the petitioners, the costs of the directors who represented the company, and one set of costs to the other respondents (except the official liquidator of the company), should be paid out of the estate. The costs of the official liquidator of the company to be paid out of the estate of the company.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I forgot to notice that one of the clauses of the arrangement between the two companies points directly to the fact of the necessity of a new policy. There is a clause which provides that any of the policy holders coming in should be entitled to share in the profits of the Albert Company if they take a new policy from the Albert Company.

REG. (on the prosecution of the Guardians of Richmond Union) v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE KINGSTON UNION.

Order of removal—Removability of wife and children—Husband an Irishman absent on service—9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1—11 & 12 Vict. c. 111.

Under sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 (as amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111) the status of removability or irremovability of a married woman and her children depends upon the status of the husband.

Thus where a wife and her children had resided for upwards of five years or more in the parish of R., during which time her husband (an Irishman) was absent serving Her Majesty as a soldier, it was of irremovability in the parish of K., under the above statutes.

CASE.

By an order of two justices of the peace for the county of Surrey, dated the 19th Nov. 1868, Ellen Douglas and her two children, Ernest James, aged two years, and Edward, aged eight months, were ordered to be removed from the Kingston Poor Law to the Richmond Union, in the said county of Surrey, as being the union in which they were last legally settled.

The said order of removal was duly served upon the appellants, accompanied with a notice of chargeability, and a statement of the grounds of removal, including the particulars of the settlement relied upon by the respondents in support thereof.

The grounds of removal were as follows:—

1. That the said Ellen Douglas and her said two children have come to inhabit, and are now inhabiting, in the said parish of Kingston-upon-Thames, in the county of Surrey, not having resided in any part of the said Kingston Union for one year next before the application for the said order of removal, and not having gained a legal settlement in the said Kingston Union, nor having produced any certificate acknowledging them to be settled elsewhere. And that they are now actually chargeable to and receiving relief from the common fund of the said Kingston Union, such relief not being rendered necessary by sickness or accident.

2. That the said Ellen Douglas is the wife of Charles Douglas, to whom she was married on or about the 1st Nov. 1863.

3. That the said Charles Douglas, who is a soldier, and absent from his wife, is an Irishman, and has never done any act whereby to gain a settlement for himself

4. That the said Ellen Douglas is the lawful daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth Gray, formerly of and legally settled in the said parish of Richmond, in said Richmond Poor Law Union, and was born in the said parish of Richmond.

The fifth and sixth grounds of removal showed a derivative settlement in Richmond parish by renting a tenement.

The appellants duly served notice and grounds of appeal against the said order, and the first of such grounds was as follows: That the said Ellen Douglas and her children have, in fact, resided in the said Kingston Union for more than one year next before the application for the said order of removal.

The said appellants did not in their said grounds of appeal traverse or deny the said respondents' second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth grounds of removal, or any or either of them.

At the hearing of the appeal it was proved by the pauper Ellen Douglas that she was married to the said Charles Douglas, at Twickenham, in the county of Middlesex, on the 1st Nov. 1863; that he was then a bandsman in Her Majesty's 38th Regiment, that he left the said Ellen Douglas at Twickenham on the day following the marriage to join his regiment, which was under orders for India; that immediately afterwards he accompanied his regiment to India, that he never returned to her since, and that he had not been living with her in the respondent union; that she has heard from him twice, both occasions being very shortly after the marriage; that after her husband left her she resided at various places, but that she had resided in the respondent union for the last sixteen months.

Upon this evidence the question for the decision of the court of quarter sessions was, whether the said Ellen Douglas had acquired in the respondent union a status of irremovability.

The appellants relied upon the fact that the said Ellen Douglas had resided in the respondent union for the necessary period to constitute a status of irremovability, and contended that there was no evidence to negative the presumption of her having acquired such status.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the allegations contained in the grounds of removal to the effect that the husband of the said Ellen Douglas was a soldier, and absent from his wife, such allegations not being put in issue by the grounds of appeal, sufficiently negatived the presumption of the said Ellen Douglas having acquired the status of irremovability by showing that she was not in a position to acquire it. It was contended further that the allegation in the grounds of removal, coupled with the evidence of the said Ellen Douglas, sufficiently proved that at the time when the order of removal was made, she was a married woman, and that her husband was absent from her, and was serving Her Majesty as a soldier.

The court of quarter sessions decided that the said Ellen Douglas had acquired a status of irremovability by her residence in the respondent union, there being no evidence that during the time of her residence in the said union the said Charles Douglas was within the exceptions of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, and allowed the appeal, subject to the opinion of the court of Queen's Bench on the following question, namely:

Whether there was any evidence before the court of quarter sessions that the status of irremovability was not acquired. If the court should answer the question in the affirmative, then the order of session is to be quashed, and the order of removal confirmed with costs, including the costs of the appeal to be certified by the clerk of the peace. But if the court should answer the question in the negative, then the order of sessions is to be confirmed with costs, including the costs of the appeal to be certified by the clerk of the peace.

Field, Q. C. and Thesiger in support of the order of removal.—The question is, whether the wife and children of an Irishman, while absent on Her Majesty's service, acquire a status of irremovability after a year's residence. That depends upon the construction to be placed on the proviso in sect. 1 of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, as amended and explained by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111. By sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, persons who have resided for one year (as altered by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1) in the parish are irremovable, the proviso excludes from the computation of the time time passed in service as a soldier, &c.; and then comes a second proviso which, as explained by 11 and 12 Vict. c. 111, is only intended to operate where the husband has acquired a status of irremovability. Thus, in Reg. v. East Stonehouse, 3 E. & B. 596, a marine who was quartered in barracks, at the parish of S., for upwards of five years, in which parish his wife and children during that period resided, were held not to be irremovable. In Reg. v. Mach Hoole, 21 L. J. 1, M. C., an Irishman, who had gained no settlement in England, resided with his family in the respondent parish for more than five years, when the husband deserted them, the wife and children afterwards becoming chargeable, were held properly removable from the respondent parish, Wightman, J. said: "If the husband himself were here he would be removable, and therefore the wife and children are removable." The judgment of Coleridge, J., in Reg. v. St. Ebbe's, 12 Q. B. 142, is to the same effect.

Edward Clarke in support of the order of sessions.—The real question is, whether, upon the evidence, the presumption is not that the husband is dead, the wife, therefore, would be a person irremovable within the meaning of the enacting part of sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that in this case Ellen Douglas was properly removable to the appellant parish, and I come to that conclusion both upon reading sect. 1 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, as amended by the subsequent Act of Parliament (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111), and also upon the authority of the cases cited in the course of the argument. The case of Reg. v. East Stonehouse is directly in point.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question put to us by the quarter sessions is, whether there was any evidence before them that the status of irremovability was not acquired. The evidence is that the woman Ellen Douglas had married a soldier, who went the next day to join his regiment in India, and is still there. Did this absence of her husband, then, prevent Ellen Douglas from acquiring a status of irremovability? That depends upon the construction to be placed on the statutes 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, and the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111. [His Lordship read the sections.] Though this proviso is very inartificially framed, I think the plain meaning of it is that the status of any member of the family shall depend on the status of the head of the family, namely, the husband. If the head of the family would be removable, then the wife and children are also; if the head of the family has acquired a status of irremovability, then I think that the wife and children cannot be removed.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

Licensing—Notice of intention to apply for certificate—When notice must be given—Adjourned general annual licensing meeting—"Before he applies"—32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 7.

The notice of intention to apply for a licensing certificate under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, which sect. 7 of that Act requires to be given by the applicant "twenty-one days at least before he applies," may be given twenty-one days before an adjourned general annual licensing meeting, where the application for a certificate is made at such adjourned meeting, and need not be given twenty-one days before the general annual licensing meeting.

In this case Hannay had obtained a rule calling on the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel them to enter continuances upon the appeal of Thomas Drake, against a decision of the justices at an adjourned general licensing meeting held on the 17th Sept. 1869 for the borough of Halifax, refusing the application of the said Thos. Drake for a certificate under the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27).

The facts as they were set forth on the affidavits were as follow. The general annual licensing meeting for the borough of Halifax was held by the justices on the 20th Aug. 1869. On the 22nd July previously a person named Boocock, the occupier of a house called the Nag's Head, gave a regular notice of his intention to apply for a certificate in respect of the house occupied by him. He applied on the 20th Aug., and application was refused by the justices, on the ground that five years previously he had been guilty of some offence against the Beerhouse Act. The present applicant, Thos. Drake, a few days afterwards, became the occupier of the Nag's Head, and on the 25th Aug. 1869 gave notice of his intention to apply for a certificate in respect of that house at the adjourned general annual meeting which was to take place on the 17th Sept. 1869, by adjournment from that held on the 20th Aug. Drake served a copy of the notice twenty-one days before the 17th Sept. upon the overseers and constable, and a copy of the notice was affixed to the door of the church and of the house, in accordance with the provisions of sect. 7 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27. Drake applied for a certificate at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting on the 17th Sept., but the justices refused his application. He then appealed to the quarter sessions, but the quarter sessions refused to entertain his appeal on the same ground as that on which the justices had refused to grant the certificates, viz., that he should have given notice of his intention to apply twenty-one days before the general annual licensing meeting of the 20th Aug., and that a notice given twenty-one days before the adjourned general annual licensing meeting held on the 17th Sept. was insufficient.

Sect. 5 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 enacts that—

Certificates under this Act shall be granted by the justices assembled at the general annual licensing meeting, held in pursuance of an Act of the session of the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, c. 61, intituled "An Act to regulate the granting of Licences to Keepers of Inns, Alehouses, and Victualling Houses in England," or at some adjournment of such meeting, held in pursuance of the said last-mentioned Act; provided that certificates for licences under the said Acts of the twenty-third year of the reign of Her present Majesty, of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, and of the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh years of Her present Majesty, may be granted by justices of the special sessions for transferring licences.

Sect. 7 enacts that—

Every person intending to apply to the justices for a certificate under the Act shall, twenty-one days at least before he applies, give notice in writing of his intention to one of the overseers of the parish, township, or place in which the house or shop in respect of which his application is to be made is situate, and to some constable or peace officer acting within such parish, township, or place, and shall in such notice set forth his name and address, and a description of the licence or licences for which he intends to apply, and of the situation of the house or shop in respect of which the application is to be made; and in the case of a house or shop not theretofore licensed for the sale by retail of beer, cider, or wine, such person shall also within the space of twenty-eight days before such application is made cause a like notice to be affixed and maintained between the hours of ten in the morning and five in the afternoon of two consecutive Sundays on the door of such house or shop, and on the principal door, or on one of the doors of the church or chapel of the parish or place in which such house or shop is situate, or, if there be no such church or chapel on some other public and conspicuous place within such parish or place. Where application is made to the justices for the grant of a certificate under this Act by way of renewal only, notice in pursuance of this section shall not be requisite.

Waddy showed cause against the rule, and contended that the notice, to be good, should have been given twenty-one days before the general annual licensing meeting of the 20th Aug. 1869. The original Act, 9 Geo. 4 c. 61, by sect. 1, requires the general annual licensing meeting to be held "in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey within the first ten days of the month of March, and in every other county on some day between the 20th Aug. and the 14th Sept., inclusive," and sect. 10 required the notice to be affixed on three several Sundays, "between the first day of January and the last day of February in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, and elsewhere between the first day of June and the last day of July," and the notice to be served on the overseers and constable within the same period. Under that enactment the notice given by the appellant would be bad, and the present Act contains substantially the same provision. —[BLACKBURN, J.—We cannot incorporate the provisions of the Alehouse Act in the present Act.] It is submitted that the same time is intended by both

Acts. Sect. 5 of the present Act speaks of one general annual licensing meeting, which may be held on subsequent days to which it is adjourned; but all sittings are, in contemplation of law, only one day, and, therefore, twenty-one days' notice must be given before the first meeting. [LUSH, J., referred to sect. 3 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, which enacts "that it shall be lawful for the justices acting at the general annual licensing meeting, and they are hereby required to continue such meeting by adjournment to such day or days, and to such place or places within the division or place for which such meeting shall be holden, as such justices may deem most convenient and sufficient for enabling persons keeping inns within such division or place to apply for such licence," in which nothing is said about giving notice, and to sect. 5, which requires notices to be given of the day, hour, and place for holding every adjourned meeting.] The 3rd section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, gives power of adjourning "such meeting;" everything dates from the first day of meeting, and the appellant's notice was therefore, in contemplation of law, given five days after the meeting to which he applied for a licence. Further, an application had been made at the meeting held on the 20th Aug., in respect of the same house, and the justices adjudicated upon it.

Hannay in support of the rule.—The general annual licensing meeting is no doubt only one meeting, but it is held on different days, and is regarded by the Act as a meeting held on different days. Sect. 7 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 only requires an applicant to give twenty-one days' notice "before he applies." If, therefore, he applies at an adjourned meeting he may give his notice twenty-one days before the date of such adjourned meeting, and it will be good. The language of the present Act is markedly different from that of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. That the meeting, though one, is not regarded as held on one day only, is shown by sect. 5 of the present Act, which provides that certificates shall be granted by the justices at the general annual licensing meeting, held in pursuance of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, "or at some adjournment of such meeting," the latter words being superfluous, on the supposition that all was regarded as one day. Before the present Act the appellant need not have given any notice, and the only duty cast on him by the Act is to give twenty-one days' notice "before he applies," which he has done. As to the ground on which the former occupier was refused a licence in respect of this house, it was not for anything which took place in this house, but in another house, and the disqualification was therefore a purely personal one, and not one affecting the house in respect of which the appellant applies.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that in this case the rule should be made absolute, and that the quarter sessions should hear the appeal. The original Licensing Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 61) is incorporated with the present one (a mode of legislation which frequently operates to make persons say what they do not mean), and provides that there shall be a meeting held by the justices on some day between the 20th Aug. and the 14th Sept. Then comes the 3rd section, which is the one on the effect of which this case depends in my mind, and which enacts that "it shall be lawful for the justices acting at the general annual licensing meeting, and they are hereby required to continue such meeting by adjournment to such day or days, and to such place or places within the division or place for which such meeting shall be holden, as such justices may deem most convenient and sufficient for enabling persons keeping inns within such division or place to apply for such licence." Now I am inclined to construe that with a view to what, practically, may well happen, viz., justices sitting for a division many miles in extent. It would be very inconvenient that justices of a great county, say Northumberland, should drag the innkeeper from near Newcastle to near Berwick; and consequently the Act says that the justices shall hold adjourned meetings at such places as they "deem most convenient and sufficient for enabling persons keeping inns within such division or place to apply for such licence." This seems to me to show that it was intended not to make it necessary for innkeepers at either end of counties to come to the first meeting, and ask for licences, but to permit them to wait until the adjourned meetings were held, and the places at which they may apply, are more convenient. Construed in that way, it seems plain that the application may be made at an adjourned meeting. Then we have the new statute, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, which given directions as to the notice thus (sect. 7): "Every person intending to apply to the justices for a certificate under this Act shall, twenty-one days at least before he applies, give notice in writing of his intention to one of the overseers of the parish, township, or place in which the house or shop in respect of which his application is to be made is situate, and to some constable or peace officer acting within such parish, township, or place. . . ." There I agree with Mr. Hannay, who argues that if the Legislature had meant to say "twenty-one days before the general licensing meeting is held," it would have been so expressed. But if I am right in construing the former Act it is not necessary to make the application at that meeting, but at the adjourned meeting; then, if that be so, notice must be given twenty-one days before the adjourned meeting, and it seems to me no hardship or inconvenience can arise from this construction, nor will it in any way defeat the purpose of the Act. Then it will follow that the notice of application in the present case was in time, and all we have to say is, that the quarter sessions shall hear the appeal. They may dismiss it on the merits hereafter. The other objection is, that the former applicant having been refused a certificate at the general meeting this was res judicata; but the complaint was personal to that applicant, and does not affect this applicant at all, and the matter must be considered no longer res judicata, but the quarter sessions will hear on the merits and decide as may be.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. When I find that the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, in its fifth section, referring to licensing meetings to be held under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, says that "certificates shall be granted at those meetings, or at some adjournment" thereof, and when I consider the reasons of the adjournment, I cannot help seeing that it is not an ordinary adjournment of quarter sessions that is contemplated, which only operates on the business then before the court, but that it is intended that original applications shall be made at such adjourned meetings. Therefore, Mr. Hannay brings his client within the terms of this section; he has given twenty-one days' notice before making his application; that seems the only condition imposed by the Legislature, and I entirely agree with my brother Blackburn that there is nothing to prevent an applicant making his application at the adjourned meeting, provided the twenty-one days' notice be given previously. I think the rule should be made absolute.

LUSH, J.—I quite concur, and will only add with regard to the second point that if the magistrates' decision had turned on the unfitness of the character of the applicant or of the house, I should have thought they could not be required to adjudicate again. But their decision was not on that ground. This is analogous to an application to transfer a licence. If the holder of a licence wishes to transfer it to A. B., the magistrates exercise a discretion as to whether they will license the holder of that house.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Wednesday, Nov. 17.

SMITH (app.) v. LANCASTER (resp.)

Tenant of chambers in the Temple—Part of chambers in occupation of under-tenants—Occupier of a house,—The Reform Act (2 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 27.

The appellant held as tenant an entire set of chambers consisting of three rooms not communicating together, and a vestibule into which the rooms respectively opened, in the Temple, under a demise from the benchers. The appellant occupied and used one of these rooms for the purposes of his profession, which was that of a barrister, and demised the other two rooms, unfurnished, each to another barrister respectively. By the lease or agreement between the appellant and each of these under-tenants, the appellant agreed to let the room at the rent of 30*l.*, the rent to include attendance of clerk and laundress, rates, taxes, and coals; there were no poor rates, but the appellant paid all other rates and taxes; no one resided in any part of the chambers:

Held, that the appellant was the occupier of a house within the meaning of the 27*th section of the Reform Act* 1832, and was entitled to a vote for the City of London.

At a court for the revision of voters for the City of London, before the barrister duly appointed to revise the lists of voters for the said city, Christopher Lancaster, of 28, Union-street, Little Moorfields, Cripplegate, on the list of voters for the parish of Saint Giles Without, Cripplegate, duly objected to the names comprised in the schedule hereto of the persons who are hereinafter called the said voters, being retained or inserted as the case might be on the list of persons entitled to vote for the election of members for the city of London in respect of the occupation of chambers; when the barrister decided that the said voters were not entitled to have their names retained or inserted as the case might be in such list.

The said voters having respectively given due notice of their intention to appeal from such decision, and it appearing that the validity of the objections as to the said voters being so retained as aforesaid, depended on a like state of facts, mutatis mutandis, and the same points of law, the barrister declared that the appeals against such decisions ought to be consolidated, and George James Philip Smith, of 55, Gloucester-place, Hyde-park, barrister-at-law, being one of the persons interested, and consenting for or on behalf of himself and all other persons in like manner interested in such appeals, to be the appellant, and to prosecute the said appeal, he named the said George James Philip Smith to be the appellant in such consolidated appeal, and the said Christopher Lancaster to be the respondent.

Whereupon the barrister stated the following case for the opinion of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas at Westminster:

-ge James Philip Smith, hereinafter called the appellant, was on the list of voters for the Inner Temple, in respect of his occupation of chambers, at No. 1, King's Bench Walk, in the Inner Temple.

The appellant held, as tenant, an entire set of chambers, at No. 1, King's Bench Walk aforesaid, so structurally severed from the rest of the building as to be of themselves a house, under a demise from the Benchers of the Inner Temple, the owners thereof, at a yearly rent of 70*l.* These chambers consisted of three distinct rooms, not communicating together, and a vestibule, into which the rooms respectively opened. One of these rooms was occupied by the appellant and used by him in transacting the business that came to him in the exercise of his profession as a barrister.

The appellant demised each of the other two rooms to two persons respectively.

The following is a copy of the lease or agreement for lease entered into by the appellant with one of his tenants:

1, King's Bench Walk, 15th Dec. 1867.

Mr. G. J. P. Smith agrees to let, and Mr. Lister agrees to take, the north back room of these chambers, from the 29th Oct. last, at the rent of 30*l.*, payable quarterly on the 29th Jan., the 29th April, the 29th June, and the 29th Oct. in each year, the rent to include attendance of clerk, laundress, rates, taxes, and coals; the tenancy determinable at any time by either party giving one quarter's notice.

The other agreement was, mutatis mutandis, similar to the above agreement.

The two tenants entered under the said agreement into the occupation and possession of the several rooms so let to them as aforesaid, and used them in transacting the business that came to them in the exercise of their profession as barristers. They had the services of the clerk and laundress who were engaged by the appellant, and were supplied with coals, according to the terms of the agreement.

There are no rates for the relief of the poor in the Inner Temple; but all other rates and taxes were paid by the appellant. No one resided in any part of the said chambers. Both of the rooms so demised as aforesaid were let unfurnished.

The appellant and each of his two tenants had a key to the outer door.

It was not the practice to lock the doors of the rooms, but it was admitted that the tenants had the right to do so at all times.

All other requisites for entitling the appellant to be retained on the list of voters in respect of the above qualification were duly proved.

The appellant claiming to be retained on the list in respect of his occupation as tenant of the entire set of chambers, it was objected that having regard to the above facts the appellant ought to be struck off the list on the ground that, by virtue of the aforesaid demises to his under-tenants, the landlord the appellant had divested himself of all right of occupation of the parts demised, and thereby the tenants had acquired an independent occupation of the parts demised to the exclusion of the appellant.

On the appellant's part it was argued that, notwithstanding the said demise he retained such an occupation of the entire set of chambers as to make him a tenant occupying a house within the meaning of the Act to amend the representation of the people in England and Wales, passed in the second year of the reign of his late Majesty King William IV.

The barrister decided that the objection was good, holding that at law, in the absence of any express reservation to the appellant of some control over or occupation of the parts demised, the sub-tenants, under or by virtue of the aforesaid agreement, acquired an independent occupation, and to the exclusion of the appellant, of their holdings; and that it could not be inferred at law, having regard to the facts hereinbefore stated, and more particularly to the fact that the appellant did not reside, that he retained any occupation of the parts so demised as aforesaid. And the revising barrister accordingly struck off or refused to insert on the register of voters the names of the said voters.

The question upon which the judgment of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas is requested is whether the occupation of the appellant of the said chambers was sufficient to entitle him to have his name retained on the register of voters for the city of London.

Prentice, Q. C. for the appellant.—In the case of Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, argued last year (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 523; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140), it was decided that the tenant of one room, holding under a person in the same position as the appellant here, had no right to a vote; in this case the revising barrister has gone further, and disfranchised the immediate tenant of the society. Bovill, C. J., in his judgment last year, said: "The cases have decided that, where the subject of occupation is structurally severed from the rest of the premises, and substantially used as a separate dwelling, or as a shop, counting-house, or warehouse, the occupier may be registered." The appellant here has the constructive occupation of the whole set of chambers, which constitutes a house within the meaning of the Act of 1832. [BRETT, J.—If this be not an occupation of a house under the 27th section, why should not the appellant be a joint occupier under the 29th section?] It is sufficient for me to rely on the 27th section, and the matter of residence is of no consequence. There is a case in the Queen's Bench, in which, upon an agreement very like this, it was held that a person, although letting some rooms in a house, was the beneficial occupier of the house, so as to be liable for poor rates: (Reg. on the prosecution of the Overseers of St. Michael, Cambridge, v. Henry Smith, L. J. 30, M. C. 74.) Hill, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "We think that we must look, not so much to the words as to the substance of the agreement; and taking the whole together, we think it must be construed, not as a demise of the five rooms, but as an agreement, by which the appellant, retaining possession of these rooms and keeping his servant there, bound himself to supply the other party there with fire and gas, and attendance. It is true that the exclusive enjoyment of the rooms is to be given; but that is the case where a guest in an inn, or a lodger in a house, has a separate apartment, or when a passenger in a ship has a separate cabin, in which case it is clear that the possession remains in the innkeeper, lodging-house keeper, or shipowner." So in Wansey v. Perkins, 8 Scott N. R. 978, where a landlord resided in the house, and a claimant had exclusive occupation of a floor, with a key to the outer door, Tindal, C. J. said: "In this case the landlord remains the occupier of the house." [Stopped by the court.]

F. M. White for the respondent.—I contend that the appellant has failed to make out his right to the franchise upon the facts stated in the case. The premises which he occupies exclusively are only a part of a house. Under the 27th section it is necessary to have the exclusive occupation of a whole house, whilst the necessary inference from these facts is that he has the exclusive occupation only of his own room; he may perhaps be a householder under 11 Geo. 1, c. 13, as decided by Lord Hardwicke in Fludier v. Sir Thos. Lombe, Lee's Cas. 307; but he cannot be an occupier under this section. He is in the same position as the other occupiers of the chambers. [BRETT, J.—The servants are his, and he has the management of the chambers.] In Cook v. Humber, 11 C. B., N. S., 33, Erle, C.J. lays down the principle that the subject of occupation, not the kind of occupation, is the test for forming a judgment upon such a point as this; the appellant cannot here be said to be the exclusive occupier of a whole house, for he is found to have excluded himself from the occupation of part of the house. In the case of R. v. The Inhabitants of St. Nicholas, Colchester, 2 A. & E. 599, it was held that if a person hiring a tenement underlet any part of it, he has not the actual occupation of the tenement within the terms of stat. 1 Will. 4, c. 18, s. 1 if there be any exclusive occupation given by such underletting. The fact that the tenants in this special case had a right to lock their rooms is sufficient to show that the appellant had divested himself of the occupation of those rooms.

BOVILL, C. J.—It is clear that the set of chambers rented by the appellant constituted a house structurally divided within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act 1832; and it is clear that if he kept the whole set of chambers to himself, he would be the occupier within the meaning of that statute. The only question for us now is whether he ceased to be an occupier by letting two of his rooms. It was held by this court last year, in the case of Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, that neither of those tenants could be occupiers of a tenement within this 27th section. The case of Fludier v. Sir Thomas Lombe, Lee's Cases, temp. Lord Hardwicke, 307, shows that persons who are mere lodgers are not joint occupiers, nor do they prevent the landlord from being in the occupation of his house. The question arises, would the appellant be an occupier for the purposes of poor rates? Upon the authority of Reg. v. Smith, 30 L. J. 74, M. C., I am of opinion he would be. And it seems to me that he is also an occupier for the purpose of the franchise. The fact of letting out a portion of a house has never been considered to deprive a person who has the management of the sole occupation; and there is no pretence here that the other persons using these chambers were joint occupiers. The case of Reg. v. St. Nicholas, Colchester, was cited by Mr. White. That case was decided upon the authority of previous decisions, but the reasons for the conclusions were based upon the peculiar language of a particular Act of Parliament, and the circumstances of the actual occupation in that case. Although the court arrived at a decision adverse to the claim of occupation, they referred with approbation to the contention concerning an occupier under different circumstances; that case is, I think, no authority in favour of the respondent's argument here. Consistently with all the decisions, the appellant was the occupier of these premises within the meaning of the 27th section of the Act of 1832, and is entitled to the franchise.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If it were necessary to find special reasons for our judgment, it might be said to be obvious from the business of all the people concerned in this case that, upon an agreement of this kind, the appellant can use the premises as he thinks proper; this document in its practical effect would resemble a licence rather than a lease, so that in popular estimation, as well as in law, the two tenants could not interfere with the sole occupation of the appellant. But the special circumstances are not necessary as a ground for this judgment, because I am of opinion that the letting out a portion of a house does not prevent the occupier of the rest of the house from having a vote, provided that he reserves the mastership of the house and the control of the outer door. The appellant has been found to have retained the general control of his chambers, and I cannot share in the doubts of the revising barrister.

*Poor rate—Appeal—Next quarter sessions—Prohibition—*17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4—27 & 28 Vict., c. 39, s. 1.

A poor rate was made for the parish of A. in the county of B., and published on May 30. On the 11*th of June L. gave notice of objection to the union assessment committee. The committee at its next meeting on the* 30*th of June refused to grant him relief. The Midsummer Quarter Sessions for the county of B. were held on the same day. L. appealed to the Michaelmas Sessions, and the justices allowed the appeal to be entered.*

Held, on a motion for a writ of prohibition against L. and the justices of B. to stay all further proceedings in connection with the appeal, that L. could not be said to have failed to obtain relief from the union assessment committee until June 30, when the committee heard his case, and refused to allow his objections.

Held also, that L. would not have been right in giving notice of appeal to the sessions until he had so failed before the union assessment committee.

Held also, that as L. was, under the circumstances, prevented by the provisions of the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39) from appealing to the Midsummer Sessions, it was not too late for him to appeal to the Michaelmas Sessions.

A poor rate made for the parish of Arlsey, in the county of Bedford, was published on Sunday, May 30, 1869.

On June 11 next, one Lawes gave notice of objection to the union assessment committee. The committee did not hold a meeting from the 30th May until June 30. At this meeting Lawes's case was gone into, but he failed to obtain any relief.

The Midsummer Quarter Sessions for the county of Bedfordshire were also held on the 30th June.

Lawes lived about twenty-five miles from the place where the sessions were held.

At the succeeding Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, Lawes appealed against the rate. It was objected, on behalf of the union assessment committee, that the appellant ought to have appealed to the Midsummer Sessions, these being the next sessions after the publication of the rate; and that, as he had not done so, the sessions ought not to entertain the appeal. The court, however, decided that it was not too late for Lawes to appeal, and accordingly the appeal was then entered and respited.

A rule was granted, on the motion of the respondents, calling on the appellant and the justices of Bedfordshire to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to stay all further proceedings in the matter of the appeal. Against this rule

A. Wills showed cause.—The appellant only took twelve or thirteen days to consider whether he should object to the rate or not. That was a reasonable time. The court of quarter sessions has held it to be reasonable. If he had given notice to the assessment committee earlier, the result would have been the same, and the committee would not have heard his objections any sooner. The Act 12 & 13 Vict., cap. 45, s. 1, requires that fourteen days' clear notice shall be given before appealing to the sessions. It would be absurd to hold that Lawes ought to have given such notice of appeal before his application was rejected by the assessment committee. Then again, by the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 39), s. 1, a person aggrieved is forbidden to appeal to the quarter sessions until he shall have given notice of objection to the assessment committee, and have "failed to have obtained such relief in the matter as he shall deem just." But how can he be said to have failed until he has been decided against? The words in the 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4, mean the next sessions that, under the circumstances, are reasonably practicable. The court of quarter sessions is the proper tribunal to decide which are the next sessions that are reasonably practicable. That court has taken all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and has decided that the Michaelmas Sessions were the next practicable sessions.

Graham in support of the rule. The Acts relating to the union assessment committee do not affect the time of appealing to the quarter sessions. That time is fixed by the 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4, as the next sessions. Under the old law then this appeal would have been too late. The Acts relating to the union assessment committee do not expressly extend the time for appealing to the sessions, and the time for appealing cannot be extended by implication. On the latest day for the appellant to have given notice of his intention to appeal to the sessions, he may have been said to have "failed to obtain relief" from the assessment committee, so as to entitle him to appeal to the sessions. If the committee has not met, then he has failed to obtain relief from it. He cited

R. v. Coode, Cald. 464; 1 Bott. 276;
R. v. Worcestershire (Justices) 5 M. & Selw. 457.

BOVILL, C. J.—It has been plausibly argued in support of this rule that the appellant was bound to lodge his appeal against this rate at the next practicable sessions, independently altogether of the provisions of the Union Assessment Acts; and it is contended that he ought to have appealed to the next sessions, even although he would have had to go there before the assessment committee had pronounced any decision on his objections. But I think that, if we were to hold this law, we should act altogether in defiance of the Union Assessment Act. That Act says that "no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate, unless he shall have given notice of objection to the union assessment committee, and shall have failed to obtain such relief as he shall deem just." It seems to me that this is an express Parliamentary enactment, and prevents a party from appealing to the sessions until he has failed to obtain relief from the union assessment committee. That failure must be, not by reason of the committee not happening to sit, but on its refusal, after hearing, to grant the relief claimed. It is idle to say that this provision was intended to prevent parties from appealing to the sessions. It is true that 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, says that a person aggrieved must appeal to the next sessions, which has been held to mean the next practicable sessions. But if a subsequent statute interposes an intermediate step before the appeal can be made, the first Act must be construed with reference to the second. It is just as though the first statute had said that a party should have a fortnight for appealing, and the second statute had said that he should have a month. The notice to the assessment committee was given on the 11th June, the rate having been published on May 30. The committee held its first meeting on the 30th of June, the same day as the Midsummer Sessions were held. At Michaelmas the court of quarter sessions held that, under the circumstances, the Michaelmas Sessions must be considered the next practicable sessions; and now the parties come here with dates to ask us to reverse this finding. It is difficult to ask us to say that the appellant in this case took more than a reasonable time before taking any step. We have no grounds given us for arriving at such a conclusion, even if we had power to enter into the question. On these grounds I think that this rule ought to be discharged with costs.

KEATING, J.—Mr. Graham shapes his argument in two ways. First he says that the Union Assessment Acts do not affect the time for appealing to the sessions. But it seems to me difficult to think of words that could more clearly prohibit a man from appealing to the sessions until he has been to the assessment committee. Next he says, that if the committee does not assemble in sufficient time after the publication of the rate, and notice of objection given by the person aggrieved, the person aggrieved may be said to have failed to obtain relief within the meaning of the Act. But I think that this is a very wrong construction of the Act. On these grounds I also am of opinion that this rule must be discharged with costs.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Union Assessment Committee Act of 1862 has interposed a kind of intermediate appeal, which, if it gives relief, renders it unnecessary to go to the sessions. In order to prevent parties from going to the sessions until they have failed to get relief from the assessment committee, the Act uses strong prohibitory terms. It is argued that the committee may not meet for some time. We, however, cannot assume that the committee will fail in its duty. If it does not meet within a reasonable time, means may be taken to compel the members to meet, for the Act says that, after such notice, "the committee shall hear," &c. It is, therefore, their duty to fix a reasonable time for meeting after receipt of the notice of objection. Mr. Graham says that the proper course for the present applicant to have taken was to give notice of appeal to the sessions, just as though the Union Assessment Committee Acts had interposed no intermediate step, and then to go to the next (i.e., the Midsummer) sessions, and enter the appeal. But I think that that would have been in direct contravention of the Union Assessment Committee Act. An these grounds, I think that this rule ought to be discharged.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Nov. 10 and 15.

GEORGE AND WIFE v. SKIVINGTON.

Sale to husband for use by the wife of an article compounded by the vendor—Injury to wife from use of article—Action by husband and wife in consequence—Tort to wife arising out of contract with husband—Duty of seller—Warranty—Negligence—Scienter—Pleading.

In an action by J. G. and E. his wife, the declaration alleged that the defendant was a chemist, and professed to sell a chemical compound made of ingredients known only to himself, and which he represented to be fit and proper to be used for washing the hair, and which might be so used without personal injury to the person using it, and to have been carefully, skilfully, and properly compounded by him, and that thereupon the plaintiff J. G. bought of the defendant a bottle of the said compound to be used by the plaintiff E. (the wife), for washing her hair, as the defendant then knew, and on the terms that it was fit and proper to be so used, and could be safely so used by her without personal injury, and had been skilfully, &c. compounded by the defendant. It then alleged that the defendant so unskilfully and negligently conducted himself in and about making and selling the said compound that, through the unskilfulness, negligence, and improper conduct of the defendant in that behalf, the said compound was not fit or proper to be so used, by reason whereof the plaintiff E. (the wife), was injured, and her hair destroyed by using the said compound.

Held, on demurrer, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), that inasmuch as there was a duty on the part of the defendant, as the compounder and seller of the hair wash, towards the wife, for whose use he knew it was purchased by the husband, to use due and reasonable skill and care in compounding and selling it, and damage had arisen to her, not remotely, but directly, by reason of a breach of that duty on the defendant's part, the action was maintainable by the plaintiffs jointly.

Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519; 6 L. J., N. S., 137, Ex.; and Longmeid and Wife v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761; 20 L. J., N. S., 430, Ex., discussed, and the latter distinguished.

This was an action by the plaintiffs, Joseph George and Emma his wife, against the defendant, a chemist, to recover damages in compensation for injuries received by the wife from the use of a hair wash, purchased by them of him for the expressed purpose of being used by the wife, and which proved on trial to be deleterious in its effects upon the head and hair, whereby she received injuries. By the first count of their declaration the plaintiffs charged that the defendant carried on the trade and business of a chemist, and in the course of such business professed to sell a chemical compound made of certain ingredients, known only to the defendant, and which he professed and represented to be fit and proper to be used for washing the hair, and which could and might be so used without personal injury to the person using the same, and to have been carefully and skilfully and properly compounded by him the defendant. And thereupon the plaintiffs, so being husband and wife, bought of the defendant, and the defendant sold to them, at and for a certain price then paid by them to the defendant, a bottle of the said compound to be used by the plaintiff Emma, then and still being the wife of the said Joseph George, for washing her hair, as the defendant then knew, and on the terms that the same then was fit and proper to be so used, and could be safely used by her by the purpose aforesaid without personal injury to her, and that it had been skilfully, carefully, and properly compounded by the defendant; yet the defendant had so unskilfully, negligently, and improperly conducted himself in and about the making and selling the said compound, that by and through the mere unskilfulness, carelessness, negligence, and wrongful and improper conduct of the defendant in that behalf, the said compound was not fit or proper to be used for washing the hair, nor could it be so used without personal injury to the person using the same, by reason of which premises, and of the mere unskilfulness, carelessness, negligence, and wrongful and improper conduct of the defendant in that behalf, the plaintiff

Emma, then and still being the wife of the plaintiff Joseph George, who used the said compound for washing her hair, pursuant to and according to the terms upon and for which the same was so sold by the defendant, was, by so using the same, injured in health, and suffered pain and inconvenience from so using the same, and her hair was destroyed and injured, and she was and is otherwise injured.

The defendant demurred to this count of the declaration, on the ground that it failed to show any neglect of duty by the defendant in respect of the plaintiff Emma.

Joinder in demurrer by the plaintiffs.

The points for argument on the part of the defendant were—first, that the first count fails to show any breach of duty committed by the defendant in respect of the plaintiff Emma; secondly, that the count is defective for failing to show that the defendant knew of the deleterious nature of the compound; thirdly, that the contract stated in the first count of the declaration is one for a breach of duty, for which the husband alone could sue; fourthly, that a contract of sale cannot legally take place to a husband and wife jointly.

The following were the points for argument on the part of the plaintiffs—first, that a husband and wife may sue on a contract touching the person of the wife, as on a contract to carry the wife's person, or for medical treatment, and the contract declared on is of this class; secondly, the purchase of the hair wash as properly prepared for application, related to the original preparation and raised the same duty of the defendant towards the plaintiffs as if they had employed him to prepare it for such purpose.

Lord, for the defendant, in support of the demurrer to the declaration, argued that the first point was, whether or not there was any duty on the defendant, independently of contract; and he contended that the first count showed no duty on the part of the defendants towards the wife, independently of the contract, and that she need not have been joined. The allegation in the count was a contract of sale to the plaintiff and his wife. There was no duty here as in the case of a medical man. A common ordinary tradesman does not hold himself out to be skilful. The husband may sue alone for any injury done to his wife, but they cannot jointly sue as on a duty in the defendant unless it is shown that the defendant knew that the article was not what it purported to be. Independently of contract, there was here no misfeasance towards the wife. It is essential that deceit on the defendant's part should be alleged and proved, e. g., that he had knowledge of the unfitness for use of the article compounded. [CLEASBY, B. refers to Langridge v. Levy, 2 M. & W. 519; 6 L. J., N. S., 137, Ex.] In that case knowledge was alleged and proved, and judgment was given for the plaintiff there on that very ground, the defendant being held liable for the injury caused to the plaintiff, the son, by the bursting of the gun, upon the express and sole ground that he knew its dangerous condition when he sold it to the plaintiff's father for the use of the plaintiff. But here there is no allegation of knowledge on the defendant's part of the injurious properties of this hairwash. How then can he be held liable for damage received by its use by a third person, a stranger to the contract? So in Longmeid and Wife v. Holliday (also in this court), 6 Ex. 761; 20 L. J., N. S., 430, Ex., it was held that a tradesman, who contracts with an individual for the sale to him of an article to be used for a particular purpose by a third person, was not, in the absence of fraud, liable for injury caused to such person by some defect in the construction of the article. There is no principle of law that a tradesman has a duty to a purchaser independently of contract. No doubt, as a chemist, the defendant might be liable for carelessness in putting up a prescription; but as a chemist he is not responsible for a hairwash sold over the counter in the ordinary way. [PIGOTT, B.—He professes to make this wash from "ingredients known only to himself," and represents it to be fit for use, and it turns out to be a poison, and destroys the woman's hair.] In Langridge v. Levy, in the Exchequer Chamber, 4 M. & W. 337; 7 L. J., N. S., 387, Ex., Lord Denman, C. J., delivering the judgment of that court, affirming that of the court below, does so expressly on the ground stated below by Parke, B., in this court, "that, as there is fraud and damage, the result of that fraud, not from an act remote and consequential, but one contemplated by the defendant at the time as one of its results, the party guilty of the fraud is responsible to the party injured." Holliday's case shows there is no right of action by a stranger to the contract unless that stranger show knowledge or fraud on the defendant's part. Again, there is no implied warranty that an article sold in the ordinary way is fit for the purpose for which it is sold. That was so held in a recent case n this court with respect to meat, where it was decided that there was no implied warranty of its fitness for human food: (Emmerton v. Matthews, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 681; 31 L. J. 139, Ex; 7 H. & N. 586.) [CHANNELL, B. refers to Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109; 11 L. J., N. S., 415, Ex., in which Lord Abinger, C. B., at p. 115 of 10 M. & W., discussing the question of duty in such cases, says: "There is also a class of cases in which the law permits a contract to be turned into a tort; but unless there has been some public duty undertaken, or public nuisance committed, they are all cases in which an action might have been maintained upon the contract.] Negligence, in these cases, must be either with regard to contract or with regard to public duty. He referred also to the judgment of Lord Cairns, L. C. in Macfarlane v. Taylor, in the House of Lords, L. Rep. 1 Scotch App. 245.

J. P. Ingham, contra, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon to support the declaration.

The court having suggested an amendment of the declaration, it was agreed by the learned counsel on both sides that it should be amended by striking out the allegation of a joint purchase of the wash by the husband and wife, and stating it to have been bought by the husband alone, for the purpose of being used by the wife. This amendment being taken as made, the learned Barons proceeded to give judgment on the demurrer as follows:

KELLY, C. B.—The declaration being amended, it now stands as a contract and purchase by the plaintiff Joseph George alone, of the article in question for the use of his wife, and I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment of the court. The facts as stated in the declaration are, that the defendant carried on the business of a chemist, and in the course of such business professed to sell a chemical compound made of ingredients known only to himself, and which he professed and represented to be fit and proper to be used as a wash for the hair, without personal injury to the person using the same, and to have been carefully, skilfully, and properly compounded by him, and it is then stated that thereupon the plaintiff, the husband, purchased this article of the defendant at a certain price, for the purpose of its being used by his, the plaintiff's, wife for washing her hair, upon the express terms that it was fit and proper to be so used, and could be safely used for that purpose without personal injury to the person so using it. The defendant, then, it appears, had sold this article for a particular purpose which was known to him at the time he so sold it, namely, for use as a hair wash by the plaintiff's wife. The declaration then proceeds to allege that the defendant so unskillfully, negligently, and improperly conducted himself in and about making and selling the said compound, that by reason of such unskilfulness, negligence, and improper conduct of the defendant, the said compound was not fit or proper to be used for washing the hair, nor could it be so used without producing personal injury to the person using it. And it then goes on to allege that by reason of such unskilfulness, carelessness, and improper conduct of the defendant in that behalf, the plaintiff's wife, who used the said compound for washing her hair, pursuant to the terms upon which the same was so sold by the defendant to the plaintiff, was, by using the same, injured in health, and suffered pain, and her hair was destroyed. It has been urged, and was contended, on the part of the defendant, first of all that there was here no warranty, express or implied; but it is unnecessary to enter into that question, as it does not arise in the present case, for here there was a purchase by the plaintiff from the defendant of this hair wash, and the purpose for which it was bought and to which it was going to be applied, was known to the defendant, the compounder of it, at the time he sold it. The question is, whether a tradesman who sells an article for a particular purpose, and which article he has professed to compound himself for that purpose, has not a duty imposed on him by law to be careful in the compounding and selling it. I think that every one who compounds and sells an article to be used for a particular purpose is bound, and has a duty cast upon him, to compound it with due care and ordinary skill, and in such a way and with such materials, that the use of it by the person buying it, or for whom it is bought, shall not be productive of personal injury. Here there is an allegation of the absence of such care and skill. The case of Langridge v. Levy (ubi sup.), which has been cited and referred to during the argument, is important as bearing upon a further question which has been raised here, namely, whether the onus, which is imposed by law upon the compounder and vendor of an article towards the person purchasing it and using it, applies also to a third person who is not the purchaser, but who happens to be the person for whom it was bought, and who uses the article, and is injured by so using it. For instance, where an article is bought by A. for the purpose of its being used by B., does the duty which is on the seller extend in such a case to B.? I am of opinion that it does. In Langridge v. Levy there was no contract between the plaintiff and defendant, but the latter knew that the father bought the gun for his son's (the plaintiff's) use; and in the present case the defendant was aware that the wash was bought by the plaintiff for his wife's use in washing her hair, and that is stated and alleged in the declaration. I think, therefore, that a duty arose on the part of the defendant here, knowing as he did at the time of the sale of the article that it was bought for the purpose of being used as a wash for the hair, to use due care and skill in compounding it, so that it should be fit for the purpose of being so used, and that it might be so used with safety; and I am of opinion that that duty extends not only to the actual purchaser of the article but also to the person for whom it was bought. There is an allegation of carelessness, negligence, and unskilfulness, and under these circumstances I am of opinion that there was a duty on the defendant which has been violated by him, and that he is, as the seller of the article, liable, since he knew the purpose for which it was expressly purchased. In the lamp case (Longmeid and wife v. Holliday, ubi sup.), there was neither breach of warranty, negligence, nor breach of duty. It is, therefore, quite a different case. My brother Channell, who has just left the court, has desired me to say that he concurs with the rest of the court in their view of the present case.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. The count in the declaration demurred to in this case is founded on a charge of negligence of duty on the part of the defendant, as a chemist, in compounding and selling an article for a particular purpose. Had the article been bought by the husband for his own use, and the action been brought by him alone, it cannot be doubted that it would have been maintainable. Then, if the article be purchased by the husband for his wife's use, and that was known to the defendant, I cannot see how it can be reasonably suggested that the defendant's duty is not the same. If a father takes a prescription, intended for himself, to a chemist and has it put up, and then, instead of taking the medicine himself, gives it to his young child, who is injured by taking medicine which is too strong for him, the chemist, in that case, would incur no blame or responsibility, he having been led to suppose that the medicine was for the father's use. But those circumstances would be altogether different from those of the present case. It would be a monstrous thing to say that a married woman, receiving an injury in this manner, could have no remedy for the damage done to her. I think the defendant's duty extended to the wife, and that she can recover for a direct damage done to her, joining her husband in the action for conformity's sake.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the declaration shows a good cause of action on the part of the wife. Taking the contract by itself, no person can sue on it but a party to it. Langridge v. Levy is in point. That objection was taken there, and the answer to it was that there was fraud. There is a complete analogy between that case and the present one, putting the fraud in the former case for the negligence in the latter. The only question is, whether the facts raise a duty in the defendant to use due and reasonable care in compounding the article which he represented to be fit and proper for use, and capable of being used by the wife without injury to her. The moment that that duty arises, there is a clear case of negligence here on the defendant's part in a matter in which there was a duty, and an injury directly, and not remotely, arising from that negligence to the wife. It appears to me to be a case very similar to Langridge v. Levy.

County Court appeal—Notice to produce—Sufficiency of —Costs of appeal.

The plaintiff brought an action in the City of London Court to recover "Twelve months' rent for the year 1866, and ten shillings arrears of rent due previously to Jan. 1866," of a room let by him to the defendant, under an alleged agreement, said to be constituted by two letters, the one from plaintiff to defendant, dated 27*th June* 1865, the other an alleged answer thereto, dated 29*th June* 1865. Notice was served on the defendant to produce at the hearing "All letters received by you (the defendant) from the plaintiff, relating to your tenancy of a room let to you by the plaintiff, and, in particular, a letter in or about Jan. 1866, relating to deductions you were authorised to make from the rent on paying the same." At the trial, the plaintiff having produced the defendant's letter of the 29th June, the learned commissioner of the court ruled that the above notice was insufficient for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to give secondary evidence of the contents of his letter of the 27th June, on its non-production by the defendant, and accordingly nonsuited the plaintiff:

Held, on appeal, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.) that the ruling of the learned commissioner was wrong, and that the notice was a good and sufficient notice for the production of the letter of 27th June, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to judgment and to a new trial:

Held, also, that, without laying down any general rule on the subject, the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the appeal, it being a matter in the discretion of the court under the particular circumstances of each case.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff below to the Court of Exchequer, from a decision of the judge of the City of London Court, Mr. Commissioner Kerr, nonsuiting the plaintiff under the following circumstances:—

The action came on for trial, at the City of London Court, on the 12th April last, and the particulars of the plaintiff's demand stated that, "the plaintiff, John Charles Conybeare, of 2, Cook's-court, Serle-street, Lincoln's-inn, claims 21*l.* 10*s.* from Mr. Thomas Farries, of Mr. Laxton's, 1, Child's-place, Temple Bar, for twelve month's rent of chambers at 5, Essex-court, Temple, for the year 1866, and for 10*s.* arrears of rent due previously to Jan. 1866, making together 21*l.* 10*s.*"

On the 17th March 1869, the plaintiff duly served upon the defendant a notice to produce in the following terms:—

Take notice, that you are required to produce to the court, on the hearing of this cause, all letters received by you, the defendant, from the plaintiff relating to your tenancy of a room let to you by the plaintiff, which are in your possession or power, and in particular a letter received by you from the plaintiff in or about Jan. 1866 (relating to certain deductions which you were authorised to make from the rent on paying the same), and which letter you produced in evidence on the 8th inst.; also all copies of letters written by you relating to the said tenancy; also all agreements and copies of agreements relating to the said tenancy which are in your possession or power.

When the cause came on for hearing on the 12th April 1869, the plaintiff stated that he sought to recover 21*l.* for twelve months' rent of a room let by him to the defendant under an alleged agreement, which was said to be constituted by two letters, the first being a letter dated on or about the 27th June 1865, from the plaintiff to the defendant, and the other being, as alleged, an answer thereto, dated the 29th June 1865.

The plaintiff having produced the letter of 29th June 1865 from the defendant to him, called upon the defendant to produce the alleged letter of 27th June 1865 from the plaintiff, in order, on the defendant's failing to produce the same, to give secondary evidence of the contents thereof.

The defendant's counsel objected that the said notice to produce was insufficient, and the judge, being of that opinion, refused to receive secondary evidence of the contents of the said letter. And the plaintiff thereupon elected to be nonsuited.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer is whether the judge ought to have admitted the secondary evidence or not.

The following are the plaintiff's points for argument:—1. That the notice to produce set out in the case was a sufficient notice to the defendant to produce the plaintiff's letter, dated on or about the 27th June 1865, and mentioned in the said case, and that on the nonproduction of the said letter by the defendant the plaintiff was entitled to give secondary evidence thereof. 2. That the general part of the notice whereby the defendant was required to produce all letters received by the defendant from the plaintiff "relating to your tenancy of a room let to you by the plaintiff" was sufficient notice to produce the particular letter, since it does not appear that the defendant had ever rented any other room from the plaintiff, except the room the rent of which is expressly claimed by the plaintiff's particulars of demand, which particulars show the defendant what room was meant. 3. That the general part of the notice requiring the defendant to produce "all agreements relating to the said tenancy" was a sufficient notice to produce the letter by which the plaintiff offered and agreed to let the premises, the rent of which was the subject-matter of the plaintiff's claim, and which letter, coupled with the defendant's reply and acceptance constituted the tenancy referred to in the notice as "Your tenancy of a room let to you by the plaintiff." 4. That the particulars of the plaintiff's demand of 21*l.* 10*s.*, set out in the case (which particulars expressly limit the demand to "twelve months' rent of chambers at 5, Essex-court, Temple, for the year 1866, and for arrears of rent due previously to Jan. 1866") coupled with the defendant's knowledge of the fact that he never rented any chambers from the plaintiff, except the said particular room at Essex-court, Temple, and that the defendant never rented any room from the plaintiff till after Midsummer 1865, sufficiently pointed out to the defendant that all the letters and agreements which he was required to produce must have been written between the summer of 1865 and the close of 1866, and that the particular letter, or other documents, constituting the original agreement of letting must have been dated about Midsummer 1865. 5. That the notice to produce, while particularising one single letter (the date of which had become known to the plaintiff from its having been produced in court by the defendant nine days before the date of the notice), distinguished such letter from the letters constituting, and from, the "agreements relating to the said original tenancy" (commenced in 1865), by pointing out the date of such letter as of 1866, and by further describing it as merely relating to "certain deductions" which the defendant was "authorised to make from the rent," arrears of which, due before the commencement of 1866, are expressly mentioned in the particulars of the plaintiff's claim.

C. S. Bowen for the appellant.—The point is whether the notice which was served on the defendant, calling on him to produce at the hearing of the action in the City of London Court "all letters, &c., relating to his tenancy," was or not a sufficient notice so far as it related to the production of a particular letter, viz., that of the 27th June 1865, mentioned in the case, so as to entitle the plaintiff, on its non-production, to give secondary evidence of its contents. It is contended on the plaintiff's part that it was a good and sufficient notice for that purpose, and that its generality was not limited by the specific mention of the letter of Jan. 1866. (He was stopped by the court, who called on) a notice to produce is to set out, and bring to the attention of the party served with it, the particular documents required. This notice, like all other such documents, must be taken in connection with the claim. It is clear that it does not refer to the creation of the tenancy in 1865. It says, "relating to your tenancy" generally, and then it goes on to expressly particularise one letter only, and that is a letter dated Jan. 1866, relating to certain deductions the defendant was authorised to make from his rent upon paying it. The claim is for a year's rent in 1866. The effect, therefore, of the notice was such as obviously to direct the attention of any reasonable man. not to the letters at the time of the creation of the tenancy at Midsummer 1865, but to letters in 1866, relating to deductions or allowances from the rent for that year. Had the notice been entirely general in its terms, the defendant might well have been puzzled by it; but when it goes on to specify the particular letter of Jan. 1866, he might legitimately and reasonably suppose that it could have no reference to a letter of June 1865. It is submitted, therefore, that the notice is bad, and that the ruling of the learned commissioner was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KELLY, C.B.—I am clearly of opinion that this notice was a good and sufficient notice for the purpose of the production by the defendant at the trial of the letter in question, namely, that written by the plaintiff to the defendant on the 27th June 1865. The object of such a notice is to inform the party what documents he is required to produce. Here the notice is clear and precise, "You are required to produce all letters received by you, the defendant, from the plaintiff relating to your tenancy of a room let to you by the plaintiff, which are in your possession or power;" together also with, as it proceeds to specify, a particular letter relating to certain deductions from the rent. Looking, too, at the very recent period at which the first letter, which is the one required to be produced, was written, it would be unreasonable to suppose that the defendant could have been puzzled or mistaken with regard to the necessity for its production. I think the learned commissioner of the court below was wrong, and that our judgment should be in favour of the appellant; and that he is entitled to a new trial.

CHANNELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

PIGOTT, B.—I also am of the same opinion. Of what use would it be to give a defendant notice to produce all letters and documents in his possession relating to a particular matter, if it were requisite also to go into details and to give the dates and particulars of all of them.

CLEASBY, B. concurred.

Bowen then, for the appellant, applied for the costs of the appeal, on the authority of the case in the Common Pleas of Shroder v. Ward, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 825; 13 C. B., N. S., 410; 32 L. J. 150, C. P. No doubt in a prior case in the Exchequer of Gee and others v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 6 H. & N. 211; 30 L. J. 11, Ex., this court held that, where, on an appeal from a County Court or the City of London Court, a new trial is ordered on the ground of misdirection, the court would not give costs to the successful appellant; but the Court of Common Pleas, in the subsequent case first above mentioned, after having taken time to consider the point, and having had the decision of this court in Gee v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company brought to their notice, laid down and acted on a directly contrary rule, and held that an appellant from a decision of the County Court who succeeded in his appeal, was in all cases, except under substantially exceptional circumstances, entitled to the costs of the appeal, even though a new trial might have been obtained on the ground of misdirection: (See the judgment of the court, delivered by Willes, J., at p. 414 of 13 C. B., N. S.) It was most desirable that the practice of all the courts in this matter should be the same.

Kemp, for the respondent contra (being called on), must leave the matter in the hands of the court. At the same time, he contended that there was nothing to take the present case out of the ordinary rule of practice which had prevailed in this court. But, at any rate, a new trial having been directed, the justice of the case would be fairly met by ordering that the costs of this appeal should abide the event of such new trial.

KELLY, C. B.—I think the appellant should have his costs of this appeal. In expressing that opinion I do not at all mean to lay down any general rule on the subject. I do not either adopt to its full extent the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case which Mr. Bowen has cited of Shroder v. Ward, nor do I mean for a moment to say anything against it. I think it is a matter which depends upon the discretion of the court under the particular circumstances of each case.

ERRORS FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

(Before KELLY, C. B., CHANNELL, B., MELLOR, J., PIGOTT and CLEASBY, BB.)

TEBB v. HODGE AND ANOTHER.

Agreement for a lease and a mortgage—Money advanced on the security of premises and fixtures—Equitable mortgagee.

The plaintiff entered into an agreement with one Barrows to grant him a lease of premises at a certain rent for twenty years upon certain conditions; Barrows agreeing to pay 1000l. on the granting of the lease, and to fit up the premises to plaintiff's satisfaction within a certain time. Upon payment of the consideration money, the premises being fitted up as aforesaid, the plaintiff undertook to grant the said lease with covenants mentioned. And it was further provided that the plaintiff should lend Barrows upon the security "of the said premises so fitted up," 1000l. for two years. Barrows entered into possession and duly put up the fixtures, but at his desire no lease was granted, and no money was paid; Barrows became bankrupt, and under an order of the Bankruptcy Court his assignee, one of the defendants, severed and removed the fittings:

Held, affirming the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in an action to recover the fittings, that there was an equitable contract between the plaintiff and Barrows by which the premises, together with the fixtures, had become plaintiff's security for the 1000l. advanced by him; that the plaintiff was in the position of an equitable mortgagee; and that the defendant, the assignee, had no right to the fixtures.

This was an appeal under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, against the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in discharging a rule of that court obtained by the defendants to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for them upon points reserved at the trial.

The declaration in the action was as follows:

1st count: For that the defendants broke and entered the plaintiff's house called the Gray's-inn Restaurant, No. 19, High Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, and broke to pieces, damaged and destroyed the same, and severed, removed, and carried away the fixtures of the plaintiff therein, that is to say, tavern and luncheon bar fittings, &c., and converted the same to the defendants' own use, and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession thereof.

2nd count.—And for that the defendants converted to their own use and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of his goods (to wit), goods of the same description as the articles in the first count mentioned.

3rd count.—And for that heretofore (to wit) on the 18th Dec. 1867, the plaintiff being lawfully possessed of the premises in the agreement hereinafter mentioned, an agreement was made and entered into between the plaintiff and Joseph Grimes Barrows as follows, that is to say:

Agreement made the 18th Dec. 1867 between Robert Palmer Tebb, of 139, Cheapside, gentleman, of the one part, and Joseph Grimes Barrows, of 20, Park-place West, Liverpool-road, in the county of Middlesex, wine and spirit merchant, of the other part, whereby the said Robert Palmer Tebb agrees to grant, and the said Joseph Grimes Barrows to take, a repairing lease of the Gray's-inn Restaurant, No. 19, High Holborn, comprising the ground-floor, basement, with the kitchen and scullery under Gray's-inn chambers, the pantry or larder in the yard, the coal cellar adjoining, water closets in the area, and the joint use, with other tenants, of the adjoining premises for the time being, of the said Robert Palmer Tebb, his executors, administrators, or assigns, of the back area and yard, at the clear net rent of 370l. per annum: also the small office on the ground floor in Gray'inn-chambers (previously occupied by Mr. Holloway), and the two rooms or offices on the third floor over the Gray's-inn Restaurant, at the clear net rent of 80l. per annum, for the term of twenty years from the 24th June 1866, less the last fourteen days thereof, upon the following conditions: The said Joseph Grimes Barrows agrees to pay the said Robert Palmer Tebb, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of 1000l. on the granting of the above lease of the above-described premises, being the consideration for the same, also to fit up the said premises forthwith in a substantial and appropriate manner as a first-class luncheon bar and restaurant, such fittings to be of the value of 500l. at least, and to be completed to the satisfaction of the said Robert Palmer Tebb, his executors, administrators, or assigns, on or before the 11th Feb. next, and in this respect time shall be of the essence of the contract. And upon payment of the said consideration-money, the said premises being fitted up as aforesaid, the said Robert Palmer Tebb, his executors, administrators, or assigns will grant the said lease, such lease and counterpart to be prepared by the solicitor of the said Robert Palmer Tebb, at the expense of the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, and to contain similar covenants to those in the original lease, under which the said Robert Palmer Tebb holds the said premises, and also a covenant for the lessee not to underlet or assign the said premises, or any part thereof, without the consent, in writing, of the said Robert Palmer Tebb, his executors, administrators, or assigns, first had and obtained. And further, that the said Joseph Grimes Barrows shall not do, or suffer to be done, anything that shall be, or grow to be, an annoyance to the adjoining tenants, nor anything that shall endanger or entail the withdrawal of the licence of the said premises by the magistrates. (The agreement also contained provisions as to payment of rent, insurance, rates, and taxes.) And the said Robert Palmer Tebb agrees to lend or obtain for the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, upon security of the said premises so fitted out and licensed, the sum of 1000l. for the term of two years from Christmas 1867, at 5 per cent. per annum interest; the said Joseph Grimes Barrows to have the option of repaying the said mortgage and interest at any earlier period, by giving six months' notice, or on payment of three months' additional interest in lieu of notice. And it is also provided that if the lessee shall assign or underlet the said premises before the expiration of the said two years, it is agreed that the said mortgage of 1000l., with interest thereon, shall be paid off and discharged. And it is hereby mutually agreed by and between the said parties that if the said Joseph Grimes Barrows shall fail to carry out all or any of the stipulations and conditions herein contained, or should the rent remain unpaid beyond fifteen days from any quarter day, or should the said premises not be fitted up in the manner and within the time hereinbefore stated, or should the same become vacant or otherwise discontinued, or not be conducted in the ordinary way as a respectable restaurant and luncheon bar, then, in each or any of such cases it shall be lawful for the said Robert Palmer Tebb to enter and take possession of the premises without the necessity of any formal process at law, in as full and complete a manner as if this agreement had never been entered into. As witness the hands of the said parties the day and year first hereinbefore written.

And the plaintiff then delivered possession of the said premises in the said agreement mentioned to the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, under and by virtue of the said agreement; and he entered into the said premises, and became and was possessed thereof under and by virtue of the said agreement as tenant thereof to the plaintiff, the reversionary estate and interest therein, subject to the said tenancy then belonging to the plaintiff; and the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, under and by virtue of the said agreement, and in performance thereof on his part, fitted up the said premises in a substantial and appropriate manner as a first-class luncheon bar and restaurant, with divers appropriate and substantial fittings of great value (to wit) of the value of 1000l.; and afterwards, and whilst the said Joseph Grimes Barrows was so possessed of the said premises, and during his tenancy, and whilst plaintiff was so entitled to the reversion of and in the said premises, fixtures, and fittings, subject to the said tenancy of the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, under the said agreement, the defendants wrongfully severed and removed the said fixtures, and carried away and converted the same to their own use, and in so doing broke to pieces, damaged, and destroyed divers parts of the said house and premises, whereby plaintiff was greatly injured, prejudiced, and aggrieved in his said reversionary estate and interest in the said premises, fixtures, and fittings; and the said fixtures and fittings became and were wholly lost to him; and the said house and premises were much lessened in value to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was and is otherwise injured.

And the plaintiff claims 1000l.

The following were the pleas: 1. Not guilty. 2, 3, and 4. Traverses of the plaintiff's property in the house and fixtures and goods. 5. And for a further plea as to so much of the third count as complains of the defendant's severing, removing, carrying away, and converting the said fixtures and fittings, the defendants say that the plaintiff had no such interest in the said fixtures and fittings as alleged. 6. And, for a further plea, the defendants say that before any of the said times when, &c., the said Joseph Grimes Barrows became and was duly adjudged bankrupt under and by virtue of the statute in such case made; and at the time he so became bankrupt he had, by the consent and permission of the plaintiff, the true owner thereof, in his possession, order, and disposition divers goods and chattels (to wit) the alleged fixtures in the first count mentioned, and the goods in the second count mentioned, and the alleged fixtures and fittings in the 3rd count mentioned, whereof he was reputed owner, and whereof he had taken upon himself the sale, alteration, and disposition as owner. And the Court of Bankruptcy, duly authorised in that behalf, then duly ordered the same to be sold and disposed of for the benefit of the creditors of the said bankrupt under the said bankruptcy; and thereupon the defendant, David Hodge, then being the assignee of the estate and effects of the said Joseph Grimes Barrows under the said bankruptcy, the defendant Frederick Cutten, as his servant and by his command, sold and disposed of the said goods and chattels for the benefit of the said creditors, under the said bankruptcy, under and in pursuance of the said order, and in so doing necessarily and unavoidably did what is complained of, doing no more than necessary and lawful in that behalf, which are the supposed trespasses and grievances in the declaration mentioned.

The plaintiff joined issue on the defendant's pleas.

The following is a statement of the case.

The plaintiff is an auctioneer or estate agent, at 139, Cheapside; the defendant Hodge is a gas chandelier manufacturer, carrying on an extensive business at 100 and 101, Hatton-garden, Middlesex, and is the assignee of one Joseph Grimes Barrows, a bankrupt. The defendant Cutten is an auctioneer, at 81, Basinghall-street, in the City of London.

On the 18th Dec., 1867, the agreement set forth in the third count of the declaration was made and entered into between the plaintiff, of the one part, and Joseph Grimes Barrows, of 20, Park-place West, Liverpool-road, in the county of Middlesex, wine and spirit merchant, of the other part.

The said Joseph Grimes Barrows took immediate possession of the premises at 19, High Holborn, in the said agreement mentioned, and known as the Gray's Inn Restaurant.

At the time the said Joseph Grimes Barrows took possession of the said premises, the same had been recently rebuilt by the plaintiff, and the said Joseph Grimes Barrows immediately proceeded to fit the same up with fixtures—including those which are the subject of this action—as a restaurant, in pursuance of the terms contained in the said agreement.

The lease in the said agreement mentioned was not executed, nor was the consideration of 1000*l.* in part paid for the same, nor was a sum of 1000*l.*, or any sum, in fact, advanced by the plaintiff to the said Joseph Grimes Barrows; but, after the said Joseph Grimes Barrows had fitted up the said premises, the plaintiff at his request inspected the same, and expressed his satisfaction, and told Barrows that he was ready to grant him the lease whenever required, and the plaintiff asked Barrows to take up the lease. Barrows replied, that he did not wish to take it up just then, as he could deposit the agreement as a security. At the request of Barrows the plaintiff wrote him a letter.

Afterwards Barrows applied to the plaintiff for liberty to assign the agreement by way of mortgage; but the plaintiff refused his consent till the lease had been taken up. The plaintiff consented to the agreement being deposited as a security, subject to his claim of 1000*l.* Barrows never paid any rent.

On the 15th April 1868, the said Joseph Grimes Barrows was adjudicated a bankrupt upon a creditor's petition.

On the 5th May 1868, the defendant Hodge was appointed creditor's assignee of the estate and effects of the said bankrupt, of which he immediately proceeded to take possession.

The only estate given up by the bankrupt to his assignee, was the goods, fixtures, fittings, stock in trade and effects, on the premises at 19, High Holborn, and an application was made to the Court of Bankruptcy for an order under section 125 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849.

This order was granted, and was in the words and figures following:

IN THE LONDON COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

In the matter of Joseph Grimes Barrows, of High Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, licensed victualler, bankrupt.

Before Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN.

Whereas the above-named Joseph Grimes Barrows was adjudged bankrupt by this court upon a petition duly filed, and whereas David Hodge is the assignee duly appointed and chosen of the estate and effects of the said bankrupt. Now upon the application of John Evans, solicitor of the said assignee, and upon reading the affidavit of the said John Evans, sworn on the 18th May 1868, and the proceedings herein, the court doth find that at the time when the same Joseph Grimes Barrows became bankrupt, he had, by consent and permission of Robert Palmer Tebb, who claims to be the true owner thereof, in the possession, order, and disposition of him the said Joseph Grimes Barrows, the goods, chattels, fixtures, fittings, and effects mentioned in the catalogue marked A, and being in, upon, or about the premises 19 and 20, High Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, known as the Gray's Inn Restaurant, of which goods, chattels, fixtures, fittings, and effects the said Joseph Grimes Barrows was the reputed owner. And the court doth order that the same be sold and disposed of by the said assignee, for the benefit of the creditors of the said Joseph Grimes Barrows.

W. HAZLITT, Acting Commissioner.

The defendant Cutten examined the said goods, fixtures, fittings, and effects at Nos. 19 and 20, High Holborn aforesaid, and caused a catalogue of the same to be prepared, and advertised them to be sold by auction on the 20th May 1868.

Immediately upon the sale being advertised the plaintiff caused to be served upon the defendants a notice to the effect that he claimed the lots numbered 1 to 21 inclusive, and lots 128, 129, and 131 in the said catalogue, and cautioning the defendants not to sell the same.

The defendants nevertheless sold the whole of the lots.

The order of the Court of Bankruptcy authorising the defendant Hodge to sell was read at the sale, in the presence of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff himself bought all the fixtures, viz., lots 1 to 21, and the same were never severed. The other fixtures and fittings were sold by defendants, to be severed, and were purchased by different purchasers, and severed by such purchasers from the premises.

The defendant Hodge paid rent of the said premises up to March 1868. He afterwards renounced the agreement for a lease, pursuant to sect. 131 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, and delivered up the key of the premises to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then brought this action to recover the value of the fixtures claimed by him, and also damages for the trespass to the premises, and for alleged injuries to his reversion.

This action was tried at Westminster Hall on the 28th Nov. 1868, before Mr. Justice Montague Smith and a common jury, when after the evidence had been gone into it was agreed that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff on the first and second counts, damages 150*l.*, being the money realised at the said sale for the fixtures sold by the defendants and also for the plaintiff on the third count, damages 10*l.*, being the agreed amount of damage done to the premises by the removal of the fixtures, with leave for the defendants to move to have the verdict entered for them, the court to draw conclusions of fact.

The court was accordingly moved by Mr. Montague Chambers in Hilary Term 1869, and a rule nisi granted upon certain grounds therein set forth, and of which the following is a copy:

IN THE COMMON PLEAS.

Hilary Term, in the 32nd year of the reign of Queen Victoria.

TEBB against HODGE AND ANOTHER.

Friday, 15th Jan.

Upon reading the record of the Nisi Prius trial between the said parties, it is ordered that the plaintiff, upon notice of this rule, to be given to him or his attorney, shall shew cause to this court on Thursday next why the verdict found for him on the trial of this cause at the sittings after last term, holden at Westminster Hall, in and for the county of Middlesex, should not be set aside; and instead thereof a verdict be entered for the defendants on one or all the counts of the declaration pursuant to leave reserved on the grounds:

1. That there was no evidence of plaintiff's possession of the premises or goods to support the first count or the second count of the declaration.

2. That plaintiff was not mortgagee either at law or in equity.

3. That the goods were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner thereof, within the meaning of the 125th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849, and that the order in bankruptcy justified the defendants in selling, and relieved them from all responsibility in the matter, the plaintiff having of his own accord subjected himself to the provisions of section 125 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849.

4. That there was no evidence of any injury to plaintiff's reversion by the defendants.

5. That the agreement set forth in the 3rd count of the declaration, and made between plaintiff and Barrows, if it gave the plaintiff any lien or mortgage upon the goods should have been registered under the Bills of Sale Act, in order to give it any validity as a mortgage of goods and chattels. And in the mean time, and until this court shall otherwise order, let the postea remain in the hands of the associate, and the entry of final judgment on the said verdict be stayed.

BY THE COURT.

On the motion of M. Chambers, for the defendants.

This rule was argued on the 20th April 1869, when the same was discharged.

The questions for the opinion of the court of appeal are,

Whether, under the circumstances above set forth, the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict for the said sums of 150*l.* and 10*l.*, or either of them, or whether as to both or either of those sums the verdict ought to be entered for defendant.

The arguments and judgments in the court below are reported in 38 L. J. 217, C. P.

Bush (with him M. Chambers, Q.C.) argued for the defendant Hodge, the assignee of Barrows. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was based on the ground that the plaintiff was the equitable mortgagee of the premises and fixtures. I submit that he was never an equitable mortgagee, but only a vendor, with a lien upon the premises. It is important to distinguish between the two parts of the agreement. Upon it the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance of the first part, but not of the second, which is the mortgage. The agreement was for a repairing lease, and upon the granting of the lease Barrows was to pay 1000*l.* The plaintiff might have gone to the Court of Chancery, and obtained specific performance of that part of the agreement; but the plaintiff waived that right, and no lease was granted, nor was the sum of money ever paid. In the second part of the agreement, which it is contended created the relation of equitable mortgagor and mortgagee between Barrows and the plaintiff, the fixtures formed no part of the demise. The rule of law is that the lessee may remove trade fixtures erected by him, provided it be during his term. It is only when the fixtures are left after the term has become vested in the landlord that they are the property of the landlord. Elwes v Mawe, 2 Sm. L. C. 153. This mere agreement did not create the relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee. It was held by Leach, V.C., in Ex parte Coombe, 4 Madd. 249, that a parol agreement to deposit a lease when granted, as security for a sum advanced, does not constitute an equitable mortgage. Here there was no actual deposit, and this could not be, as the court below has held, an equitable mortgage.

KELLY, C. B.—The plaintiff in this case, in Dec. 1867, entered into an agreement with Barrows, whose assignee in bankruptcy is the defendant Hodge, to grant Barrows a lease of premises in Holborn at a certain rent for twenty years, upon certain conditions, Barrows agreeing to pay the plaintiff the sum of 1000*l.* on the granting of the lease, and also to fit up the premises forthwith, the fittings to be of the value of 500*l.* at least, and to be completed to the satisfaction of the plaintiff by the following 11th Feb. Upon payment of the consideration money, the premises being fitted up as aforesaid, the plaintiff undertook to grant the said lease with covenants mentioned in the agreement. And it was further provided that the plaintiff should lend or obtain for Barrows, upon the security "of the said premises, so fitted up and licensed," 1000*l.* for two years; and it was provided that if Barrows should assign or underlet the premises before the expiration of two years the said mortgage of 1000*l.*, with interest thereon, should be paid off and discharged. Barrows entered into possession, and put up the fixtures to the satisfaction of the plaintiff within the time required; he was, therefore, entitled to his part of the agreement, and there was a proposal on the plaintiff's part to hand over the lease, but Barrows was not in a position to pay the 1000*l.* at once, and therefore it was arranged, according to the terms of the contract, that the payment should stand over for two years, and upon the advance by the plaintiff of the sum of 1000*l.*, "the premises so fitted up," i.e. together with these fixtures, were agreed to be the security for the payment of the sum advanced. Although the plaintiff was ready to complete the arrangement and furnish Barrows with a lease, Barrows preferred to keep the agreement only, as he considered the agreement was sufficient, if he wanted to deposit a security. Afterwards Barrows applied to be allowed to assign the agreement by way of mortgage; but the plaintiff refused his consent till the lease had been taken up; he consented, however, to its being deposited as a security, subject to his claim of 1000*l.*; the result therefore was, that the agreement became itself security for the 1000*l.* paid by Barrows with one hand and borrowed back with the other, and the plaintiff was entitled at any moment to enforce the mortgage of 1000*l.*; there was an equitable contract between the parties, and the premises and fixtures became the security, the plaintiff being the equitable mortgagee. Consequently no right in the fixtures belonged to Barrows nor to his assignees. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas will be affirmed.

The other Judges concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

SADLER (app.) v. SMITH (resp.)

Boat race—Referee—Jurisdiction—No start—Paying over the stakes.

Although the decision of an arbitrator or referee is final upon all matters within his jurisdiction, if he has the means of forming an opinion, it is not so if he has not such means.

A. and B. agreed to row a boat race, and C. was appointed by them referee. They were to start themselves. There being some difficulty in the starting, B. rowed up to the boat in which the referee was, and having made a communication to him that A. would not start fair, the referee told him to go to his station and tell A. he must start, and if he would not start that he B. was to start without him. Upon this B. rowed down the river towards A. and afterwards he rowed up the river alone to the place appointed for the termination of the race, and claimed the stakes, which the referee ordered to be paid over to him as the winner of the race. The referee was stationed at a place from which he could not see the start, and he was not near enough to hear whether or not the order he had given to B. was communicated to A. The jury at the trial found that the order of the referee was not communicated to A. Upon an action brought by A. to recover his stake,

Held, that the referee had under the circumstances no jurisdiction to decide the race in B.'s favour, and that A. was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal by the defendant under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, from a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, discharging a rule made on the 16th April 1868, which called upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict for the plaintiff should not be set aside, and the verdict entered for the defendant, on the ground that the decision of the referee was, for the purpose of the action, final.

Omitting the pleadings, the following is the case stated for the purposes of the appeal.

3. The plaintiff and one H. Kelley were both watermen well known upon the river Thames, and on the 7th Oct. 1867 they entered into an agreement to row a scullers' race in the following terms:

Articles of agreement between H. Kelley, of Putney, on the one part, and Joseph Sadler, of Putney, on the other part. They hereby agree to row a right-away scullers' race from Putney to the Ship at Mortlake, the start to take place between the aqueduct and the steamboat pier, on Wednesday, the 27th Nov., for a sum of 300l. a side, the start to take place at half-past two p.m., the steamboats accompanying the race to be behind the men at starting, the cutters also accompanying the men to keep astern of the sternmost man, to row according to the recognised rules of boat-racing, the referee to be chosen at the last deposit, and whose decision shall be final, 50l. a side being now staked in the hands of the editor of the Sportsman. Monday, Oct. 7; the second deposit of 50l. to be made on Thursday, Oct. 17, at the Sportsman office; the third of 50l. a side, on Thursday, Oct. 31, at the Sportsman office; the fourth of 50l. a side, on Thursday, Nov. 14, at the Sportsman office; and the final of 100l. a side, at the Bells, Putney, on Thursday, Nov. 21, between the hours of eight and ten p.m. In the event of the referee not being agreed to, the editor of the Sportsman to name one; the editor of the Sportsman to be final stakeholder. Either party failing to comply with these conditions to forfeit all money down.

HENRY KELLEY.

Witness, R. B. Wormald. J. H. SADLER.

4. At the time when the agreement was made the defendant was and still is the editor of the Sportsman newspaper, and he duly received from the plaintiff, and from the said H. Kelley respectively, the sums of money mentioned in the said agreement at the times and places therein mentioned.

5. In accordance with the said agreement the plaintiff at the time and place of making the last deposit proposed Mr. Wm. Biffin, a boatbuilder, at Hammersmith, as the referee, and the said Hy. Kelley consenting to this proposition, the said Mr. Wm. Biffin was accordingly appointed to and accepted the post of referee.

6. In sculling races between professional watermen it has been the invariable custom for the competitors to start themselves, but it is to be taken for the present purpose that if either should make default in starting, and any question should in consequence arise, it would be in the power of the referee to determine such question.

7. It is usual in such races for each competitor to appoint a person who, in rowing language, is called an umpire, who attends the referee during the race, and urges on him the claims of his principal whenever he thinks that circumstances require it, but such umpires are not appointed to, and, in fact, do not discharge any judicial functions. The umpire appointed for the race by the plaintiff was James Messenger, and the umpire appointed by the said Hy. Kelley was Charles Bush.

8. It is also usual in such races for each competitor to be followed by an eight-oared cutter, to render him certain services during and before the race, and on the two days hereinafter mentioned the men were attended by their cutters in the ordinary way.

9. On the day and at the time mentioned in the said agreement, the plaintiff and the said H. Kelley appeared at the starting place, attended by the said referee and umpires in a steamer, and the two started by mutual consent, but after they had rowed part of the distance a collision or foul took place, and thereupon each umpire claimed the race for his principal on the grounds that the foul was the fault of his (the principal's) opponent.

10. The referee being unable to decide whether the plaintiff or the said Henry Kelley had committed the said foul, decided that the race should be rowed over again on the next day, namely, the 28th Nov. 1867, and that the start should take place at 3 p.m.

11. In accordance with this decision of the referee, the plaintiff and the said H. Kelley appeared on the 28th Nov. 1867, at 3 p.m., at the starting place mentioned in the agreement, to row the race, and the referee and umpires also atended in a steamer as on the previous day.

12. During the next half-hour the plaintiff and the said H. Kelley each attempted unsuccessfully to start. At the expiration of that time the plaintiff rowed from the starting place to his cutter, and put on a jersey, after which he rowed down the river some distance, and Kelly at the same time rowed up the river to the steamer, on board of which the referee was. At this time the referee, from such observations as he had been enabled to make, had formed the opinion that the plaintiff did not intend to start. The jury, however, on an issue left to them, thereupon have found that the plaintiff did intend to start.

13. When the said H. Kelley got near to the referee's steamboat he said to the referee, "We shan't start to-night." The referee replied, "What is the matter? What is the reason?" Kelley said, "He (meaning the plaintiff) will not start fair." The referee then looked for the plaintiff, and could not see him. The referee then said to Kelley, "Go to your station, and tell Sadler he must start; and if he will not start you must start without him." Messenger, the plaintiff's umpire, protested, and said to the referee, "You have no right to tell Kelley to start without telling the other man yourself." The referee said that he was the referee, and should carry out the word that he had given.

15. The referee, when he gave the order mentioned in paragraph thirteen (in the case), intended it to be communicated to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should have a fair opportunity afforded him of starting, if he wished to do so.

16. Upon receiving the order of the referee mentioned in the said paragraph thirteen, Kelley rowed down the river towards the plaintiff; and conflicting evidence was given at the trial as to whether Kelley made any, and, if so, what, communication to the plaintiff; and there was also conflicting evidence as to whether the plaintiff had or had not opportunity of effecting a start on even terms. The jury have, however, found on both these points in favour of the plaintiff. The referee was much too far off to hear what communication, if any, was made by Kelley to the plaintiff; he saw Kelley row within the starting limits down the river towards the plaintiff, whom he could not see at this time; he then lost sight of Kelley, and of course could not see what occurred between Kelley and the plaintiff. After the lapse of a minute or a minute and a half he saw Kelley rowing up the river, but still saw nothing of the plaintiff. Kelley then in sight of the referee, whose steamboat followed him, rowed over the whole of the course, and arrived at the Ship, at Mortlake, the place appointed for the termination of the race by the agreement.

Google

18. When the plaintiff found that Kelley was rowing over the course he followed, and also rowed over the course.

19. After Kelley had rowed over the course Charles Bush, his umpire, claimed the race and stakes for him; and James Messenger, the plaintiff's umpire, protested that he was not entitled to them, but he offered no evidence, and gave no reasons in support of his protest, and no opportunity was afforded him of adducing any evidence, thereupon the referee awarded the race and stakes to the said Hy. Kelley, without hearing any evidence or taking any steps to ascertain if his order had been communicated to the plaintiff, and without having any means to give him the knowledge of the fact one way or the other.

20. The plaintiff, on arriving at Mortlake, heard the decision of the referee mentioned in the last paragraph, and on the next day, and before the defendant had paid the stakes to the said H. Kelley, gave notice to the defendant not to pay the amount of the stakes to the said Henry Kelley.

21. After the receipt of this notice the defendant paid the whole of the stakes, 600*l.*, to the said H. Kelley.

22. This being the evidence at the trial, the Lord Chief Justice left the following questions to the jury:—

(1.) Did Sadler intend not to start?

(2.) Had the referee means by actual observations of forming a judgment that Sadler did not intend to start?

(3.) Was the order of the referee that if Sadler would not start, Kelley should start without him, and row over, communicated to Sadler?

(4.) Was a fair opportunity given to Sadler?

23. The jury returned the following answers to the questions so left to them.

(1.) We think that Sadler did intend to start.

(2.) The referee had not the means of forming such a judgment.

(3.) That the order of the referee was not communicated to Sadler.

(4.) That a fair opportunity of starting was not afforded to Sadler.

24. Upon this the Lord Chief Justice directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 300*l.*, and reserved leave to the defendant, subject to the finding of the jury, to move the court to enter the verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the decision of the referee was for the purposes of the action final.

25. On the 16th April 1868 the defendant, in pursuance of the leave so reserved, moved for and obtained the rule to show cause, which, upon its coming on for argument upon the 21st Jan. 1869, was discharged.

Garth, Q. C. (Ballantine, Serjt. and S. Tennant with him) for the appellant (the defendant).—The question as to who was entitled to the stakes was one entirely for the referee. The whole matter was left to him, and his decision was final, even if erroneous, at least for the purposes of this action; and as long as his decision remains unreversed, it is not competent to either party to recover back his stakes. After the decision of the referee, it cannot be taken that the order was not communicated to Sadler. The case itself finds that there was conflicting evidence as to whether or not the order was communicated to Sadler. There can be no question of fact raised after the referee has decided. [KELLY, C. B.—But it seems that the referee had no actual knowledge of the fact.] Yet it must be taken that he had ascertained that the order was communicated. [KELLY, C. B.—If he had taken the question into consideration and decided it, that would have been a different thing; but had he ever ascertained the facts?] His decision is final until reversed by some means. Suppose at the time of the running of a horse race—say the Derby—the umpire had been seized with a fit of coughing, or dust had blown into his eyes, so that, in fact, he was for the moment disabled from actually seeing the result, and he nevertheless decides, could his decision be questioned in an action to recover back the stakes? Such races could never go on if such a decision were not binding. [WILLES, J.—Suppose one of the parties had started five minutes before the time, and the referee decided in his favour, would his decision be final?] I cannot say, in such a case, as it would be a violation of the agreement between the parties. The referee has jurisdiction from the time of the actual start or the placing. [KEATING, J.—Suppose the referee had not sent to Sadler at all could he then have so decided?] I apprehend he could, for the whole question was with him to decide. [KELLY, C. B.—The question is, was there any starting at all?] The referee's jurisdiction had attached, and everything in connection with the race was for the referee's decision as soon as that was the case. [KELLY, C. B.—No doubt that would have been so if the matter had really come before the referee; but he was not aware whether or not the message had been conveyed to Sadler, and yet he decided. If he had heard the evidence, and had then decided, even erroneously, it would have been a different thing; but here he saw nothing. It is like as though he had decided upon a race the day before, or upon a race at Newcastle, which he had not seen. The question was certainly for him, but he did not hear any evidence, and he would not hear any.] But he has, in fact, decided, and if he had the power to decide his decision is binding though he may have seen nothing himself. [KELLY, C. B.—Suppose you were appointed to decide a race run yesterday, at which you were not present, and you decide at once, and refuse to hear evidence. That is just the case.] No evidence was tendered. [KELLY, C.B.—No opportunity was afforded him. Is it not quite clear that the referee decided a question upon which he had no knowledge, and upon which he received no evidence?] The question ought not to have been left to the jury, as the referee's decision was final. In Benbow v. Jones, 14 M. & W. 193, the plaintiff entered his horse for a steeplechase, one of the conditions being that no groom or professional jockey would be allowed to ride; and another that all disputes and other matters should be decided by the steward, whose decision should be final. The plaintiff intended his horse to be ridden by one Walker, but before the day of the race was informed by the steward that he considered Walker a professional jockey, and that the horse, if ridden by him, would be no horse in the race. The plaintiff insisted that Walker was qualified, and on the race day, notwithstanding a similar intimation from the steward to the plaintiff, Walker rode the horse which came in first. On the following day the steward pronounced the second horse to be the winner, and by his direction the stakes were paid to the owner of that horse. Upon this, it was held that the steward had decided the question within the meaning of the condition; that his decision was final (although it was not made after hearing both parties), and that the plaintiff could not recover the stakes from the stakeholder. Here the judge refused to hear evidence as to whether or not Walker was a professional jockey, and the court held that his decision could not be questioned. [KELLY, C. B.—There he ascertained the fact for himself, but here he saw nothing, and heard no evidence. In the case cited he saw the race, and he had the means of judging. No doubt many irregularities are tolerated for the sake of supporting a tribunal to which parties have agreed to refer their differences, but in all such cases the arbitrator has had means of judging. No doubt the referee is the absolute judge when he has the means of judging.] It would then come to be a question for a jury whether the referee had the means of judging, and whether his judgment was in accordance with the facts. It must be assumed that the referee knew all the circumstances necessary to give him jurisdiction. [CLEASBY, B.—He assumed it all because he believed that Sadler did not intend to start.] The question really is, whether or not the referee is to decide the question. He cited

Dines v. Wolfe, L. Rep. 1 Priv. Co. 280; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 25.

KELLY, C. B. — This case is of considerable interest, because it involves a question peculiarly applicable to a great variety of cases, especially as to how far the power of an arbitrator to decide upon questions within his jurisdiction is to be controlled by a court of law. In nothing in what I am about to say do we desire to interfere with the principle that in any question within the jurisdiction of an arbitrator, umpire, or referee, and upon which he has decided, a court of law has no right or power to interfere; and if this referee had decided upon facts within his jurisdiction, and upon materials within his knowledge, we should have held that it was not in the power of a court of law to interfere. But what are the facts? The very foundation of the jurisdiction of the referee, and which he himself had prescribed, did not in fact exist at all. There was no race because there was no start, and there was no start because the condition which the referee had prescribed had not been fulfilled, and therefore he had no jurisdiction to decide. Let us see what are the facts. Commencing at the 12th paragraph of the case it is stated, "During the next half hour the plaintiff and the said Henry Kelley each attempted unsuccessfully to start. At the expiration of that time the plaintiff rowed from the starting place to his cutter and put on a jersey, after which he rowed down the river some distance, and Kelley at the same time rowed up the river to the steamer, on board of which the referee was. At this time the referee, from such observation as he had been enabled to make, formed the opinion that the plaintiff did not intend to start. The jury, however, on the issue left to them thereupon, have found that the plaintiff did intend to start. 13th. When the said Henry Kelley got near to the referee's steamboat, he said to the referee, "We shan't start to-night." The referee replied, "What is the matter? What is the reason?" Kelley said, "He (meaning the plaintiff) will not start fair." The referee then looked for the plaintiff, and could not see him. The referee then said to Kelley "Go to your station and tell Sadler he must start, and if he will not start, you must start without him." The referee himself then prescribed the condition on which the start was to take place—"Tell Sadler he must start, and if he will not start, you must start without him." Now, if Sadler, upon being told that he must start, had not done so, and Kelley had started without him, the facts would have justified the result. But this never did take place, and hence there was no start, and Sadler in fact had no means of knowing that he was bound to start when Kelley started. There was, therefore, no start, and no race. Let us go on then and see what further the case states. "Messenger, the plaintiff's umpire, protested, and said to the referee, 'You have no right to tell Kelley to start without telling the other man yourself.' The referee said 'That he was the referee, and should carry out the word that he had given.'" The difficulty therefore must have been patent to the referee, and the statement shows clearly that this communication to Sadler was of the very essence of the start. The case then proceeds, "The referee, when he gave the order mentioned in paragraph 13, intended it to be communicated to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff should have a fair opportunity afforded him of starting if he wished to do so." I think upon this single fact that no communication with Sadler took place. The case goes on, "Upon receiving the order of the referee mentioned in paragraph 13, Kelley rowed down the river towards the plaintiff, and conflicting evidence was given at the trial as to whether Kelley made any, and if so what, communication to the plaintiff, and there was also conflicting evidence as to whether the plaintiff had or had not opportunity of effecting a start on even terms. The jury have, however, found on both these points in favour of the plaintiff." Now, it is contended by Mr. Garth that although the jury have found this, the referee has found the contrary; and I quite agree that if upon the facts of the case the referee had had any means whatever, either by being near enough himself to see, or by having evidence of the facts adduced before him so that it could be assumed that he had informed himself of the facts, his decision would have been final. The case goes on: "The referee was much too far off to hear what communication, if any, was made by Kelley to the plaintiff; he saw Kelley row within the starting limits down the river towards the plaintiff, whom he could not see. At this time he then lost sight of Kelley, and of course could not see what occurred between Kelley and the plaintiff. After the lapse of a minute or a minute and a half he saw Kelley rowing up the river, but still saw nothing of the plaintiff. Kelley then in sight of the referee, whose steamboat followed him, rowed over the whole course and arrived at the Ship at Mortlake, the place appointed for the termination of the race by the agreement." The referee, therefore, could neither see nor hear whether this communication was made to Sadler or not, and this is really the cardinal point of the case. The case further states, "after Kelly had rowed over the course Charles Bush, his umpire, claimed the race and stakes for him, and James Messenger, the plaintiff's umpire, protested that he was not entitled to them, but he offered no evidence, and gave no reasons in support of his protest, and no opportunity was afforded him of adducing any evidence, thereupon the referee awarded the race and stakes to the said Henry Kelly without hearing any evidence, or taking any steps to ascertain if his order had been communicated to the plaintiff, and without having any means to give him the knowledge of the fact one way or the other." Now nothing is more clear than the fact of a race having taken place depending upon whether or not a certain statement had been conveyed to Sadler, and that statement, upon which his decision was given not having in fact been communicated as it should have been, the referee, nevertheless, took upon himself to declare that one party had won the race, and that the other party had lost the race, without knowing or taking means to know what were the real facts of the case. I cannot but think that the referee must have assumed that his message had been delivered, and if he so assumed a fact which had no existence his decision amounted to nothing. Then looking at the whole of this case, as there could be no race without a start, and if no race without a start there was no foundation for the referee's decision, the plaintiff is accordingly entitled to his stakes.

WILLES, J.—Departing from the rule which prevails on these occasions when the decision of the court is unanimous of not giving a separate judgment, I wish merely to say that if it had been shown that the referee was aware that his communication had been made to Sadler, his decision would have been final.

COURT OF ARCHES.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 28 and 31.

EDNEY AND LUNN v. SMALLBONES.

Church rates—31 & 32 Vict. c. 109, s. 3—Loan by Public Works Commissioners for repair of church—Rate to repay—5 Geo. 4, c. 36—Objections to validity of rate—Omission of re-elected churchwarden to make declaration required by 5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 62, s. 9—Non-assessment of tithe rentcharge.

Money was borrowed for the purpose of rebuilding and enlarging a parish church, from the Commissioners of Public Works, under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4, c. 36. A rate was duly assessed and levied in order to repay an instalment of the above loan.

The defendant refused payment of his assessment, and raised the following objections to the validity of the rate.

First objection, that the promoters of the suit were not at the time of making the rate, nor afterwards, lawfully churchwardens of the parish, on the ground that one of them had not made the declaration required by 5 & 6 Will 4, c. 62, s. 9:

Held, that this objection failed, since a churchwarden, who has made the declaration in a preceding year, and continues in office without renewing the declaration, though compellable to do so, may do legal acts by virtue of his office, which will be binding upon himself and the parishioners.

Second objection, that the tithe rentcharge was not rated and assessed.

Held, that, at common law, the impropriate tithes, which the title rentcharge now represents, are not rateable to ordinary church rates, and that this exemption must also hold with regard to rates made, under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, to repay money advanced by the Commissioners of Public Works, there being no express words in the statute, nor necessary implication arising upon its construction, to take away the common law right.

This was a suit for subtraction of church rates.

The case came before the court by letters of request from the Chancellor of the diocese of Winchester. The promoters were the churchwardens of Whitchurch, near Southampton, and the defendant was one of the parishioners.

In 1867, the church of Whitchurch being in a dilapidated condition and in want of substantial repairs, a vestry meeting was called in February of that year, in order to consider the expediency of applying to the Commissioner of Public Works, under the stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 34, for a loan to aid the expense of repairs. The meeting passed a resolution that 4000*l.* was required, and also another resolution, with consent of the Bishop of Winchester and the incumbent of the parish, that an application should be made to the Commissioners of Public Works for an advance of 2000*l.* In March 1867 the commissioners advanced the money, to be repaid in twenty years by instalments of 100*l.*, with interest at 4 per cent. In June following a faculty was obtained to enlarge and repair the church. The Act enacted that the churchwardens might impose rates for the payment of the money. In Feb. 1868 a rate of 6*d.* in the pound was made to pay the first instalment and interest, and the majority of those assessed paid the rate. The defendant was assessed in the sum of 4*s.* 3*d.*, and having refused payment was summoned before the justices. Several objections were raised as to the validity of the assessment, and the case was then remitted to the Consistorial Court of the diocese.

The Act for the Abolition of Compulsory Church Rates (31 & 32 Vict. c. 109) by sect. 3 provides that,

In any parish where a sum of money is at the time of the passing of this Act due on the security of church rates, to be made or levied in such parish under the provisions of any Act of Parliament, or where any money in the name of church rate is ordered to be raised under any such provisions, such rates may still be made and levied, and the payment thereof enforced by powers of law, pursuant to such provisions, for the purpose of paying off the money so due, or paying the money so ordered to be raised, and the costs incidental thereto, but not otherwise, until the same shall have been liquidated; provided that the accounts of the churchwardens of such parish in reference to the receipt and expenditure of the moneys levied under such Acts shall be audited annually by the auditor of the poor law union within whose district such parish shall be situate, unless another mode of audit is provided by Act of Parliament.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Dr. Tristram argued for the promoters; and Sir Travers Twiss, Q.C. (the Queen's Advocate) and Dr. Swabey for the defendant.

The cases and statutes cited are noticed sufficiently in the judgment.

July 31.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This case is brought before this court by letters of request from the Consistory of Winchester. Certain questions of law are raised upon the pleadings and by the evidence taken before me, which I have now to decide. It appears that a rate has been assessed and levied upon the inhabitants and parishioners of the parish of Whitchurch, in the diocese of Winchester, in order to repay to the Commissioners of Public Works an instalment of the sum of 2000*l.*, borrowed from them under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4, c 36. The money was borrowed for the purpose of defraying a portion of the expense of "rebuilding and enlarging" the parish church, the whole expense amounting to 4000*l.* After the arguments which I have heard, I must consider the vestry meeting at which the resolution to borrow the money was passed, to have been duly summoned by proper notice, the resolution to have been duly passed, the consents of the bishop and incumbent to have been duly given, the application to the commissioners to have been duly made, a faculty to have been duly obtained, and, in point of form, the rate to have been duly made on the 7th of Feb, 1868, by the churchwardens and overseers in the manner prescribed by the statute. I must also consider that the money raised by the loan has been in part expended upon the rebuilding of the church, as well as the fact that Mr Smallbones occupied property in the parish, for which he was in point of form duly assessed, and that he has been requested, and has refused to pay his assessment. His objections to the invalidity of this rate are at present the following:—(1) That neither at the time the rate was made, nor at any subsequent period, were the promoters of this suit lawful churchwardens of the parish. I must take it to be proved that one of the churchwardens had not made the declaration prescribed by the statute before the ordinary at the time when this rate was made; but he was a re-elected churchwarden, and had been admitted in 1867 on his former election. By the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62, s. 9, it is enacted, "That, in future, every person entering upon the office of churchwarden or sidesman, before beginning to discharge the duties thereof, shall, in lieu of such oath of office, make and subscribe, in the presence of the ordinary or other person before whom he would, but for the passing of this Act, be required to take such oath, a declaration that he will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of his office, and such ordinary or other person is hereby empowered and required to administer the same accordingly." By the 118th canon, which is in this matter unaffected by the statute, "The office of all churchwardens and sidesmen shall be reputed ever hereafter to continue until the new churchwardens that shall succeed them be sworn." I have looked at the case of Stoughton v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 1045, and the more modern case of Bremner v. Hull 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 353, 354; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 759, 760, and at the case of Bray v. Somers, 31 L. J. 137, M. C.,; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 49; and the propositions of the law to be collected from the statute, the canon, and these and other cases, are: (a) That every churchwarden ought to make the declaration when he is admitted to office before the ordinary; (b) That, if the ordinary refuse to admit him, he may be compelled by mandamus so to do; (c) That the ordinary may compel the churchwarden to make the declaration; (d) That the churchwarden who has made the declaration in a preceding year, and continues in office without making the declaration, though compellable to do so, may do legal acts by virtue of his office, which will be binding upon himself and upon his parishioners. I am, therefore, of opinion that the first objection fails. The objections with respect to the notice of the vestry, and with respect to] the non-assessment of the lay rector for property unconnected with the great tithes, have been abandoned upon evidence being produced that the notice was valid, and that the property in question was, by force of a legal order in council, now situate in another parish. The next, and the most important, objection is, that the tithe rentcharge, amounting, at the time when the rate was made, to a rateable value of 1189*l.*, and belonging to Mr Melville Portal, was not rated and assessed. And, if this property be rateable, unquestionably the rate is invalid, on the ground of so large an omission. It is not necessary to cite authorities upon this point. According to the common law, the impropriate tithes, which the tithe rentcharge now represents, are not rateable for the repairs of the church as these tithes are charged with the reparation of the chancel (Nunn v. Varty and Mopsy, 3 Curt. 362); but it is contended that that exception does not apply to the case of a rate made to repay a loan under 5 Geo. 4, c. 36. That statute, by sect. 1, provides that it shall and may be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish in England or Wales, with the consent of the major part of the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor in vestry assembled . . . and, with the consent of the bishop of the diocese and the incumbent of such parish, to make application to the commissioners authorised and empowered to make advances for public works under the provisions of recited Acts, for any loan or advance under the powers, authorities, provisions, and regulations of the said Acts, and this Act, of such sum . . . as shall be necessary for defraying the expense or any part of the expense of rebuilding, repairing, enlarging, or otherwise extending the accommodation "in any church or chapel of any such parish." And "from and after the grant of any such loan or advance, it shall be lawful for the churchwardens, &c., of the parish in respect of which such loan or loans shall be advanced as aforesaid . . . and they are hereby authorised and required to make such annual or half-yearly rates for the repayment of the sum so advanced, in such proportions and at such times as shall be directed and appointed by the said commissioners on that behalf, and to assign the rates so to be made as aforesaid as a security for the repayment of the sums so advanced in such manner and form as the said commissioners shall direct and appoint, and so as to secure the repayment of the sums so advanced, with interest thereon, at and after the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, by annual or half-yearly instalments, on the amount of the principal money advanced, within the period of twenty years at farthest from the advancing of any such sums respectively." And by sect. 2, it is provided that the churchwardens, &c., may "collect, demand and receive, sue for, levy and recover all such rates by all such ways and means as any church rates may by law be collected, demanded, received, sued for, levied and recovered, &c." I was referred also to the preceding statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 34, which by sect. 26 enacted that it shall be lawful for the commissioners "to advance any money under this Act for the building, enlarging, or repairing any church, &c., upon having a sum equal to one-half part of the estimated expense of such building, enlargement, or repair, subscribed for, or deposited, or vested in any public fund, without requiring any such personal security as aforesaid; and in every such case it shall be lawful for the churchwardens . . . or the trustees of the said church or chapel, and they are hereby authorised and required to make rates, and shall give the pews in security for the repayment of the interest of the moneys advanced under the provisions of this Act, and for providing annually a fund of not less than the amount of the interest upon the sum advanced for the repayment of the principal thereof." And sect. 29 of the same Act provides that no such advance shall be made, "unless the application for such advance shall be made with the consent of not less than the majority in number, and of three-fourth parts in value, such value to be calculated and assessed from the last rate made for the relief of the poor in such parish, of the persons assessed to and paying such rates. . . Such consent to be certified by some justice of the peace or magistrate acting as such in each parish, one or more of the overseers of the poor of the parish or place in respect of which the application shall be made." The Queen's Advocate contended, as I understood him, that so far as that statute was concerned, the old law with respect to the exemption of the impropriate tithes remained unaltered; but that the introduction of the overseers of the poor into the subsequent Act, together with the other poor-law machinery, did have the effect of altering the old law. It was admitted that no instance will be found in which under 5 Geo. 4., c. 36, the impropriate tithes had been rated; but it was truly said that, if the objection was valid, the fact of its not having been taken earlier was of no avail. The Act itself does not specify the property on which the rate is to be levied; but it was said that the parties, who are to consent to the rate, are mentioned, and they are those who are assessed to the poor rate, and it must be presumed that they are to consent, because they are to be taxed; that tithe rentcharge is rateable to the poor, and that I ought therefore to read the statute as if it had these words in it—"such rates to be levied on all property assessed to the relief of the poor." It must be admitted that this contention is not without considerable weight. The proposition, however, goes further in its necessary consequences than the mere removal of the exemption of the impropriate tithes. Stock in trade is not rateable to the poor, but it is assessable for church rates; the standards of the two rates are different, for it has been holden that the poor-rate assessment is not necessarily a standard for the validity of a church-rate assessment. Upon the construction now contended for the law upon these subjects is also altered, without express words, by implication. An argument has been further drawn from contrasting the provisions of this statute with respect to loans with those of the Church Building Acts (58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 56, and 3 Geo. 4, c. 72, s. 5). By these Acts the rates for repayment are to be made in the usual manner by the churchwardens. It is further argued that I have already decided in the case of Rippin v. Wilson and Bastin (38 L. J. 33, Eccl.; 20 L. T. Rep. N.S. 622) that the expenditure of money raised by loan under this statute upon the repairs of the church is lawful; and that, therefore, it would be unjust not to hold that the impropriator, who may be relieved from the burden of repairing the chancel, shall not be assessable like any other parishioner to the burden of repairing the church. As to the argument of injustice, it must be remembered that the Act provides that the consent of the major part of the poor-rate payers and of the bishop of the diocese, to say nothing of the incumbent, who may be impropriator, shall be a condition precedent of any application for a loan; and it must be presumed that, unless it were for their interests, this consent would not be granted. Is is to be remembered that the obligation to repair the church continues binding for all time upon the impropriator, even if he were to be temporarily relieved by the operation of the present statute; and it is to be observed that, under the old law, the incumbent, who may be impropriator, presided and voted at all vestry meetings at which a church rate was passed. After such consideration, it appears to me that I cannot put the construction upon the Act which has been contended for by the Queen's Advocate, and to a certain extent, I am confirmed in this view by the decision in re Batkin 25 L. J. 128 M.C., where it was held that the jurisdiction of justices to enforce payment of a rate made for the repayment of money borrowed under the stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, is the same as with respect to a church rate, and that they therefore had no power to order payment, when the party assessed and refusing to pay takes bonâ fide objections before them as to the validity and legality of the rate. And Wightman, J. in his judgment says: "Is the rate in question then to be considered, for this purpose, as differing from ordinary church rates? The stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 30, s. 2, says that the rates made under it may be sued for, levied, and recovered by all such ways and means as church rates may be, as fully and effectually as if all powers, authorities, provisions, penalties, and forfeitures relating to the suing for, levying, and recovering church rates, were specially repeated in that Act. Whatever the intention of the Legislature may have been, the words of the Act are so strong and unambiguous, that I cannot distinguish the case from that of an ordinary church rate." The impropriator has by common law a right to the exemption of his tithes from rateability to the church rate. That right can only be taken away by the express words of a statute, or by a necessary implication arising from the construction of it. Express words there are none in this case; and the inference is too strong to be warranted by the doctrine of necessary implication, as applied to the purpose and language of the statute. I must therefore pronounce that the libel is proved, and adjudge the defendant to pay his assessment with costs.

REG. v. REDFORD.

Embezzlement—Master and servant—Benefit Building Society—Secretary—Trustees.

The trustees of a Benefit Building Society borrowed money for the purposes of their society on their individual responsibility (there being no rule of the society authorising them to borrow money). The money on one occasion was received by the secretary, and embezzled by him:

Held, that the secretary might be charged in the indictment for embezzlement as the servant of W. and others, W. being one of the trustees and a member of the society.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court at the quarter sessions for the city of Manchester, held on the 26th Aug. 1869.

William Gregory Redford was tried and found guilty on an indictment which charged him with the embezzlement of 500*l.*, the property of E. G. Williams and others, his masters.

For the purposes of this case the conviction of W. Gregory Redford is to be deemed and taken to be a good conviction, unless the facts stated are not evidence of the crime of embezzlement.

CASE.

There had existed in Manchester for some years a building society, the rules whereof were duly registered under the provisions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. These rules may be referred to, and are to be taken as part of this case.

Under rule 11 George Christopher Williams and others were appointed, and still acted as the trustees of the said society.

Under rule 14 the prisoner was appointed by the trustees and managers to be secretary to the society, and continued to act as such secretary up to January last.

The trustees almost from the commencement of the society's operations had borrowed upon their individual responsibility, and on the security of promissory notes, signed by some of them respectively, moneys from persons willing to lend the same. The moneys thus borrowed were subsequently employed for the purposes of the society, i.e., in making advances to members on mortgage and otherwise. These promissory notes were for the most part drawn out by the prisoner, and when signed by some of the trustees were delivered by him to the lender in exchange for the amount of the loan.

About the 23rd July 1868, the prisoner prepared such a promissory note, of which the following is a copy, as the same now appears.

500*l.* Manchester, July 23, 1868.

Two months after notice to the secretary, W. G. Redford, we jointly and severally promise to pay to John William Fuller the sum of 500*l.* together with interest thereon after the rate of five pounds per centum per annum from the date hereof, for value received.

CHARLES MEREDITH, THOMAS WIGHTBOURNE, GEORGE C. WILLIAMS, THOMAS ANDERTON, WILLIAM WILSON, B. TOWLSON, JAMES EYRE, Trustees and Managers to the Ninth South Lancashire Building Society.

Witness to signatures, W. G. REDFORD.

The body of the note, and the attestation, is in the prisoner's handwriting, and the other signatures were given by the managers and trustees in due course.

The evidence of the prisoner's receipt of the money which was the amount of the promissory note, consisted of the production of a letter written and signed by him, dated the 23rd July 1868, and of an entry in the list or statement of liabilities hereinafter-mentioned. The said letter was in the words following:

Ninth South Lancashire Benefit Building Society,
21, Dickenson-street.
W. G. Redford, Secretary.
Manchester, July 23, 1868.

Dear Sir,—The 500*l.* is safe to hand, and your leaving it with my clerks was perfectly right and in accordance with my instructions. If you wish the signatures witnessed, I shall be happy to do so any time you like to call here with the note.—I am, yours truly,

William G. Redford.

J. W. Fuller, Esq., Lower Brighton.

In the month of Jan. 1869 the said G. C. Williams went to the prisoner and found him writing out a document, which prisoner stated to be a list of his defalcations, in these words: "This is the amount of my defalcations, and I have no money." In this document, which was produced in evidence, there is an entry in the following words:

"J. Fuller. 500*l.* Copy destroyed, but I remember he would have it fully signed, so the names would be Meredith, Williams, Lightbourne, Wilson, Eyre, Anderton, and Toulson."

No part of the 500*l.* was ever paid by the prisoner to the society, or any of its trustees or managers, and on the 27th July 1869, that sum with interest was paid to Fuller by the seven makers of the promissory note.

It was objected before me on behalf of the prisoner that on the evidence this indictment was not proved.

1. Because if by the words "G. C. Williams and others," in the indictment, it was to be taken that the makers of the promissory note as individuals (whose money the 500*l.* was upon its receipt by the prisoner) were described, the relation of master and servant never existed between the prisoner and those individuals.

2. But if by the words "G. C. Williams and others," it was to be taken that by virtue of the statute 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 21, incorporated with the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, the trustees of the society (whose servant the prisoner was) were properly described, then the money alleged to be embezzled was not money of his masters, the trustees, as such, the statute only vesting in the trustees, and enabling to be described accordingly in an indictment what was the property of the society as such.

3. That if the prisoner were the servant, and the money the property of the said G. C. Williams and others, the letter of July 23, 1868, which was the evidence of the receipt thereof by the prisoner, showed that the money was therefore in the constructive possession of his masters by the hand of a fellow servant.

I overruled these objections, and let the case go to the jury. The prisoner was found guilty and sentenced, but I reserved for the consideration of the court the following question:

Was there evidence of embezzlement by the prisoner to go to the jury; if there was not, the conviction is to be quashed, if there was, the conviction is to stand.

Henry W. West,
Recorder of Manchester.

Holker, Q.C. (Macrory with him), for the prisoner. The conviction was wrong, for the prisoner was not the servant of Williams and others. The third objection will not be relied upon. There is no rule of this society that authorises the trustees to borrow money, and it is found in this case that the 500*l.* was borrowed on the personal security of the trustees. [Blackburn, J.—Can the prisoner object that the borrowing of the money was a breach of trust by the trustees? Suppose a clerk in a railway company indicted for embezzlement, could he object that the money embezzled was obtained on the security of one of Lloyds' bonds? Martin, B.—Is this society a corporation?] No. [Martin, B.—If it is not a corporation, the society consists of a number of individuals like an insurance company, that calls itself by a certain name.] By sect. 21 of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 50, which is incorporated into the Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32), the property of a building society is vested in the trustees or treasurer for the time being, and it is to be taken to be for all purposes of action or suit as well criminal as civil, and may be described in any such proceedings as the property of the person appointed treasurer or trustee of such society. Here it is clear that the money was borrowed by the trustees on their individual responsibility. [Blackburn, J.—The money was intended as a loan to the society, and the trustees were merely sureties for its repayment.] Until they applied the money to the purposes of the society it was their money. [Blackburn, J.—Suppose an infant wants a loan, and he requests a friend to obtain it for him on his personal security, and the friend sends the money to the infant by a person in the infant's employ, who embezzles it, why is not that person the servant of the infant?] The prisoner was not authorised to receive money by the rules of the society, and he held the money for the persons it belonged to, but he was not their servant. [Lush, J.—The trustees are members of the society, and you say it was their money, and that the prisoner was a clerk of the society. Now it has been held that a servant in the employment of a partnership must be considered as the servant of each member, and if he embezzle the private money of one he may be charged as the servant of that individual partner: Rex v. Leech, 3 Stark, 70; Reg. v. Bailey, 7 Cox C. C. 179; 1 Dears & Bell.] It is submitted that the prisoner was the servant of the trustees, and should have been indicted as their servant qua trustees.

Jordan, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

Kelly, C. B.—The cases cited by my brother Lush are decisive of this case, and show that the prisoner may be described in the indictment either as the servant of the trustees of the building society, or of the trustees individually. If the prisoner was the servant of the society he is properly described as the servant of the persons of whom the society is composed, though it may consist of a great number of persons. If the money was, as in law and in fact it was in this case, the money of the society, the prisoner may be properly charged as in this indictment, with embezzling the property of Williams and others as the members of the society. If, on the other hand, as was argued, it was the money of the trustees by reason of their having acted as the representatives of the society, although they gave their personal security for its repayment, and intended to apply it for the purposes of the entire society, yet, until they so applied it, it remained the individual property of the trustees, then the prisoner may be charged as their servant. So that taking it either way the conviction was right and must be affirmed.

Martin, B.—When once it is ascertained that the society is not a corporation, every difficulty is solved. The members of the society may call themselves a society, but they are in reality nothing more than a number of persons formed into a partnership.

Byles, J. concurred.

Digitized by Google

BLACKBURN, J.—These trustees made themselves individually liable for the repayment of this money, but they borrowed it for the society as sureties. There is no doubt that it was the money of the society, though there may be some doubt whether the trustees could have enforced the charge against the society. It is like the case of a railway company with no borrowing powers, borrowing money on the security of the directors personally; or, perhaps, it is more like the case of an infant borrowing money on the security of a friend. The indictment properly charges the prisoner as the servant of Williams and others, and the conviction must be affirmed.

LUSH, J. concurred.

WILSON AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. TRAILL (resp.)

Victoria—Garnishee summons—Property subject to attachment—Property "belonging to" defendant, or in which he is "beneficially interested"—Property entrusted to defendant for sale.

The Common Law Procedure Act (Victoria), 1865, by sect. 215, gives a summary remedy for damages against a garnishee, who shall, after service of the writ and before the dissolution of the attachment, without the leave of the court, dispose of or part with any "property, of whatsoever nature, belonging to the defendant, or to or in which such defendant shall be legally or equitably entitled, or otherwise beneficially interested," attached in the hands of the garnishee. In proceedings taken under the above section:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria), that the words of the statute require that the property attached should belong to the defendant, and imply an actual, and not merely a constructive, ownership in him; and that, therefore, where a garnishee parted with property, which though dealt with by the defendant as if he was the owner, had been really only entrusted to him for sale, a summons under the above statute was properly refused.

This was an appeal against a rule of the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria, at Melbourne, dated the 16th Sept. 1867, and making an order a rule of court. The order had been made by a judge of the Supreme Court dismissing a garnishee summons in an action between the appellants and one Lancelot E. Threlkeld (trading under the name of L. E. Threlkeld and Co.) The appellants are merchants at Melbourne, and on the 17th May 1866, purchased through John Everard and Co, tea brokers, in Melbourne, from Messrs. L. E. Threlkeld and Co., auctioneers, of Sydney, a large quantity of tea, and in the following month Messrs. Threlkeld and Co., deposited with the Oriental Bank Corporation, at Sydney, to be transmitted to their branch, at Melbourne, certain bills of exchange drawn by them upon the appellants against the consignment of the tea, and gave directions to the bank to present the bills for acceptance, and to collect the amounts at maturity.

About the time of such deposit 318 and 49 chests of tea were shipped by Messrs. Threlkeld and Co. to Melbourne, and the bills of lading thereof were delivered to the bank, with directions to deliver the teas to the appellants on their acceptance of the bills.

The teas reached Melbourne in due course, but on presentation of the bills to the appellants they re-refused to accept them on the ground that some parcels of the tea did not correspond with that which they had purchased.

The appellants thereupon commenced an action in the said Supreme Court against Threlkeld and Co., for non-delivery of the tea which had been purchased.

The writ in such action was returned non est inventus, and on such return the appellants issued a writ of foreign attachment, directed to the respondent, as manager of the bank, attaching the teas in his hands for the purpose of making satisfaction to the appellants. Such writ was issued, and the proceedings thereupon were taken under sects. 211-216 of the Common Law Procedure Statute for Victoria 1865 (28 Vict. No. 274).

Sect. 211 is as follows:

In every action at law in the Supreme Court, on or arising out of contract, and in every action in such court for the conversion or detention of goods wherein the writ of summons or of capias shall (as to any defendant named therein) be returned non est inventus, if upon or after such return an affidavit shall be filed on behalf of the plaintiff (in addition to a full affidavit of the cause of action), that such cause of action arose within Victoria, and that to the best of deponent's belief such defendant does not reside within the colony, and is, to the best of deponent's belief, possessed of or entitled to, or otherwise beneficially interested in any lands, moneys, securities for money, chattels, or other property in the custody or under the control of any person or persons in the colony, hereinafter called the garnishee or garnishees (to be named in such affidavit), or that any such person or persons is or are idebted to such defendant, the plaintiff may proceed against such defendant by process of foreign attachment in the manner hereinafter directed. Provided that by leave of a judge (where it shall appear that the plaintiff may sustain injury by the delay) such affidavit may be filed before the return of such writ of summons.

The affidavit required by the said section was duly made.

Upon the return of the writ of attachment, the respondent was examined on the 23rd Oct. 1866, and an order was made by a judge of the Supreme Court that 218 chests of tea, part of the 318, should be attached to answer the appellant's claim, and that as to the remaining 100 chests and the 49 chests the attachment should be dissolved.

This order was made under sect. 216 of the said statute, the material part of which is as follows:—

Upon the return of every such writ of attachment as aforesaid, or as soon after as conveniently may be, and upon such other day or days of adjournment (if any) as shall in that behalf be directed, the said court or one of the judges thereof shall proceed to inquire and determine whether in fact the plaintiff's cause of action arose within Victoria, and if so, then what lands, moneys, chattels, and other property as aforesaid (sufficient or not more than sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's cause of action, together with his costs of suit), then are or were at the time of the service of the said writ in the custody or under the control of any such garnishee or person as aforesaid, belonging to the defendant, or to or in which he was at that time entitled or interested as aforesaid, and what debts were then due to such defendant from any such garnishee or person, and the particulars thereof, and whether such lands, moneys, and other property and debts, or any part or parts thereof, are or can be made available for the purpose of making such satisfaction as aforesaid, and to what amount respectively; and for the purposes of such inquiry and determination it shall be lawful for the said court or judge in a summary way to examine or permit the said plaintiff to examine viva voce upon oath every such garnishee or person, together with such witnesses (if any) as the said court or judge may think proper to be so examined, and for that purpose to make such orders and issue such summonses to the several garnishees and to any witness or witnesses as may in that behalf be deemed expedient, and any such garnishee or person as aforesaid or witness who shall refuse or neglect to attend according to the exigency of any such writ of attachment, or to obey any such order or summons, or shall refuse to be so examined, shall be liable to be summarily proceeded against as in cases of contempt of court, and to be punished accordingly.

At the time of making the said order the respondent had received notice (as the fact was) that the teas at the time of their consignment to the bank, were and from thence had continued to be, the property of Messrs. A. Tange and Co., merchants of Sydney, by whom they had been placed in the hands of Threlkeld and Co. for sale on their account.

On the 20th Nov. 1866, the appellant drew up the following order, purporting to be based on the minute of order, made on 23rd Oct. 1866:

I do order that 218 chests of tea, part of 367 chests of tea, belonging to the defendant, Lancelot E. Threlkeld, now in the hands of the said George Hamilton Traill, acting manager of the Oriental Bank Corporation, be sold by the said George Hamilton Traill, and that the proceeds of the sale of the said 218 chests of tea be henceforth holden by the said George Hamilton Traill, subject to the said writ of foreign attachment issued in this cause, for the purpose of making satisfaction to the plaintiffs for their said claim in this action; and I do further order that as to the remaining 149 chests of tea belonging to the defendant, Lancelot E. Threlkeld, now in the hands of the said George Hamilton Traill, the said writ of foreign attachment be dissolved.

On the 26th Nov. the appellants proceeded in the action, as if Threlkeld and Co. were residing in Victoria. This was under sect. 218 of the said statute, which is as follows:

At any time after the return day of any such writ or attachment, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to proceed in the action as if such defendant resided in Victoria, and had appeared to such action in person. Provided that such bond as is hereinafter in that behalf prescribed shall have been first duly entered into.

On the 5th Dec. 1866, the respondent obtained a rule nisi to set aside the said order of the 20th Nov. on the grounds that there was no jurisdiction to direct the sale therein directed, and that the proceeds of the said sale should have been ordered to be paid into court; and on the 24th Dec. the said rule was made absolute.

The appellants endeavoured to have such rule amended, but without success.

On or about the 9th Jan. 1867 the appellants' attorney, without having previously given notice to the respondent, or to Threlkeld, or to the attorney of either of them, of their intention so to do, obtained the signature of a judge of the said court to an order of attachment, dated back, viz., on the 20th Nov. 1866; which was in the same terms as the first order of the same date, which had been set aside, except that the second order omitted the direction for the sale of any part of the said teas.

The respondent was served with this second order on the 9th Jan. 1867; but he had, between the dismissal of the order of attachment and sale (of the 20th Nov. 1866), and the obtaining of the said second order, that is to say, on the 28th Dec. 1866, taken counsel's opinion as to what course he should pursue under the circumstances of the case, and under his advice had re-shipped the teas to the Oriental Bank Corporation at Sydney, who had on the 21st Jan. 1867, delivered them up to the said Tange and Co., without any payment or security to them, and without any agreement or promise for any payment or security, and without insisting upon any lien on the said teas or any of them.

On the 12th Feb. 1867 a summons was issued by the appellants against the respondent to show cause why he should not pay such damages as to the judge should seem meet, and the costs of the application on the grounds that he had disposed of or parted with, and sent out of the jurisdiction of the court the goods attached in his hands to satisfy the appellants' claim.

This summons was issued under sect. 215 of the said statute, which is as follows:

From the time of the service of such writ upon any such garnishee or person as aforesaid, all and singular the lands and other hereditaments, moneys and chattels, bills, bonds, and other property, of whatsoever nature, in the custody or under the control of such garnishee, then belonging to the defendant, against whom such writ issued, or to or in which such defendant shall then be legally or equitably entitled, or otherwise beneficially interested (and whether solely or jointly with any person or persons), and all debts of every kind then due by any such garnishee to such defendant, although the same, or part thereof, may be payable only at a future day, shall, to the extent of such defendant's right, title, and interest, therein respectively be attached in the hands of such garnishee, and (subject to any bona fide prior claims or liens thereon) be liable to the satisfaction of the particular demand or cause of action of which he or she shall, by the said writ, have had notice; and if any such garnishee or person, without the leave of the court or one of the judges, shall at any time after such service, and before the said attachment shall be dissolved, sell or otherwise knowingly dispose of or part with any such property, or pay over any such debt, or any part thereof, excepting only to or to the use of the plaintiff in such writ, he or she shall, upon the application in a summary way of such plaintiff to the court, or any judge thereof, and on proof of the facts, pay such damages to the plaintiff as such court or judge shall in that behalf think fit to order.

The said summons against the respondent was referred to the court, and by the court dismissed, and on the 16th Sept. the order dismissing such summons was for the purpose of appeal made a rule of court. Against this rule the present appeal was brought.

Forsyth, Q.C. and Pontifex were for the appellants

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. and Macnamara, for the respondent, were not called on.

Judgment was delivered by Sir James W. Colvile.—It may be well, before stating the views of their Lordships upon the particular point involved in this appeal, to consider what the position of the parties was. The plaintiffs in the action, the appellants in this appeal, being resident in Melbourne, made a contract through their agents at Sydney for the purchase of certain teas. Upon the face of the contract those teas appeared to be the teas of Threlkeld, who now is found to have been the agent of an undisclosed principal, Mr. Tange. The teas were sent to Melbourne, and the form of the action shows that the purchasers, the appellants, had treated them as not being such teas as they had contracted to purchase, and they accordingly brought their action to recover the moneys which they had paid under the contract. Therefore that clears the question as to the property in the teas. The teas in the hands of the garnishee were the property of the vendor, whoever that vendor might be. The action was brought against the ostensible vendor, Threlkeld, in the Court of Melbourne. Neither Threlkeld nor Tange was personally subject to the jurisdiction of that court. The plaintiffs, therefore, took advantage of the law of foreign attachment, and upon the return of the writ of summons non est inventus, they attached these teas as the teas of Threlkeld in the hands of the garnishee. Then took place those various proceedings which their Lordships do not think necessary to enter into particularly, but the result was that the garnishee (for it will be convenient in dealing with this appeal to treat the acts of the bank of which he was an officer as his acts), finding, as he says, that the teas were not the teas of Threlkeld, that they were claimed, and properly claimed, by Tange, and that the bank had not any lien on them, parted with the teas, and sent them back to Sydney. In these circumstances the appellants applied against the garnishee for a summons under the 215th section of the Common Law Procedure Act for Victoria 1865 (28 Vict. No. 274). It is scarcely necessary to read again that clause which has been so much commented on, because it is perfectly clear —it is almost admitted— that it was essential both to the validity of the original attachment and to the prosecution of the remedy which the 215th clause gives against a garnishee who parts with the property that has been attached, that the property should belong to the defendant in the action. The question to whom these teas belonged cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, be affected by any of those principles which are sometimes applied to sales by an agent on behalf of an undisclosed principal, and give to the vendee such rights of set-off or the like as he would have had if the property in the thing sold had been really and not ostensibly in the agent. In those cases the contract subsists, and the question is, in what mode it is to be carried out. Here there has been a breach of contract, and the party is suing in a particular way for the money which he has paid under that contract as upon a failure of consideration, and for damages sustained by reason of the breach of contract. The words of the statute require that the property attached should belong to the defendant. They imply an actual and not merely a constructive ownership in him. Their Lordships have already, in the course of the argument, intimated that there is no ground for saying that the garnishee was estopped by his conduct from showing in whom the actual ownership was. Upon the summons, various affidavits were filed upon both sides, and the judge came to the conclusion that the property in the teas was really in Tange and not in Threlkeld, the defendant in the action, and therefore that it was impossible to say that the defendant had sustained any damage by reason of the garnishee parting with property which was not properly subject to the attachment at all, and accordingly he dismissed the summons. The only substantial questions that seem to be raised by this appeal, are whether the court on the evidence before it should have come to a contrary conclusion, or whether the case was left in such a state of doubt that the court ought, under the power which a subsequent section (sect. 216) gives it, to have directed an issue as to the question of property to be tried? Their Lordships are of opinion that the first question must be answered in the negative; that upon the affidavits it is impossible to say that the balance of testimony was not against the contention of the appellants. With respect to the other question, although at times in the course of the argument their Lordships may have felt more doubt concerning it, yet, looking to the affidavits as corroborated by the acts of the parties, and the inferences which arise from the bank at Sydney giving up its claim of lien against Threlkeld on the conviction that the property was the property of Tange, they cannot say that there was such a case of doubt that the court below, in the exercise of its discretion, has erred in not granting an issue to try that question. They were asked to presume a sort of universal conspiracy against the appellants in this case, and that these parties have all sworn falsely in order to enable Threlkeld or the garnishee to escape from their responsibility for the benefit of Tange. Judging by the ordinary principles of human action, their Lordships think that they would not be justified in drawing any such conclusion. Their Lordships, therefore, feel that it is impossible for them to say that the judgment of the court below is wrong, or that the court was bound in its discretion to grant an issue, and they must humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN MARTIN (app.) v. THE REV. ALEXANDER HERIOT MACKONOCHIE (resp.)

Monition—Motion to enforce obedience—Communion service—Lighted candles on Communion Table—Elevation of the paten and cup—Kneeling during the prayer of consecration—Endeavour to obey—Literal and evasive compliance—Construction—"Kneeling" and "bending the knee"—Rubrics.

In a proceeding against the respondent, a clerk in holy orders, under the Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), articles against him charged, first, that he used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light; secondly, that he, during the prayer of consecration, in the order of the administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten and cup above his head; and, thirdly, that he knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration.

By the monition of the Arches Court the respondent was admonished to abstain from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, as pleaded in the articles:

By the monition of the Privy Council, the respondent was (on appeal) admonished to abstain from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion; from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration; and also from using lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light:

On a motion to enforce obedience to the monition:

Held, first, that the respondent had not disobeyed the monition by using lighted candles on the Communion Table during the whole of morning prayer, the said candles having been extinguished immediately before the commencement of the Communion Service; this being a literal compliance with the terms of the monition:

Secondly, that the respondent had not disobeyed the monition by elevating the cup and paten, during the consecration prayer, to the level of his head or face, the monition being confined to the particular mode of elevation pleaded in the articles, viz., elevation above the head; but no sanction is hereby given to the notion that any elevation whatever of the elements, as distinguished from the mere act of removing them from the table and taking them into the hands of the minister is legal.

Thirdly, that the respondent had disobeyed, by reverently bending one knee at certain parts of the consecration prayer, his knee, occasionally but unintentionally, momentarily touching the ground in so doing, both the letter and spirit of the monition; the letter, because the act described was kneeling within the terms of the monition; and the spirit, because the very gist and purport of the monition was to enforce the intention of the Prayer Book and to prevent kneeling by way of reverence.

Fourthly, that the payment of costs of the monition by the respondent would be sufficient penalty for his disobedience, the court allowing him the benefit of his affidavit that he had never intentionally or advisedly disobeyed the monition.

A literal compliance with the terms of a monition is all that is required; but a mere literal compliance in an evasive manner will not suffice.

In considering whether a monition has been disobeyed, the monition in the first instance will be looked to; but the monition cannot go beyond the matters charged against a defendant, nor beyond the judgment pronounced thereon; and the judgment may be referred to to interpret the terms of the monition.

The courts will not draw a distinction, in acts which are a departure from or a violation of the rubric, between those which are important and those which appear to be trivial: (Per Lord Cairns in Martin v. Mackonochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505, approved.)

In this case the present proceeding was in the form of a motion, on behalf of the appellant, to the Judicial Committee to declare that the respondent had not complied with a monition, inasmuch as he continued:—(1) to elevate the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion; (2) to kneel or postrate himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration; and (3) to use lighted candles on the Communion Table at times when such lighted candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light; and to enforce the said monition.

The monition referred to was that which followed the Order in Council on the report of the Judicial Committee on the appeal from the Court of Arches.

The report of the Judicial Committee, dated Dec. 23, 1868, was as follows:—

"Whereas in a certain cause of the office of the judge which was lately depending in the Arches Court of Canterbury, and was promoted and brought in virtue of letters of request under the hand and seal of the Right Reverend Father in God Archibald Campbell, by Divine permission Lord Bishop of London, by John Martin, a parishioner of the new parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, in the county of Middlesex, diocese of London, and province of Canterbury, against the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, a clerk in holy orders of the United Church of England and Ireland, the incumbent and perpetual curate of the said parish, the Right Hon. Sir John Joseph Phillimore, Knight, Doctor of Laws, the judge of the said court, did, on the 28th March 1868, by his interlocutory decree, pronounce that the proctor for the said John Martin had sufficiently proved his intention deduced in the third, fourth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh articles, given in and admitted in the said cause, and that the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, clerk, had offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England, in the particular matters alleged and set forth in the said articles in manner as hereinafter mentioned, and did therefore monish the said Rev. Alexander Heriot Makonochie to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, as also from the use of incense, and from the mixing water with the wine during the administration of the Holy Communion, as pleaded in the said articles, but did give no costs: And whereas an appeal from the said decree has been prosecuted to your Majesty in council, on behalf of the said John Martin, in so far only as the said judge did not, by his said decree, pronounce that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie had offended against the statute law and the constitutions and canons ecclesiastical, by having knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements, during the Prayer of Consecration, and by having permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in holy orders, and did omit or decline to admonish him against so offending in future, and did omit or decline to pronounce that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie had offended against the statute law and the constitutions and canons ecclesiastical, by having used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and by having permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles, and did omit or decline to admonish him against so offending in future, and also did omit or decline to condemn the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie in the costs incurred in the said cause on behalf of the said John Martin. And whereas the usual petition of appeal to your Majesty in council of the proctors of the said John Martin stands referred to this committee under and by virtue of your Majesty's General Order in Council of the 4th Nov. 1867, and whereas an appearance has been entered in the registry of your Majesty's Court of Appeals on behalf of the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, the respondent in the said cause of appeal, now the Lords of the Committee having, in obedience to your Majesty's said Order in Council, taken the said petition into consideration and read the proceedings and evidence transmitted from the court below, and on four former days heard counsel and proctors on both sides, and having maturely deliberated, have this day agreed humbly to report to your Majesty their opinion in favour of the appeal of the said John Martin that the decree of the court below ought to be amended to the extent hereinafter mentioned, that the principal cause ought to be retained, and therein that in addition to the matters in which the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, was in the decree appealed from pronounced to have offended, and from which he was thereby monished to abstain for the future, he the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie ought to be pronounced to have offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England, by having within the said church of the new parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and also by having within the said church used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and that the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie ought to be admonished to abstain from the future from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and also from using in the said church lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and further that he the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie ought to be condemned in the costs incurred on behalf of the said John Martin, as well in the court below as in the said appeal."

By an Order in Council, dated Jan 14, 1869, the above report was approved. A monition then issued, which was duly served on the respondent on Jan. 20, 1869, in the following terms:—

"Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, to the Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, clerk, the incumbent and perpetual curate of the new parish of Saint Alban's, Holborn, in our county of Middlesex, diocese of London, and province of Canterbury, greeting: Whereas, in an appeal by John Martin, a parishioner of the said parish, from a decree given on the 28th March 1868, in the Arches Court of Canterbury, whereby the judge of the said court did pronounce that you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, had offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England, and did monish you to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, as also from the use of incense, and from the mixing water with the wine during the administration of the said Holy Communion, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council did, on the 23rd Dec. 1868, agree to report to us their opinion in favour of the appeal of the said John Martin, that the decree of the court below ought to be amended to the extent hereinafter mentioned, that the principal cause ought to be retained, and therein that, in addition to the matters in which you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, were in the decree appealed from pronounced to have offended, and from which you were thereby monished to abstain for the future, you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie ought to be pronounced to have offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England, by having, within the said church of the new parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, knelt or prostrated yourself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and also by having within the said church used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light; and that you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, ought to be admonished to abstain for the future from kneeling or prostrating yourself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and also from using in the said church lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light; and further, that you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, ought to be condemned in the costs incurred on behalf of the said John Martin, as well in the court below as in the said appeal. And whereas, on the 14th Jan. 1869, we were pleased by and with the advice of our Privy Council to approve of the said report, and to order that the same should be carried into execution (justice so requiring) we do, therefore, humbly command you, the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, and from the use of incense, and from the mixing water with the wine during the administration of the said Holy Communion; and from kneeling or prostrating yourself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration; and also from using in the said church lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light. And hereof fail not.

"Given at London, under the seal which we use in this behalf, the 19th Jan. in the year of our Lord 1869. "H. C. ROTHERY,

"Her Majesty's Registrar (L.S.)"

The articles exhibited against the respondent in the Court of Arches and before the Judicial Committee charged, on the matters now in question, that he, in his church of St. Alban's, Holborn, on certain Sundays in the year 1866, during the prayer of consecration, in the order of the administration of the Holy Communion, elevated the paten above his head, and permitted and sanctioned such elevation, and took into his hands the cup, and elevated it above his head during the prayer of consecration, and permitted and sanctioned the cup to be so taken and elevated, and knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and permitted and sanctioned such kneeling or prostrating by other clerks in holy orders; and that he used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, and permitted and sanctioned such use of lighted candles.

The judgment of the Court of Arches in the cause was given on March 28, 1868; that of the Judicial Committee, varying on appeal the judgment below, was given on Dec. 23, 1868. (See 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 245; 19 Id. 503; L. Rep. 2. Adm. & Eccl. 116; Id. 2 Priv. Co. 365.)

The judgment of the Court of Arches was affirmed on the charge of elevation of the cup and paten (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 269, 70; 19 Id. 506); and was reversed on the charges of kneeling during the consecration prayer (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; 19 Id. 504-6), and of using lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272-8; 19 Id. 506-7).

The following affidavits were those on which the present motion was founded:—

The affidavits of Edward John Pond and Henry Daugar, sworn Nov. 18th, 1869:

1. That we attended Divine Service at the church of St. Alban's, Holborn, on Sunday morning, the 18th July 1869. That after Morning Prayer was concluded there was a celebration in the said church of the Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion. That we remained and were continuously present during the whole of such Morning Prayer and celebration of the Holy Communion.

2. That on the said occasion of the Holy Communion, the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie officiated as the celebrating priest. That during the whole of the Morning Prayer and Communion Service, there were seven lamps suspended from the ceiling of the church, over the chancel, each lamp containing a coloured light, which lights were burning during the whole of the Morning Prayer and Communion Service.

3. That at the commencement of the said Morning Prayer there were eight lighted candles upon a shelf, about six inches above the level of the Communion Table, and which appeared to form part thereof, two of such candles being in candlesticks, and six in two candelabra, holding three candles each, such candlesticks and candelabra standing upon the said shelf. The said eight candles were extinguished immediately before the commencement of the said Communion Service, up to which time they had been kept continuously burning.

4. That neither such lamps nor such candles were required for the purpose of giving light.

5. That when the said Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, in celebrating the said Communion Service, came to that part of the prayer of consecration at which the rubric directs the priest to take the paten into his hands, he paused in reading the said prayer; that during such pause, and before taking the paten into his hands, he bowed himself down to the Communion Table, so that his forehead nearly touched the same; he then stood upright, and immediately afterwards knelt down upon the steps leading to the Communion Table; that after kneeling for a few seconds, he rose and again stood up and took the paten into his hands, and raised it level with his head; that he then replaced the paten upon the Communion Table; that he then again bowed down to the Communion Table so that his forehead nearly touched the same; he then again stood upright, and immediately afterwards knelt down upon the steps leading to the Communion Table; that after kneeling for a few seconds he again rose, stood up and proceeded with the said prayer of consecration until he came to that part at which the rubric directs the priest to take the cup into his hands; he then again paused in reading the said prayer; that during such pause, and before taking the cup into his hands, he bowed himself down to the Communion Table, so that his forehead nearly touched the same; he then stood upright, and immediately afterwards knelt down upon the steps leading to the Communion Table; that after kneeling for a few seconds, he again rose and stood up, and took the cup into his hands and raised it level with his head; he then replaced the cup upon the Communion Table; he then again bowed down to the Communion Table, so that his forehead nearly touched the same; he then rose and stood upright, and immediately afterwards knelt down upon the steps leading to the Communion Table; that after kneeling for a few seconds he again rose, stood up, and proceeded with the said prayer of consecration.

6. That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, on handing the cup to the assistant priest, knelt down facing the priest, and bowed himself down very low, the said assistant priest at the same time holding up the cup as high as he could reach; the same was repeated when the said assistant priest returned the cup to the celebrant, after the communicants had partaken.

7. That we verily believe that the said pauses and bowing and kneeling, on the part of the said Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, were designed and intentional, and were not accidental or caused by any infirmity.

We further make oath, that we also attended divine service at the said church on the morning of Sunday, the 4th July, and on the morning of Sunday, the 11th July 1869; that on each of such occasions, after Morning Prayer was concluded, there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, and we remained and were continuously present in the said church during the whole of such services; that precisely the same ceremonial in reference to lamps, candles, prostration, kneeling, and adoration, as is hereinbefore set forth, was observed in the celebration of the Holy Communion on each of such last-mentioned Sundays; that on the latter of such occasions the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie was present and officiating at the celebration of the Holy Communion, but was not the celebrating priest.

There were also other affidavits, worded exactly as the above, referring to the ceremonial on various Sunday mornings in Oct and Nov. 1869.

A further affidavit of the above Edward John Pond, sworn 18th Nov. 1869, stated in addition, that, on Sunday morning, 14th Nov. 1869, "the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, on handing the cup to the assistant priest, knelt down facing the priest, and bowed himself down very low, the said assistant priest at the same time holding up the cup as high as he could reach; and the same was repeated when the said assistant priest returned the cup to the celebrant, after the communicants had partaken."

The following affidavit, it will be seen, differs from those above:

Affidavit of William Preston Willins, sworn 18th Nov. 1869:

1. That I attended Divine Service at the church of St. Alban, Holborn, on Sunday morning the 14th Nov. 1864. That after Morning Prayer was concluded, there was a celebration in the said church of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion. That I remained and was continuously present in the said church during the greater part of such Morning Prayer, and during the whole of such celebration of the Holy Communion.

2. That on the said occasion of the celebration of the Holy Communion, the Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie officiated as the celebrating priest. That during the whole Communion Service there were seven lamps suspended from the ceiling of the church over the chancel, each lamp containing a coloured light, which lights were burning during the whole of the Communion Service.

3. That during the said Morning Prayer there were eight lighted candles upon a shelf about six inches above the level of the Communion Table, and which appeared to form part thereof, two of such candles being in candlesticks, and six in two candelabra holding three candles each; such candlesticks and candelabra standing upon the said shelf. The said eight candles were extinguished immediately before the commencement of the said Communion Service, up to which time they had been kept continuously burning. That neither such lamps nor such candles were required for the purpose of giving light.

4. That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, in celebrating the said Holy Communion, commenced the reading of the consecration prayer in an audible tone; his tone then gradually became almost inaudible, so that his words could not be distinguished. Suddenly he bowed himself down, so that his forehead nearly touched the Communion Table; he then apparently knelt on one knee on the steps of the Communion Table; he then rose and stood upright, and taking the paten into his hands, raised the same to the level of his face; he then replaced the same on the Communion Table, and, after an interval of a few seconds, bowed as before, knelt as before, rose and stood upright as before; and then taking the cup into his hands, he raised the same to the level of his face, and afterwards replaced it on the Communion Table.

5. That the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, on handing the cup to the assistant priest, knelt down facing the priest and bowed himself down very low, the said assistant priest at the same time holding up the cup as high as he could reach. That I verily believe that the said pauses, and bowing, and kneeling on the part of the said Reverend Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, were designed and intentional, and were not accidental or caused by any infirmity.

I further make oath, that I also attended Divine service at the said church on the morning of Sunday the 31st Oct., and on the morning of Sunday the 7th Nov.; that on each of such occasions after morning prayer was concluded, there was a celebration of the Holy Communion; and I remained, and was continually present in the said church during the whole of such services. That precisely the same ceremonial, in reference to lamps, candles, prostration, kneeling, and adoration, as is hereinbefore set forth, was observed in the celebration of the Holy Communion on each of such last-mentioned Sundays. That on such occasions the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie was present and officiating at the celebration of the Holy Communion, but was not the celebrating priest.

Stephens, Q. C., with whom were Archibald and Droop, for the appellant.—Having stated the facts or the case and read the affidavits given above, submitted that the charge of disobedience to the monition was made out against the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR called attention to the wording of the affidavit as to the elevation of the paten and cup. The affidavit was obscure in not showing whether the act complained of was before or after the consecration of the elements. The present was a criminal charge, strict proof was necessary, and their Lordships should not be left to infer the very gist of the charge.

The Rev. A. H. Mackonochie (the respondent) in person:—I appear under protest: (1) Because there is no legal method by which this court can enforce this monition, and (2) because the monition itself was null and void, at least as regards the elevation of the cup and paten. I propose to argue now the second of these points. The monition was bad as to the elevation of the cup and paten, because not warranted by the articles filed against me, nor by the judgment of the Dean of Arches thereon. The monition represents the Dean of Arches to have admonished me "to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion" These terms are too general. The Dean of Arches admonished me (and this appears on the order in council) to abstain from such elevation "as pleaded in the articles." Now, the articles on this point charged that I elevated "above the head:" (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; L. Rep. 2 Adm. and Eccl. 118.) [The LORD CHANCELLOR observed that this was the amended form of the articles. Originally they contained the charge of elevating above the head "and otherwise;" but the latter words were struck out as too vague, by order of Dr. Lushington, the Dean of Arches.] The monition of the Dean of Arches, referring to the articles, was only to forbid the elevation therein charged, viz., "above the head." That this was so, appears further from his judgment, where he says (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 208), "The kind of elevation which it is charged that at one time Mr. Mackonochie practised, and as to which witnesses were examined before me, amounts upon the evidence to the following acts: That after the consecration, both of the bread and the wine, he elevated the paten and cup respectively for an appreciable time, after which there was a pause before the service was continued. . . . This elevation Mr. Mackonochie asserts, and it is not denied, that he discontinued after conference with his diocesan, and upon the other grounds to which I have already referred, before the institution of this suit. I am very glad that he did so, because, in my judgment, that kind of elevation was unlawful; and I must and do admonish Mr. Mackonochie not to recur to it. His present practice is not complained of, and some elevation the rubrics of the present Communion Service must contemplate, when they order as follows: 'Here the priest shall take the paten into his hands,' i.e., into both his hands; subsequently to which, he is ordered to break the bread. So also when he is directed to take the cup into his hand, there must be some elevation from the Holy Table." And at the end of his judgment (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 246), he says, "I further admonish him not to recur to the practices which he has abandoned under protest, with respect to the elevation of the Blessed Sacrament." The Dean of Arches, therefore, contemplated elevation "for an appreciable time," and "above the head," and forbad me to recur to this kind of elevation. But he did not forbid the elevation as practised by me at the time of the suit in the Arches. And my present practice is identically the same as it was at the time of that suit. On the charge as to kneeling, I submit that I have not had sufficient time. I had not notice till last Monday of the particulars of the charge. I am prepared to answer the affidavits if I have time for the purpose.

Stephens, Q. C. said that a copy of the affidavits had been sent by Moore and Currey (the appellant's proctors) to Brooks (who acted as proctor for the respondent in the former proceedings), and the receipt had been acknowledged by him on Nov. 19 last.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (after some deliberation among their Lordships), said: We think that the respondent ought to have an opportunity of preparing affidavits, and that he ought not to suffer from delay in serving him with notice. He may, therefore, file affidavits to-day (Thursday), and the appellant may file affidavits in reply to-morrow. Meanwhile the further hearing must stand over till Saturday next.

Dec. 4.—The following affidavits had been filed since the last hearing:—

Affidavit of the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, sworn 2nd Dec. 1869:

1. The manner of elevation of the cup and paten at the said church of St. Alban's, during the consecration prayer in the service for the administration of the Holy Communion, adopted and sanctioned by me, has invariably been one and the same since I discontinued the elevation above the head from the 30th Dec. 1866, and is the same as that of which Sir Robert Phillimore, in his judgment in this case in the Court of Arches, said, "His present practice is not complained of:" (See 18 L. T Rep. N. S. 270.)

2. I did not, on either of the days or times mentioned in the affidavits on which this motion is founded, and sworn on the 18th Nov. last, nor have I ever since the service of the said monition on me, prostrated myself, or knelt on steps leading to the Communion Table, or elsewhere, when celebrating the Holy Communion, during any part of the consecration prayer. I admit that it is my practice during the prayer of consecration when celebrating Holy Communion, and whilst standing before the Holy Table, reverently to bend one knee at certain parts of the said prayer, and occasionally in so doing my knee momentarily touches the ground, but such touching of the ground is no part of the act of reverence intended by me. Whether my knee may have thus momentarily touched the ground on either of the days mentioned in the said affidavits on which I am stated to be the celebrating priest, I am of course unable to say.

Affidavit of the Rev. Henry Aston Walker. Sworn 2nd Dec. 1869:

1. I am and have been, ever since the consecration of the church, one of the curates of St. Alban's church, Holborn, and am generally present during the celebration of Divine service and of the Holy Communion at that church, and am well acquainted with the manner in which the Holy Communion is there celebrated.

2. I was present in the chancel during the celebration of the Holy Communion at that church on the 18th June 18·9, and the 14th Nov. 1869, referred to in the affidavits of Edward John Pond and Henry Dangar, Francis Beames and William Preston Willins, sworn respectively on the 18th Nov. last, and I say that the manner of elevating the paten and cup on those occasions was in all respects the same as that which has been invariably adopted by the respondent in that church since the 30th Dec. 1866, when the respondent discontinued the practice of elevating above the head, and in respect of which Sir Robert Phillimore, in his judgment in the Court of Arches in this case, said, "His present practice is not complained of."

3. The respondent did not prostrate himself or kneel upon the steps leading to the Communion Table, or elsewhere, at any time during the prayer of consecration, on the 18th July and the 14th Nov. 1869, as mentioned in the said affidavits; and, to the best of my belief, he did not touch the ground with either of his knees at all during that time on the occasions on which the respondent is accused of doing so. And having regard to the positions of the celebrating and assisting priests during the consecration prayer, as well as to the length and nature of their dress, I do not believe that it is possible for any person in the body of the church to say whether the respondent did kneel or not.

Affidavit of the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, sworn 3rd Dec. 1869:—

1. That ever since the monition of this court in the above cause was served upon me I have endeavoured to obey it. And,

2. That I have never intentionally or advisedly in any respect disobeyed it, or sanctioned any practices contrary to that monition.

Affidavit of Francis Beames, sworn 3rd Dec. 1868:—

That after the kneeling mentioned in the last line but one of the fifth paragraph (of the affidavit sworn by me on 18th Nov. 1869), the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie did not again take into his hand, or lay his hand upon, or in any way touch the said cup during the prayer of consecration, as I believe.

Affidavit of Edward John Pond, sworn Dec. 3, 1869:—

That after the kneeling mentioned in the last line but one of the fifth paragraph (of the affidavit sworn by me on 18th Nov. 1869), the said Alexander Heriot Mackonochie did not again during the prayer of consecration, to the best of my belief, take into his hands, or lay his hands upon, or in any way touch the said cup, and that if he had done so, from the position I occupied, I must have seen him do so.

The Rev. A. H. Mackonochie (proceeding with his argument):—The monition warned me to abstain from "kneeling or prostrating myself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration." Taking the question of kneeling first. I maintain, as shown by my affidavits, that I have not so knelt. The Dean of Arches said in his judgment (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 210) that "no charge of adoration of the Holy Sacrament itself, or of our Lord's body, being present after a corporal manner in the Holy Sacrament, was contained in the articles," and that "the argument was confined to the allegation of excessive or improper kneeling," and the Dean added that he was "far from saying that it was not competent to the priest to adopt that attitude of devotion," viz., kneeling. [Lord CHELMSFORD.—What you have to look at on the question of kneeling is the monition of the Privy Council, which on this point reversed the judgment of the Arches Court. The judgment may be referred to, to explain that monition, but not further.] This being a criminal proceeding, the strictest construction of the words of the monition ought to be adopted, and if, on that construction, it should appear that I have given a fair and reasonable obedience, I am entitled to a favourable judgment. Now, to "kneel" strictly means to "bear oneself upon the knees," as defined in Bailey's Dictionary. There are two essentials to the act; the knees must rest upon the ground, and that for an appreciable time. It is true that Johnson's Dictionary gives a different definition of "kneel," as, "to perform the act of genuflection, to bend the knee," but the examples he gives of that use of the word are the following passages:

> When thou dost ask me blessing, I'll kneel down,
> And ask of thee forgiveness.
> Shakesp. (King Lear.)

> Ere I was risen from the place that shew'd
> My duty kneeling, came a reeking post,
> Stew'd in his haste, half breathing, panting forth
> From Goneril, his mistress, salutation.
> Id.

A certain man, kneeling down to him, said, Lord, have mercy upon my son, for he is lunatic.

St. Matth. xvii., 14.

"As soon as you are dressed, kneel down and say the Lord's Prayer:" (Bp. Taylor's Guide to Devotion.) [Lord CHELMSFORD.—You say then that genuflection is not kneeling?] Yes; the mere bending of one knee, even if there be a momentary touching of the ground with it, would not be kneeling. "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow," this surely does not mean kneeling? [The Lord Chancellor.—Must we not understand your affidavit to mean that you bend the knee for the purpose of reverence?] Yes; certainly; but the point is as to the act, whether there was a kneeling within the terms of the monition, not as to the motive of the act: (See the judgment of Lord Cairns, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505; L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 384). The affidavit of Mr. Walker shows that there might easily have been a misapprehension on the part of the witnesses, who, looking from the body of the church, say that I knelt down. As to prostration, I contend that this means bending down with the face very low towards the ground, if not actually to touch it. The affidavits in support of the present charge do not assert that I did any such thing. As to elevation (the Rev. respondent repeated what he had said on Thursday, and added that), on the affidavits of myself and Mr. Walker, it appears that my present practice is that which I have invariably adopted, since I relinquished, from Dec. 30, 1866, the practice of elevating above my head. [Lord Chelmsford.—Is your present practice to elevate to a level with your head, but not above it?] Yes; or rather to the level of my face. The articles charged elevation "above the head," the monition referred to elevation "as pleaded in the articles," and I therefore submit that no disobedience to the monition has been shown in this respect. As to lighted candles, the monition directed me to abstain from using "lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of giving light." Now, it appears from the judgment of the Privy Council, that the essence of my offence was the using of lighted candles "on the Communion Table," and "during, with reference to, and as an accompaniment of, the Communion Service," i. e., at a particular place and a particular time. The affidavits show only that there were lamps over the chancel, not on the Communion Table, and lighted candles on the Communion Table, extinguished before the commencement of the Communion Service. The evidence, therefore, is insufficient. In conclusion, I have to assure your Lordshps that I have endeavoured to comply with the monitions of the several courts, and that I have not intentionally, or advisedly disobeyed this monition. I submit that I have shown an obedience to the strict terms of the monition, and that I am entitled to ask for protection from proceedings vexatious in their character.

Stephens, Q. C. in reply.—The respondent said that he appeared under protest. If he meant that there is no method of enforcing the monition, I propose to address your Lordships on that point. [The Lord Chancellor.—We need not hear you upon that.] The question is whether the respondent has given a substantial obedience to the monition. The monition must be construed with reference to the Book of Common Prayer, obedience to the rubrics of which it was the very object of the monition to enforce. Now, the rubric to the consecration prayer in the Communion Service clearly intended, not that there should be any formal elevation of the paten and cup, but that each should be raised from the table sufficiently to comply with the direction to the priest to take them into his hands. The rubric, in fact, orders merely the taking into the hands. The respondent has so far complied with the rubric. But the monition ordered the respondent not to elevate, and this he admits that he has done. [Sir Joseph Napier.—The monition certainly forbids "elevation" generally, but the articles must be referred to to explain what elevation was meant, and they say "above the head.] The respondent referred to the judgment of the Dean of Arches, who said that "his present practice was not complained of." That only meant that that practice was not before the court. The passage that follows does not sanction any elevation further than that necessary for compliance with the directions in the rubric: (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 270; L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Eccl. 209.) The affidavits also proved that when the respondent handed the cup to the assistant priest, the latter held up the cup as high as he could reach." And the respondent would be responsible for the act of the assistant priest. [The Rev. A. H. Mackonochie observed that this act did not occur during the consecration prayer, and so was not within the terms of the monition.] As to kneeling, the term includes genuflection. And, further, kneeling was held by the Privy Council to be illegal, not from any consideration as to the degree of it, but because it was a violation of the rubric: (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505; L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 384.) And a genuflection would be as much a violation of the rubric as an actual kneeling. He should contend that there had been a non-compliance with the monition, and must ask their Lordships to enforce it, with costs, against the respondent.

Judgment was delivered by the Lord Chancellor.—In this case a motion has been made calling upon their Lordships to take proceedings in order to enforce the monition which has been served upon the reverend respondent with regard to the execution of a sentence pronounced in the first instance by the Court of Arches. This sentence was in some degree extended and modified by the judgment which this committee was called upon to pronounce, or rather by the decision which they were called upon, after argument, to recommend as fit to be made by an order of Her Majesty in Council. The order provided for several matters; as to three of which only it is now alleged that there has been a breach by the respondent of the monition issued in pursuance of the order. Those three matters are: First, that he continues to elevate the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion; secondly, that he continues to kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration; and, thirdly, that he continues to use lighted candles on the Communion Table at times when such lighted candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light. In order to see how far that which is complained of has been a breach of the monition, we must of course in the first instance look to the monition itself. The monition having recited that the respondent was pronounced to have offended against the statutes, laws, constitutions, and canons of the Church of England, by having knelt or prostrated himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration, and also by having within the said church elevated the cup and paten during the Holy Communion, and also by having used lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such lighted candles were not wanted for the purpose of light, proceeds to direct him to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, and from kneeling or prostrating himself before the elements during the prayer of consecration, and also from using in the said church lighted candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion, at times when such candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light. The evidence which is before their Lordships is addressed to these three several heads. We will deal with them in a different order from that in which they appear in the prayer of the application, and take the use of lighted candles on the Communion Table at times when such candles are not wanted for the purpose of giving light, in the first instance, because with reference to that part of the case it appears to their Lordships that the affidavits do not make out the offence charged. In the first place, it appears that the offence charged is not in strict conformity with the monition, because the monition is itself confined to using those candles on the Communion Table during the celebration of the Holy Communion; and the charge which is made in the motion now before this committee is, that they were used on the Communion Table at times when they were not wanted for the purpose of giving light, leaving out the words "during the time of Holy Communion." Of course it is not competent for their Lordships to proceed beyond the actual monition which has been served upon the respondent. It is that which he is said to have disobeyed, and it is to disobedience of the monition only that their Lordships can address themselves. It is plain upon the affidavits that the candles have not been lighted during the Holy Communion, for the course taken by the respondent has been this, that the candles are lighted as he says they always have been, and were at the time of the proceedings herein being taken, and are kept burning up to the period of the Holy Communion, and then immediately before the commencement of the Holy Communion they are extinguished. There is no doubt, therefore, in this case of a literal compliance with the terms of the monition. The candles are not lighted during the period of the Holy Communion. They are lighted, indeed, when there is no necessity for their being lighted for the purpose of giving light, but they are extinguished before the Holy Communion; therefore the compliance with the terms of the monition has been literal and complete, and not, in that sense, evasive, for the respondent was limited to a particular time, in reference to the candles; and whatever one may feel as to the course of the reverend respondent, looking to the spirit of the monition, of course the monition could not go beyond the matters that were charged; the offence charged was one which he has abstained from; and in this respect, therefore, their Lordships are clear that the prayer of this motion cannot be complied with. The next charge is that he continues to elevate the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion; and with reference to this matter, their Lordships feel that the case is placed in a position that is eminently unsatisfactory. On the former occasion the sentence of the judge in the court below was approved of with reference to this particular subject matter; therefore, that sentence is the sentence to which recourse must be had by their Lordships when interpreting the monition, which cannot of course proceed further than the sentence itself. The sentence in the court below was thus worded: the respondent was ordered "to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, and also from the use of incense and from the mixing of water with the wine during the administration of the Holy Communion, as pleaded in the articles." Their Lordships think that the words "as pleaded in the articles," must be applied to those several offences which were charged in the passage just quoted, namely, the elevation of the cup and paten, also the use of incense, and the mixing of water with wine; and their Lordships are thrown back, therefore, to the articles to see what it was that was there pleaded, and they find this state of circumstances. Originally the third article pleaded that there was an elevation of the cup and paten beyond what was necessary for the purpose of complying with the terms of the rubric, which directs that at a particular part of the prayer of consecration, when the sacred elements are dealt with, the paten shall be taken into the hands, and at another part that the cup shall be taken into the hand or hands (for there is some little variation in the two parts of the rubric itself) of the officiating minister. That would have been, as it appears to all their Lordships, a charge which would have raised a distinct and definite issue, whether the elevation of the paten or the elevation of the cup were or were not a bonâ fide raising it so far only as is necessary for anything to be raised, that is, to be taken from the table, or whether or not there was some ulterior purpose, that is to say, an act of elevation wholly distinct from and going beyond what was necessary for the mere purpose of taking the paten and cup into the hands of the officiating minister. But the words, "and otherwise," were also inserted in the same third article in a part which rendered it very difficult to attach any definite sense to them. Those words are so vague that the learned judge before whom the case first came, Dr. Lushington, conceived that he could not admit the article in that form, and that the words introduced such a degree of vagueness as to render it improper to call upon the respondent to answer the charge in its then shape, and therefore the learned judge said that the article must be reformed. In the reforming of that article, those who reformed it appear to have gone beyond anything that was required by the decision of the learned judge in the course of the argument upon the admission of the articles. They not merely struck out these words, "and otherwise," but they also materially varied the language by describing definitely in the reformed article the act which had been performed, namely, that it was an elevation of the elements "above the head of the respondent." The article then became confined to that particular mode of elevation, instead of being a charge of elevation beyond what was necessary for the proper compliance with the rubric, and, therefore, when the sentence of the judge, which directs that he shall abstain for the future from the elevation "as pleaded in the articles," is considered, it appears to their Lordships that they are necessarily confined to that particular charge which is there contained, and that particular mode of elevation which is there complained of. We have been thus particular in going through all the circumstances of this case, which is left, as it appears to their Lordships, in a very unsatisfactory position, because it is most desirable, and their Lordships are all of opinion that it should be distinctly understood that they give no sanction whatever to a notion that any elevation whatever of the elements, as distinguished from the mere act of removing them from the table and taking them into the hand of the minister, is sanctioned by law. It is not necessary for their Lordships to say more (but most undoubtedly less we cannot say) than that we feel nothing has taken place in the course of this cause that can possibly justify a conclusion that any elevation whatever, as distinguished from the raising from the table, is proper or is sanctioned. All that their Lordships can say upon the present occasion is, that the point has never yet been in these proceedings raised, that a particular and definite mode of elevation only has been averred and complained of, and with that particular and definite mode of elevation we have nothing further to do, because it is conceded on all sides that such particular mode has been departed from. It is not for us to say how far the letter, to which the respondent himself has referred, and in a part of which he says that the simple compliance with the rubric, namely, taking the cup and the paten into his hands, would be sufficient for the purpose of satisfying a certain portion of his parishioners as regards the elevation of the elements, may or may not have misled the judges who had this case before them. They say that the matter complained of having been discontinued, had not been complained of, that is by the articles; and we have felt it to be right and proper to say that nothing we are now determining can, therefore, be pleaded hereafter as a justification for any mode of elevation which is to be distinguished from the mere act of removing the elements from the table and taking them into the hands of the minister. Inasmuch, then, as the reverend respondent has said upon oath, and it is not now contravened, that his course of procedure has only been that which he says he adopted at the time of the first hearing of the matter, owing to the complaint made of the higher elevation spoken of in the articles, their Lordships think they cannot in that state of circumstances say that he has thereby committed a breach of the monition which has been served upon him. The third matter which has been complained of is as follows; and as to this matter their Lordships think the case is open to very different considerations: The respondent was admonished "not to kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration;" and, without going through the affidavits, the exact state of circumstances may be taken to be as they appear upon the affidavits made by the respondent himself and by Mr. Walker, the gentleman who was present on the several occasions referred to in the motion. The affidavits in support of the motion stated distinctly acts of prostration and of kneeling during the period of the prayer of consecration. Into the details of those affidavits it is unnecessary to enter, because in the affidavit of the respondent there is this which seems to set the case in a very clear light as far as the facts are concerned. The respondent says, "I did not on either of the days or times mentioned in the affidavits on which this motion is founded, nor have I ever since the service of the said monition on me, prostrated myself or knelt on steps leading to the Communion Table, or elsewhere, when celebrating the Holy Communion during any part of the consecration prayer. I admit that it is my practice during the prayer of consecration, when celebrating the Holy Communion,"—the time, therefore, is exactly fixed to which the monition would apply,—"and whilst standing before the holy table, reverently to bend one knee at certain parts of the said prayer, and occasionally in so doing my knee momentarily touches the ground, but such touching of the ground is no part of the act of reverence intended by me. Whether my knee may have thus momentarily touched the ground on either of the days mentioned in the said affidavits on which I am stated to be the celebrating priest, I am, of course, unable to say." Mr. Walker is a little bolder upon that point, because he says this,—he was present on these days—"I say that the respondent did not prostrate himself or kneel upon the steps leading to the Communion Table or elsewhere at any time during the prayer of consecration on the 18th July and the 14th Nov. 1869, as mentioned in the affidavits; and to the best of my belief he did not touch the ground with either of his knees at all during that time on the occasions on which the respondent is accused of doing so." Then he further says this: "And having regard to the positions of the celebrating and assisting priests during the consecration prayer, as well as to the length and nature of their dress, I do not believe that it is possible for any person in the body of the church to say whether the respondent did kneel or not." Therefore, the case as stated is this, Mr. Mackonochie being enjoined against kneeling during this prayer, admits a gesture which he contends is not kneeling, but he admits a bowing of his knee, a bowing of it to an extent which occasions it at times momentarily to touch the ground, a bowing of it to an extent which renders it impossible (according to Mr. Walker's affidavit) for anybody to see whether he is or is not kneeling,—that is the distinct statement in the affidavits, viz., that nobody could see whether he is kneeling or not. First of all their Lordships would consider the literal question which is before them, whether there has been even a literal compliance with the monition in this act of Mr. Mackonochie. Their Lordships are all of opinion that there has not been even a literal compliance; that Mr. Mackonochie has knelt; and that bowing the knee in the manner which he has described is kneeling; and that it is not necessary that a person should touch the ground in order to perform such an act of reverence as will constitute kneeling. Of course there may be such a bowing of the knee as would not amount to kneeling in the sense of the monition, but Mr. Mackonochie very properly says that he takes no advantage of any suggestion of that sort—there may be an accidental bowing of the knee, arising from fatigue or otherwise; but here is a knee bent for the purpose of reverence, and in such a manner that those who behold cannot tell whether or not what Mr. Mackonochie and Mr. Walker call kneeling, that is, touching the ground with the knee, has been arrived at, and indeed Mr. Mackonochie says that at certain times his knee has momentarily touched the ground. This seems to their Lordships to be literally kneeling. But the case must be put much higher than that, because neither this tribunal nor any tribunal will suffer its orders to be tampered with by mere evasion; and a mere evasion it would be, to allow a person when ordered not to kneel (the whole gist and purport of the order, as I shall presently show, being the kneeling by way of reverence) to say, "I did all that I could do towards so kneeling; I bowed my knee; I nearly touched the ground with it—I did not quite touch the ground, but I did it in such a manner that all my congregation, all who were attending and seeing that which I did, could not possibly tell whether I were kneeling in that sense or not." It would be intolerable to allow any order to be trifled with in such a manner as must be implied if their Lordships were to give place for a moment to any such argument on the part of Mr. Mackonochie as that this was a compliance with the order. Now, with reference to this particular matter of kneeling, it is one, undoubtedly, of very great importance as regards the judgment which has been pronounced, and the occasion of that judgment. We cannot do better, with reference to this part of the subject, than to call attention to the purport and intent of the Book of Common Prayer, when prescribing what is to be done, and in omitting to prescribe that which it does not intend to be done. For that purpose I will refer to the judgment which was pronounced by Lord Cairns, as the judgment of the Judicial Committee on the former occasion. His Lordship thus expresses himself in that judgment (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 505; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 382):—"Their Lordships are of opinion that it is not open to a minister of the church, or even to their Lordships, in advising Her Majesty as the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of appeal, to draw a distinction, in acts which are a departure from or violation of the rubric, between those which are important and those which appear to be trivial. The object of a Statute of Uniformity is, as its preamble expresses, to produce an 'universal agreement in the public worship of Almighty God,'—an object which would be wholly frustrated if each minister, on his own view of the relative importance of the details of the service, were to be at liberty to omit, or add to, or alter any of those details. The rule upon this subject has been already laid down by the Judicial Committee in Westerton v. Liddell, Moo. Spec. Rep. 156, and their Lordships are disposed entirely to adhere to it: 'In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be permitted.'" And then upon this very subject matter his Lordship further proceeds to say,—"There would indeed be no difficulty in showing that the posture of the celebrating minister during all the parts of the Communion Service was, and that for obvious reasons, deemed to be of no small importance in the changes introduced into the Prayer Book at and after the Reformation. The various stages of the service are, as has already been shown, fenced and guarded by directions of the most minute kind, as to standing and kneeling, the former attitude being prescribed even for prayers, during which a direction to kneel might have been expected. And it is not immaterial to observe that whereas in the first Prayer Book of King Edward VI., there was contained at the end a rubric in these words:—'As touching kneeling, crossing, holding up of hands, knocking upon the breast, and other gestures, they may be used or left as every man's devotion serveth, without blame,'—this rubric was in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., and in all the subsequent Prayer Books, omitted." We may further add an observation as to the extreme care which is taken in the Prayer Book to guard all persons who might feel a scruple with reference to kneeling at the reception of the Holy Communion from any inference that might thereby be raised in their minds of a nature contrary to that which was intended by the Prayer Book itself to be expressed, namely, any intention of adoration of the holy elements. This is most particularly and carefully guarded against, and the reason for such kneeling is explained, and said to be "for a signification of our humble and grateful acknowledgment of the benefit of Christ, therein given to all worthy receivers, and for the avoiding of such profanation and disorder in the Holy Communion as might otherwise ensue." Then it is explained: "Yet lest the same kneeling should by any persons, either out of ignorance and infirmity, or out of malice and obstinacy, be misconstructed and depraved, it is hereby declared, that thereby no adoration is intended, or ought to be done, either unto the sacramental bread and wine there bodily received, or unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood. For the sacramental bread and wine remain still in their very natural substances, and therefore may not be adored; for that were idolatry, to be abhorred of all faithful Christians." And, again, carefully does our Church provide in her 28th Article against any such adoration as we have spoken of by this declaration—"The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." Now that being so, and it being of the utmost importance that for the purposes of common prayer such union should be preserved as is essential to the happiness and comfort of all who are joining in this most holy ordinance; what can be a greater offence than the offence of either by addition or omission occasioning trouble or confusion in the minds of those who are invited to join in common prayer, and in one common act of reverence? Acts of reverence, where necessary, are enjoined; and the use of additional acts of reverence, where they are not enjoined, is, according to the judgment which has been pronounced in this very matter, a thing prohibited. If, therefore, the reverend respondent, in performing his own special act of reverence, does it in such a manner that no one can tell whether he is not doing the very thing which he is prohibited from doing, and has performed that special act of reverence at a time when there is no direction in the Book or Common Prayer for that performance, he certainly does that which militates, in every possible view of the case, both in letter and spirit, against the monition which he has received, and the reasoning which occasioned the monition to be issued. Whether or not Mr. Mackonochie can reconcile it with his view of what is right, that a judgment of this kind should be so narrowly scrutinized, that every possible limit should be placed upon it, and that notwithstanding the reasons which are assigned for it, namely, the desire of promoting uniformity in com non worship, it should be, as far as possible evaded, it is not for their Lordships to say. There may be some who feel great grief and sorrow at any act which may appear to be at variance with the common charity and love that should induce us at all times when assembled for worship, and most especially this highest and holiest act of worship, to be as far as possible of one mind, so that then at least our unity be not disturbed. But what one is justified in saying, as regards the act which is now complained of as a breach of the monition, is this, that it is not possible, happily, to reconcile with the administration of our law in its narrowest sense, any mere evasion of that which the law sanctions, of that which the law has ordered, by an authority which binds this reverend gentleman, as it binds every subject of the realm, to strict obedience. That obedience may be rendered grudgingly, if so it must be; it may be rendered in a manner which I am sure the reverend gentleman would not tolerate on the part of any of his flock, if it were a question of obedience to a higher power; it may be rendered, therefore, strictly within the limits which are exactly prescribed by the monition, but that monition may not be evaded. A mere literal compliance is not all that even the law requires; the compliance must not be literal in a sense which is but evasive. I will not, in the name of their Lordships, say more upon what I confess presses upon me individually very strongly, the narrowness of obedience shown by the course taken, as to keeping the candles lighted until the very moment when they are forbidden, and then extinguishing them, and as to the elevation of the elements to something which, even on the affidavits themselves, appears to me to be more than necessary for simply taking the cup and paten into the hands of the officiating clergyman, since we have been obliged to hold that these acts were, nevertheless, in literal compliance with the monition having reference to the articles. But here, in this matter of the kneeling, their Lordships find that there is, first, not even a literal compliance with the order; and, secondly, if upon any strained interpretation of the word "kneeling" (for strained as it appears to their Lordships it would be), they could arrive at the conclusion that they did not preclude the act of bowing one knee so low that it must at times touch the ground, and in a manner which cannot possibly be distinguished from kneeling by those who witness the act; still, if it was a representation of the forbidden act, as nearly as the party charged dared to represent it, and in such a guise as to convey to all at a distance the impression that the act of kneeling was really performed, that would be a species of evasion of the order which a court of justice would find it right and due to the maintenance of its own force and vigour to visit as being itself a breach of the order which had been made. For these reasons it has seemed to their Lordships (and it is the opinion of us all) to say that there has been a clear breach of this special monition. Their Lordships next take into consideration what is proper and right to be done. They did not hear Mr. Stephens upon the question as to whether or not this tribunal has the means of enforcing its orders. Happily it has been supplied

(and I say happily, because it would be in vain to establish a tribunal which has no power to enforce its orders) with abundant means for that purpose by the statutes which have been passed in that behalf; but into the examination of those means, and the different modes that might be adopted for that purpose, we are not, for the reason I am presently going to mention, about to enter. In declining to take any more severe step than that of compelling Mr. Mackonochie to pay the costs of this discussion their Lordships have had to consider the affidavit which was last made by him, and to which they have been desirous to give the most favourable construction and allowance; and in that affidavit Mr. Mackonochie very properly says that he never intentionally or advisedly, in any respect, disobeyed the monition, or sanctioned any practice contrary to its provisions. I confess I think, as I have already intimated, that Mr. Mackonochie takes an extremely narrow view of that which the word "obedience" ordinarily implies, when he says that he has endeavoured to obey this order, but he does say that which, in a sense, for the purpose of clearing his contempt, he may have a right to claim the benefit of, that he never intentionally or advisedly, in any respect, disobeyed the monition. He now, we hope, will learn that mere literal compliance in a merely evasive manner will not suffice. Literal compliance with regard to the actual limits of the order is, of course, all that he is held to in law; for an obedience to the spirit of the order, we can only trust to his own feelings and his own conscience. And when he thus tells us that it has not been, and is not his desire wilfully to disobey the law, or to disregard its monition, their Lordships think that they are bound, upon this first occasion of the matter being brought before them of any non-compliance with the order, to allow Mr. Mackonochie the benefit of that affidavit; and they do not think it necessary, on the present occasion, to do more, after expressing their opinion judicially that the monition has been disobeyed with reference to kneeling during the prayer of consecration, than to mark their disapprobation of such a course of proceeding by directing that he should pay the costs of the present application. Their Lordships make no further order.

Nov. 9 and 10, and Dec. 3.

JAMES v. LITCHFIELD.

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Property sold as freehold—Part of property subject to lease—Notice of tenancy by purchaser—Compensation—Abatement.

Notice of a tenancy is notice of the extent of the tenant's interest as between vendor and purchaser.

A vendor agreed to sell certain property, and to deliver it to the purchaser as freehold. The purchaser, at the date of the contract, was aware that A., a third party, was in occupation of part of the property; he afterwards found out that A. had a lease for thirteen years of the property in his occupation.

On a bill by the purchaser for specific performance, with an abatement from the purchase-money in respect of A.'s interest:

Held, that he was entitled to no such abatement, inasmuch as, having notice of A.'s tenancy, he was bound to inquire into the extent of A.'s interest:

Held, also, that he was entitled to a decree for specific performance without an abatement, but that he must pay the costs of the suit.

This was a purchaser's suit for specific performance.

The defendant was the owner in fee of certain copyhold hereditaments situate at Hanwell, and consisting of five houses and about six acres of land. Two of the houses and a piece of land behind them were in the occupation of the plaintiff.

On the 12th Nov. 1868 the plaintiff wrote to the defendant and offered him 5000*l.* for the whole of the property; and on the 19th of the same month the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff accepting his offer; it was in the following words:—

Lower Norwood, Nov. 19, 1868.

Dear Sir, I accept your offer of 5000*l.* for my property at Hanwell, consisting of five houses and about six acres of land, provided a deposit of 500*l.* be paid to me to-morrow at one o'clock, and for the above sum I agree to deliver to you the said property as freehold, and to enter into a formal contract for the carrying out of the same as soon as it can be drawn up by my solicitor.—I am, my dear Sir, yours truly, WILLIAM LITCHFIELD.

C. W. James, Esq.

P. S. The meeting to be at the office of Mr. Bennett, 30, Friday-street, Cannon-street.

The deposit of 500*l.* was duly paid on the following day, and the defendant wrote on the back of his letter of the 19th Nov. a receipt in the following form:—

20th Nov. 1868.

Received the deposit of five hundred pounds, the timber to be included in the contract. WILLIAM LITCHFIELD.

Early in the following month the defendant's solicitor, Mr. Bennett, sent to the plaintiff's solicitors, Messrs. Dawson, Bryan, and Dawson, a formal agreement for the purchase, which for the first time disclosed to the plaintiff that a Mr. Allen had an agreement for a lease for twenty-one years from Christmas 1861, of five and a half acres of the land comprised in purchase, at the yearly rent of 23*l.* 10*s.*

A long correspondence ensued between the solicitors of the parties, the plaintiff's solicitors requiring an abatement from the purchase-money in respect of Mr. Allen's interest in the property; this being refused by the defendant, the present suit was instituted.

The bill prayed that the contract of the 20th Nov. 1868 might be specifically performed; that an abatement might be made from the plaintiff's purchase-money in respect of the agreement for a lease to Mr. Allen of the land, and that the defendant might be ordered to pay damages to the plaintiff for the loss sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of the non-performance of the contract.

It was not denied that the plaintiff, at the date of the contract, knew that the land was in the occupation of Allen, and the question was whether he was bound to ascertain the extent of Allen's interest in the land.

Southgate, Q. C. and F. Waller, for the plaintiff, submitted that as the vendor was unable to deliver the property as freehold in accordance with the terms of the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree with an abatement from the purchase-money. They cited

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and *W. W. Southgate, Q. C. replied.

Dec. 3.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit for the specific performance of a contract with compensation, or rather abatement in respect of a portion of the property which is subject to a lease of which thirteen years are unexpired. The defendant, the vendor, in November of last year owned in fee certain copyhold hereditaments at Hanwell, in Middlesex, consisting of five houses and six acres of land. Two of those houses were then and still are in the occupation of the plaintiff. Another of the houses was then, and still is, in the occupation of a person of the name of Allen; the two other houses were then, and still are, in the occupation of two other persons who are yearly tenants. The five houses are adjoining each other, and the piece of land or orchard, consisting of six acres, lies immediately behind them. On the 12th Nov. 1868 the plaintiff wrote the following letter to the defendant. [His Lordship read it, and the letter in reply of the 19th Nov., and stated the circumstances relating to the discovery of Allen's lease, and continued.] The plaintiff insists that the great value of the land in his eyes consisted in the circumstance that the possession of it would begin at once in order to let it out on building leases, and he submits that he is entitled to compensation for this undisclosed encumbrance of which he had no notice prior to the receipt of the draft agreement. The plaintiff in his evidence does not deny that he knew that Allen was the tenant of this property, and the real question to be determined is, whether this knowledge put him on inquiry to learn from Allen the nature, extent, and character of his tenancy. The case of Daniels v. Davison (sup.) determines that, as between the tenant himself and the purchaser, the purchaser was bound to inquire, and cannot dispute the tenant's right. Does that duty apply to the case between vendor and purchaser as well as between purchaser and tenant? I have found no case exactly in point, but the principle appears to me to be the same and to be applicable to both cases. Why is the purchaser bound to inquire as regards the tenant, and yet not bound to inquire as regards his rights against the vendor? The principle is thus stated in argument in that case (Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 251): "Whatever puts a purchaser upon inquiry shall be held notice; and if, therefore, he knows that a tenant is in possession, he is considered as having notice of the whole extent of his interest." This is adopted by the Lord Chancellor (Eldon), who decides accordingly; and I am unable to see any reason for a technical and, as it appears to me, an arbitrary distinction which should fix the application of the rule to one person, not extending it to all persons whatsoever If the purchaser, knowing of the tenancy, is bound to inquire as regards the tenant as to his interest in the land, and if the purchaser must be taken to be bound to know what would be the result of such inquiry as regards the tenant, why should he not be so bound as regards the vendor? And if the purchaser chooses to bind himself by agreement with the vendor, knowing of the tenancy, but without having accurately ascertained what was the extent and character of it, and what the results of such inquiry would have led to, he must, as it appears to me, be bound in the same manner as regards all other persons. I think also that no distinction can properly be drawn in a court of equity, because the matter rests in contract, and the conveyance of the legal estate has not been made to him. The purchaser bound himself by contract; he must be taken to have had present to his mind all those things of which he had notice, and those things which necessarily flow from and were incidental to that notice. He knew that Allen was tenant of this land; he was bound to inquire what the tenancy was, unless he was willing to be bound by the tenancy whatever it was. Why should he be bound by the fact that Allen was tenant, and yet not bound by the fact of what the extent of his interest was under that tenancy? I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to no abatement in respect of Allen's interest in the land. He may, however, take a decree for specific performance without any abatement from the purchase money if he so elects, but he must in any event pay the costs of the suit.

*Sale of land by auction—Reserved price—Employment of puffer—*30 & 31 Vict. c. 48.

Since the passing of the Sale of Land by Auction Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 48) the employment of a puffer renders a sale void unless it is expressly stated in the conditions of sale that a right to bid is reserved.

Consequently, where the conditions stated that the land would be sold subject to a reserved price, and, no right to bid being reserved, a puffer was employed by the vendor:

Held, that the sale was void, notwithstanding the fact that the puffer did not bid beyond the reserved price, and that the land was knocked down to the purchaser at the reserved price.

Adjourned summons.

In this case certain lands in Sussex were put up for sale by auction by order of the court. Among the conditions of sale was one to the effect that the sale was subject to a reserved price, which had been fixed by the judge to whose court the cause was attached. The conditions did not reserve a right to bid.

The property was knocked down to a Mr. Bridges for 29,000*l.*, the reserved price. The purchaser, having afterwards discovered that a puffer had been employed to bid up to the reserved price, and that he did, in fact, bid up to 28,900*l.*, took out a summons to set aside the purchase on the ground that the employment of a puffer where no right to bid was reserved by the conditions of sale, was illegal under the provisions of the Sale of Land by Auction Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 48), by the 5th section of which it is enacted that the particulars or conditions of sale by auction of any land shall state whether such land will be sold without reserve, or subject to a reserved price, or whether a right to bid is reserved; if it is stated that such land will be sold without reserve, or to that effect, then it shall not be lawful for the seller to employ any person to bid at such sale, or for the auctioneer to take knowingly any bidding from any such person.

And it is provided by the 6th section of the same Act, that where any sale by auction of land is declared either in the particulars or conditions of such sale to be subject to a right for the seller to bid, it shall be lawful for the seller or any one person on his behalf to bid at such auction in such manner as he may think proper.

The summons was now adjourned into court.

Jessel, Q.C. (Whitehorne with him) for the purchaser, submitted that the sale was clearly void under the provisions of the Act.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. (Langworthy with him), for the parties having the conduct of the sale, contended that the employment of a puffer, provided he did not bid beyond the reserved price, was allowable even before the passing of the Act, which had made no change in this respect. The intention of the Act was only to prevent the employment of a puffer when the sale was without reserve. The statement that a price was reserved justified the vendor in running it up by a puffer to that price. As to the old law, they cited

Mortimer v. Bell, 13 L. T. Rep. N.S, 348; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 10.

Lord ROMILLY.—The Act clearly requires it to be stated in the conditions of sale, whether the land is to be sold without reserve, or subject to a reserved price, and also whether a puffer is to be employed, or, in the words of the Act, whether a right to bid is reserved. Here no right to bid was reserved, and nevertheless a puffer was employed. I am of opinion that the sale was therefore void, and must be set aside.

DEARE v. SOUTTEN.

Husband and wife—Desertion—Moneys advanced for necessaries—Remedy in equity against husband.

A husband deserted his wife and left her without means of support. She then filed a bill praying that the trustees in whose names stood a sum of Consols in which she had an absolute interest defeasible in a certain event, might be directed to pay the dividends to her, and a decree to that effect was made. The dividends which fell due just before the date of the decree had been received by the husband, and one of the trustees advanced moneys to the wife for her maintenance till the next dividends became due:

On a bill by the trustee against the husband:

Held, that the husband was liable to repay the moneys so advanced.

At the time of her marriage Mrs. Soutten was entitled to the income of sums of stock amounting to about 14,000*l.*, to which she afterwards became absolutely entitled. There was no settlement or agreement for a settlement made on the marriage. She also became entitled after her marriage to an absolute interest, defeasible in the event of her dying without leaving issue living at her death, in a sum of 9936*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* Consols standing in the names of the plaintiff and two other trustees.

Soon after she became absolutely entitled to the 14,000*l.*, her husband obtained possession of it, and applied it to his own use, and, as the plaintiff alleged, he then deserted his wife and ceased to maintain her.

In Feb. 1868 Mrs. Soutten, by her next friend, filed a bill against her husband and the trustees of the sum of 9936*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* Consols, praying that a proper settlement thereof might be made by order of the court, and that the trustees might be ordered to pay the whole of the dividends thereof to her, and might be restrained by injunction from paying any part of the dividends to her husband. The cause did not come on for hearing till the 15th July 1868, and it then appeared that the husband had received the dividends which became due on the 5th July 1868, and refused to repay the same or any part thereof for the maintenance of Mrs. Soutten, and his Lordship, considering that he could make no order as to such dividends, directed the subsequent dividends to be paid to Mrs Soutten during her life.

The bill alleged that Mrs. Soutten was entirely without means of support up to the 5th Jan. 1869, when the next dividends became due, and that during the period between the decree and that date the plaintiff, who was one of the trustees in whose names the Consols were standing, paid to her various sums amounting to 192*l.* for her maintenance and support; and it was proved that these sums had been actually applied by Mrs. Soutten in the purchase of, and payment, for necessaries for her maintenance and support, and for rent, rates, and taxes of the house in which she lived.

The bill charged that the defendant, the husband, was bound in equity to repay to the plaintiff the sums so advanced to Mrs. Soutten.

The prayer was that the defendant might be ordered to repay to the plaintiff the sums which the plaintiff had advanced to Mrs. Soutten since the plaintiff had ceased to live with and support her, and which had been actually laid out by her in the purchase of necessaries.

Archibald Smith, for the plaintiff, said that it was clearly settled that there was no remedy at law, but that there was no doubt that this court could grant the relief asked for. He cited

Harris v. Lee, 1 P. Wms. 482;
Hutchinson v. Standley, Annual Register 1776, p. 117; Reg. Lib. 1775, No. 216, b;
Jenner v. Morris, 1 Dr. & Sm. 218; and on appeal 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 871; 3 De G. F. & J. 45.

Idle, for the defendant, contended that the court would not decree payment in such a case as this; Shadwell, V.C. had so decided in May v. Skey, 16 Sim. 588. [LORD ROMILLY.—That case was distinctly overruled in Jenner v. Morris.] He argued that all the advances having been made subsequently to the filing of the bill in Soutten v. Soutten, they should have been provided for in that suit, as the court would have directed an advancement to be made out of the capital of the wife's property under the 57th section of the Improvement of Jurisdiction Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86).

Lord ROMILLY, without calling for a reply, said:—I am of opinion that I must make the decree asked for. The wife files a bill asking to have the dividends on a sum of Consols paid to her for her maintenance. Her husband, who has deserted her, receives the dividends in July, just before the decree is made in the suit, and the wife is left without any means of support. One of the trustees in whose names the fund stands advances money to the wife for her maintenance till the dividends become payable under the decree; and he now asks the court to make the husband repay the money so advanced to the wife. The cases cited by Mr. Idle as to the wife's property being liable do not apply to this case; they are all cases where the husband could not be found, and there is no doubt that the capital of the wife's property is liable where the husband cannot be reached. I must make a decree in the terms of the prayer of the bill. The defendant must pay the amount within a month together with the costs of this suit, unless he elects to have an inquiry, in which case he must be decreed to pay such sums as shall be found to have been properly advanced and expended in the purchase of necessaries, and in that case the amount will not be limited to that expressed in the bill to have been advanced.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 16.

WILLIAMS v. THE EAST LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Agreement to purchase leaseholds from lessee—Apportionment of rents under 119*th section of Lands Clauses Consolidation Act* 1845*—Notice to treat with lessor—Specific performance—Costs.*

A railway company agreed with the plaintiff, the lessee of certain leaseholds, to purchase a portion of the property. The agreement provided (inter alia) "that the rents payable by the vendor under the said leases should be apportioned under 119*th section of the Lands Clauses Act, if necessary."*

Subsequently on the lessor, who was not a party to the agreement, refusing to enter into an arrangement as to the apportionment, a summons was taken out for the purpose of having the apportionment determined by a metropolitan magistrate under the statute. On the summons coming on to be heard the magistrate decided that he could not proceed with the matter unless the company served the lessor with notice to treat for the purchase of his interest.

The company declined to give such notice, and the plaintiff thereupon filed a bill against them, praying that they might be ordered specifically to perform the agreement, and to do all necessary acts for carrying it into effect, including the apportionment of the rents and the giving the necessary notice to treat to the lessor, and for costs:

Held, that the court could not order the company to serve the lessor with notice to treat, but that the agreement must be specifically performed, and that each party must do all things necessary for carrying it into effect, having regard to the precise terms of it and to the provisions of the Land Clauses Consolidation Act; and that as the view taken by the magistrate had occasioned the suit, each party must bear his own costs.

The material question in this suit, which was instituted against the East London Railway Company for the specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of certain leasehold houses, was whether the defendants (the company) would be compelled under a clause in the agreement to obtain the lessor's sanction to the apportionment of the rents between the houses in question and others under the same leases. The facts were as follows.

By an indenture of lease dated the 5th Sept. 1844, William Hoon became the lessee of nine houses in Fleet-street-hill and Petley-street, Bethnal-green, for a term of sixty-one years, at an aggregate rent of 40*l.*, subject to certain covenants, and, among others, to one on the part of the lessee, not to carry on any noisy or offensive trade on the premises, with a proviso for re-entry by the lessor for non-payment of rent, or on breach of any of the covenants. By another indenture of even date with the former, Hoon became lessee of nine other houses in Charles-street, Bethnal-green for a similar term, and subject to the same covenants, at an aggregate rent of 41*l.* 12*s*, Mr. Charles Salisbury Butler being the lessor in both instances.

William Hoon died in Nov. 1861, and by his will he appointed the plaintiff, Henry Reader Williams, his executor.

On the 15th Nov. 1867 the defendants entered into an agreement with the plaintiff for the purchase of his interest (as Hoon's executor), of a portion of the houses held under the above-mentioned leases, for the sum of 1250*l.* The agreement provided (inter alia) that if, from any cause whatever, the purchase should not be completed on the 1st Dec. then next, the vendor should be entitled, at his option, either to the rents or to interest on the said purchase-money at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum until the actual completion, without prejudice to his right to completion or otherwise. The vendor was to release his right of pre-emption (if any) of the property purchased. A proportionate part of the accruing rents up to the day of the company entering into possession, or into receipt of the rents, was to belong to the vendor, and to be paid and allowed by him to the company, the vendor to pay all outgoings thereon up to the time of the company being let into possession, or into the receipt of the rents and profits of the premises, including the proportionate part of the rents, rates, and taxes up to such time, but subject to the vendor's right of option contained in the last condition. The vendor was to retain in his possession the two indentures of lease of the 5th Sept. 1844, under which the premises were held, and which related also to other property of the vendor, and enter, if required, by and at the cost of the company, into the usual covenants for production and furnishing copies thereof. The company were to pay all the vendor's costs according to the Lands Clauses Act, and the sum of 15*l.* 15*s.* for preliminary expenses. The agreement further provided "that the rents payable by the vendor under the said leases were to be apportioned under the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Act, if necessary."

The section above referred to enacts "That if any lands shall be comprised in a lease for a term of years unexpired, part of which lands shall be required for the purposes of the special Act, the rent payable shall be apportioned between the lands required and the residue of the land, and the apportionment may be settled by agreement between the lessor and the lessee on the one part, and the company on the other part; and if such apportionment be not so settled by agreement between the parties, such apportionment shall be settled by two justices."

Shortly after the date of the above agreement, a draft agreement for the apportionment of the rents was prepared and forwarded to Mr. Butler, the lessor, for his approval. Mr. Butler, however, objected to entering into the agreement, and declined to execute it. After some correspondence between the solicitors of the parties on the subject, the plaintiff took out two summonses, one against the company and the other against Butler, for the purpose of having the question of apportionment determined by one of the metropolitan police magistrates, under the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

The summonses came on to be heard on the 11th June 1868, before Mr. Ellison, at the Worship-street Police-court, and it then appearing that the defendants had not given Butler notice to treat for the purchase of his interest in the property, Mr. Ellison expressed an opinion that in the absence of such notice he could not grant the application, and adjourned the matter for three weeks in order to give the defendants an opportunity of serving notice.

Ultimately, the defendants having declined to give notice, this bill was filed praying that it might be declared that the defendants had accepted the title of the plaintiff to the leasehold premises comprised in the said agreement of the 15th Nov. 1867, and that they might be decreed specifically to perform the said agreement, and to do all necessary acts for the due performance thereof, including the apportionment of the rents under the said leases, under the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the giving notice to treat to the said Charles Salisbury Butler for the purchase of the said hereditaments; and that they might be ordered to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 1250*l.*, the plaintiff being ready and willing on such payment and such apportionment of rent to execute an assignment of the said premises (the draft whereof had been agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendants), and to vest the said premises in the defendants, free from all incumbrances. And that the defendants might pay the costs of the suit.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Ellis, for the plaintiff, contended that it was of the utmost importance for his protection that there should be apportionment. Without it the lessor might at any time, upon a breach by the defendants of any of the covenants in the lease, re-enter upon the whole property. It formed an integral part of the agreement, and as the magistrate had decided that he had no power to act, unless the lessor had had notice to treat from the defendants, and as the defendants had declined to give that notice, the plaintiff had no other resource than to come to this court for the relief prayed. They cited

Greene, Q. C., Fooks, Q. C., and W. Fooks, for the defendants submitted that they had done all in their power towards the completion of the contract. They had expressed their willingness to enter into covenants for the plaintiff's protection, but they could not be compelled to step beyond their contract, and it was no part of the contract that they should treat with Mr. Butler. There was nothing to show the nature of his interest in the property. He might, for all they knew, be merely a lessee, holding under another landlord, who might himself have the fee simple of the property; but whatever his interest was, they might never want it for the purpose of their line, and could not either legally or equitably be required to purchase it. To compel companies to purchase the interests of landlords in such cases, would involve consequences most injurious to the promotion of railways, and to the interests of the public. They cited

Bailey v. De Crespigny, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 180; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—There is no doubt that the agreement is clear and binding upon both parties, and that it is an integral part of it that there should be an apportionment of the rents. The necessity for an apportionment so far as the plaintiff is concerned is apparent, and the defendants have not resisted it, for it appears that both parties went before one of the metropolitan magistrates to have the question determined, and it is in consequence of this decision that the present litigation has arisen. The magistrate decided that, unless the defendants gave the lessor notice to treat for the purchase of his interest, he had no power to deal with the case, but the defendants not wishing to purchase the lessor's interest, declined to give the required notice, and thereupon the magistrate dismissed the summons before him. The plaintiff, treating this as a proper decision, files this bill for specific performance of the agreement, and asks that the defendants may be ordered to serve the notice on the lessor. That order, however, the court cannot make; but as I consider that an apportionment ought to be made under the statute, and that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree, though not the one he asks, I shall direct that the agreement be specifically performed, and that both the plaintiff and the defendants do and concur in all things necessary for carrying it into effect, having regard to the precise terms of it, and to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. With reference to the costs, as the view taken by the magistrate has occasioned the suit, and, as the mistake made before him was common to both parties, I think it would be too severe to compel either party to pay the whole costs, and I shall therefore direct that each party bear their own.
